GERALDUS (2) I. (GERARDUS), said to have been thirteenth bishop of Apt, following Magnericus, or Magnicus, and succeeded by Sendardus, but the only authority for his existence is the occurrence of his name in the catalogues of the monastery of St. Aignan. His date is placed towards the close of the 8th century (Gall. Christ. i. 352). [S. A. B.]

GERARDUS (1) (GERONTIUS), sixteenth bishop of Bologna, between Julianus I. and Theodorus I. The signature Laurentius Bobiensis occurs in the 5th synod of Rome in 500 (Mansi, viii. 299 c), and Bobiensis has been suspected as a misreading for Bononiensis, thus making Laurentius and not Gerardus the bishop of Bologna at that date. But Ughelli shews that the suspicion is groundless (Ug. Ital. Sac. ii. 11; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 462, 579).

[C. H.]

GERARDUS (2) (GIRALDUS), bishop of Velitrae (Velletri), c. A.D. 596-600. He had been a monk under Gregory the Great. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 59; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 459.) [R. S. G.]

GERARDUS (3), tenth bishop of Laon, succeeding Peregrinus, and followed by Serulfus in the latter half of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 512.) [S. A. B.]

GERASIMUS (1), one of four bishops named in the inscription of an edict of the emperor Gratian, in which he defines the respective limits of the jurisdictions of ecclesiastical and civil tribunals. The edict is dated Treves, July 17, A.D. 376 (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 23). The others are Artemius, Euridicus, and Appius. There was an Artemius bishop of Embrun, A.D. 374 (Gall. Ch. iii. 1055), and an Artemius bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, after A.D. 388 (Gall. Ch. ii. 229; Greg. Turon. Hist. Fr. i. 41; ii. 12).

GERASIMUS (2), a celebrated anchorite of Palestine towards the middle of the 5th century. He was a native of Lydia. After having gained great celebrity by his monastic virtues, he was led astray by Theodosius the intruding bishop of Jerusalem, and adopted his heretical tenets. Having been led to visit Euthymius at his laura he was by him brought back to a sound faith (Cyril. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthym. § 77). Gerasimus afterwards founded a large laura near the Jordan, affording accommodation for as many as seventy anchorites, in the middle of which he constructed a coenobium for the younger monks, who were not yet accustomed to the austerities of monastic life. His rule, which is given by Cyrillus, was one of excessive severity. He absolutely refused his anchorites leave to heat water, to partake of cooked food, or to have a lamp to read by. Such indulgences he said were suitable only for coenobites. He is reported to have fasted through the whole of Lent, taking no food for forty days besides the sacramental elements. He died March 5, A.D. 475. John Moschus gives a long account of his familiar companionship with a lion (Joannes Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 107; see also Boll. Acta SS. 5 Mart. i. 386). [E. V.]

GERBALDUS, thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth bishop of Liège, between Agilfridus and Walcandus. In the Gesta Episcoporum Leodiensium of Anselm the name only occurs (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 1081). He is said to have sat for twenty-five years, and to have died on the 15th of November, probably in 810, after enriching the church with gifts. He is one of the bishops mentioned as having been present at the canonization of St. Suidbertus in the spurious letter attributed to St. Liudger of Münster. (Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium, tom. i. 150, ed. Chapeauville, Liège, 1612; Gall. Christ. iii. 832.)

GERBERTA, daughter of St. Gertrude abbess of Hamay and mother of St. Adalbald. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. p. 941, ed. 1669.)

[A. B. C. D.]

GEREBERN (GENEBERN, GENEBRARD), martyr, commemorated May 15. He was an Irish priest, who baptized and instructed St. Dimpna (May 15) of Gheel, while her Christian sympathies were yet unknown. [DIMPNA.] He also accompanied her from Ireland to the Continent, and was put to death at the same time and place with his pupil. He is commemorated on the same day, and is regarded as the patron of Sonsbeck in the ancient Duchy of Cleves. But by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 311) he is called "S. Gerebernus Scotus, S. Asaphi Scoti discipulus in extrema senecta ac S. Philani socius, presbyter vitae religiosissimae," &c., and is said to have left Wales for Ireland, and written Ad Dympnam Institutio, lib. i.; Pro vero Dei cultu, lib. i.; his martyrdom taking place at Gheel in the year 700 (Tanner, Bibl. 312). But evidently much of this is fanciful. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 13; O'Hanlon, Life of St. Dymrna, pass.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, May 15; Usuard, Mart. Auct. 15 Mai. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 57 sq.)

[J. G.]

GEREBERTUS, sixteenth bishop of Verdun, succeeding his uncle Gisloaldus, and followed by Armonius. Before his consecration he was abbat of Tholey (Theolegium), a monastery in the diocese of Treves, in which capacity he fought against the exactions of Ebroin. He is said to have died in 689, after an episcopate of twenty-four years (Gall. Christ. xiii. 563, 1170).

GEREBOLDUS, ST., thirteenth bishop of Bayeux, succeeding St. Ragnobertus, and followed by St. Framboldus, subscribed the council of Rouen, held under the presidency of the archbishop Ansbertus (A.D. 682 or 692). He was buried in the monastery of Libericum (Livray) which he founded, and is commemorated in his own diocese Dec. 7. In the Auctaria of Grevenus to Usuard for that day occurs a legend of his being imprisoned and cast into the sea as a punishment for his firm resistance to the sin of unchastity. (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 778; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. xi. 1044, Flor. 1759-98; Gall. Christ. xi. 350.)

GEREINT. [GERAINT.]

GEREMARUS, abbat of Flaviacum (St. Germer de Flay) in the district of Beauvais. He is said to have been born at the vill of Givirandra or Warandra, on the Itta, about A.D. 610, his parents being named Rigobert and Aga, the latter of a noble Frankish family. He was invited to court by king Dagobert, who greatly honoured him; married a lady named Domana; founded a monastery called Insula, near Flaviacum, on a spot afterwards named St. Peter in the Wood, and placed Archarius as abbat over it. Longing at length for monastic retirement himself, he made over his property to his son Amalbert, and retired from court in the eleventh year of Clovis II., i.e. cir. 648, to the monastery of Pentallum near Rouen, on the river Lirizinus. Of this house he became abbat, but resigned his office and withdrew as a hermit to a cave near the Seine, in which seclusion he was ordained presbyter by Audoenus (St. Ouen), bishop of Rouen. His son, who had succeeded him at court, and followed the king to the wars, was cir. 654 prematurely cut off, and with the property which thus returned to his hands Geremar erected the monastery of Flaviacum, on the Itta, over which he presided for three years and a half, until his death on Sept. 24, 658. An anonymous ancient life of Geremar was appended by D'Achery in 1651 to his edition of Guibert of Nogent, and may also be seen in Patrol. Lat. clvi. 1203. It was edited with a few notes by Mabillon (Acta SS. O.S.B. ii. 455) and by the Bollandists (Sep. vi. 698) with more notes and a commentary by Perier. In these notes some of the obscure localities of the narrative are identified. The Itta is the Kpte. Warandra is Vardes near its left bank below Gournay. Flaviacum is Germer de Flay, across the Epte and in a line due east with Beauvais. Pentallum (which was existing in the ninth century) was beyond the Seine between Pontaudemer and Honfleur; Lirizinus the Lizaine. Geremar's successor in the monastery of Flaviacum is not known, but the third abbat was Gennardus (Gall. Chr. ix. 787).

GEREON, martyr. [LEGIO THEBAEA.]

GERESINA is described by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 312), as matron and queen of Sicily, a Scot by birth, sister of St. Daria, aunt of S. Ursula, mother of St. Adrian prince and martyr, and of the daughters Babila Aurea and Victoria, and also sister of bishop Macrarius; she suffered in Germany with St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgins, A.D. 454. But the whole tale is evidently fabulous.

GERETRANNUS, ST., eleventh bishop of Bayeux, succeeding Leudovaldus, and followed by St. Ragnobertus, at the close of the 6th century. He is commemorated in the Gallican Martyrology, Dec. 7 (Gall. Christ. xi. 349). [S. A. B.]

GERFRID (1) (GILFREDUS, GILFRIDUS), said to have been twenty-second bishop of Laon, following Sigebaudus, and succeeded by Wanilo II., but his position in the list is somewhat conjectural. He was present in 798 and 799 at the dedication of the churches of the monastery of St. Riquier (Centulense) in the diocese of Amiens. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 799, n. vii. tom. vi. 680-81; an. 818, n. xx. vii. 493; Mabillon, Annales Ord. Ben. ii. 331; Gall. Christ. ii. 512.) [S. A. B.]

GERFRID (2) succeeded his uncle Liudger as bishop of Münster in A.D. 809. In A.D. 819 he and his uncle Hildegim, bishop of Halberstadt, are mentioned together as visitors of the abbey of Werden. In A.D. 834 he received from one Frithuard half a farm in the vill of Hising, in the Ripuarian Gau, with rights of pasturage and taking wood, in exchange for half a farm in the vill of Castorp, in the Broktergau, and 20 "Furlangas" in the vill of Werina, in the Gau of Dregin. In the same year, he gave to the nunnery of Nuitlon, founded by St. Liudger, of which his cousin Heriburgis was abbess, the farms of Buchuldi and Oildinchus. In A.D. 838 he is mentioned as being present at the palace at Nimeguen, at the settlement before the emperor Louis and his sons Louis and Charles, of a dispute between count Gozbert and abbat Erabennus of Fulda. He died in A.D. 839. (Erhard's Excerpta Historiae Westfaliae, i. 89-99; Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptor. iii. 3.) [F. D.]

GERICUS. [GOERICUS.]

GERINUS. [GAIRINUS.]

GERIVALDUS, bishop. [GARIVALDUS.]

GERMANA, virgin martyr; commemorated Oct. 1. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 1 Oct. i. 33-4) give her acts taken by Vignerius from three MS. codices of the priories of St. Germana and St. Machutus (Maclou), and prefix a commentarius praeuius; her acts, written by an anonymous author, have no evident authority, and the date of her martyrdom is unfixed to more than the 5th century. Its place is conjectured to have been at Bar-sur-Aube rather than Bar-sur-Seine, in the French department of the Aube, and her priory was probably on or near the present Mont-St.-Germaine. (See also Sausures, Mart. Gall. 674, Paris, 1637.)

According to her legend, she suffered death at the hands of the Vandals when they came into France; her decapitated body was buried in the church of St. Stephen, or where it afterwards stood. Vignerius calls her deaconess. [J. G.]

GERMANIANUS, a bishop present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 412, against Pelagius and Celestina. (Aug. Ep. 175.) [H. W. P.]

GERMANICUS (1), a nobleman concerning whom Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. iv. 13) writes to Vectius. He was son of one bishop and father of another, yet at sixty years of age dressed and lived like a young man. Sidonius is distressed at his spiritual condition, and prays Vectius to induce him to enter the sacred ministry. [R. T. S.]

GERMANICUS (2)—Jan. 19. A martyr in the flower of youth with the aged Polycarp at Smyrna, A.D. 167. [POLYCARP.] His courage in provoking the beasts to which he was condemned is praised in the circular letter addressed by the church at Smyrna to other Christian churches. He suffered a short time before Polycarp. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.; Euseb. H. E. iv. 15; Ruinart, Acta Sincera; Ceill. i. 393.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANIO (1), the thirty-second bishop of Jerusalem, who succeeded Pius at the end of the 2nd century. He was succeeded by Gordius. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 10; Epiphan. Haer. ix. 20.) [E. V.]

GERMANIO (2). Pope Innocent I. in a letter to Marcian, bishop of Naissus, written at Ravenna, states that Germanio and Lupentius, who claimed to be a priest and deacon respectively, had come to him as a deputation from many others in the same position as themselves. They complained that, notwithstanding that their ordination by Bonosus had been long before his condemnation, Marcian refused to admit them to communion with him, although he permitted them to keep possession of their churches. They also accused one Rusticius, who apparently had been ordained by Bonosus, of getting himself ordained a second time. Innocent accordingly reminds Marcian that he had pronounced that those who had been ordained by Bonosus before his condemnation ought to be received back into the church if they had wished, or even then wished, to return (S. Innocentii Epist. 16, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 519; Ceillier, Histoire des Aut. sacr. vii. 514). [BONOSUS.] [F. D.]

GERMANUS (1), a bishop of some part or of Egypt, and for a time an adversary of St. Dionysius of Alexandria. In answer to his calumnies, St. Dionysius wrote various letters, parts of which are extant in Eusebius. Germanus had accused St. Dionysius of cowardice in neglecting his people while he took care of his own personal safety, and in taking to flight in order to avoid persecution, and of refusing to hold the public assemblies of the faithful. In answer to this, St. Dionysius recounts what had happened in the persecutions under the emperors Valerian and Decius. (Eusebius, bk. vi. ch. 40, and bk. vii. ch. 11; Tillemont, iv. pp. 272, 273.) [J. W. S.]

GERMANUS (2), bishop of Neapolis (Sichem, or Nablus), in Palestine, present at the council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, and that of Neocaesarea in the same year. (Mansi, ii. 534, 548; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 647.) [J. de S.]

GERMANUS (3), bishop of Petra, who was intruded by the Arian party into that see, when the orthodox bishop Asterius was banished by Constantius. He attended the synod at Seleucia, 359 A.D., and signed with the semi-Arian party. (Epiphan, Haer. lxxiii. § 26; Mansi, iii. 324 a; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 723.) [E. V.]

GERMANUS (4), bishop of Corycus on the coast of Cilicia. He was present at the second general council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 568; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 879.) [J. de S.]

GERMANUS (5), bishop of Besunçon, in the 4th century. His martyrdom is fixed at A.D.

407. But his acts are disfigured by legends, as that he carried his head after decapitation, the walls of Baume tottering all the while. Baume, near Besançon, shews no trace of having ever had walls. The foundation of the abbey of that place is ascribed to Germanus. (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Oct. v. 622, 626 E; Gall. Chr. xv. 7.) [R. T. S.]

GERMANUS (6), the name of two bishops of Mauretania Caesariensis, viz. of Gypsaia (Catholic) and of Zugabbera, Sugabbaria, or Sucabiarta (Donatist), present at the Carthaginian conference of 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 128; 135.) [H. W. P.]

GERMANUS (7), one of the bishops who met at Carthage, A.D. 412, against Pelagius and Celestius. (Aug. Ep. 175.) [H. W. P.]

GERMANUS (8), ST., bishop of Auxerre in the fifth century. His life was written about 40 years after his death, i.e. about A.D. 488 (Gallia Christiana, xii. 262) by Constantius, a presbyter of Lyons, himself an eminent person in the Gallic church, and highly esteemed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Sidon. Ep. i. 1, iii. 2, in which latter epistle he addresses Constantius as "aetate gravis, nobilitate sublimis, religione venerabilis," and as a benefactor in more than one sense to the city of Châlons). Constantius undertook the task at the request of Patiens bishop of Lyons, and when his book was written, published it at the request of Censurius bishop of Auxerre. In his preface he says that a long time has elapsed since the death of Germanus, who was born "probably about the year 378" (Life of St. German, in Lives of the English Saints, p. 15) at Auxerre (Autessiodorum, Autissiodorum, or Autosiodorum, Ammian. xvi. 2, 5), reckoned as the third city in Lugdunensis Quarta, or Senonia (Bingham, l. ix. c. 6, s. 8), and situated near the southern border of what was afterwards named Champagne, and about the centre of the present department of the Yonne. It is described in Gallia Christiana, as "an old and illustrious city, not inferior to many great Gallic cities in respect to its fertile soil, its vineyards, its navigable river;" it had been evangelized, according to its local traditions, by Peregrinus, sent from Rome in the middle of the 3rd century, and Amator, who came to its see in 388, was reckoned as its fifth bishop. The parents of German (to adopt the familiar abbreviation of his name) were of noble descent; their names (see Tillemont, xv. 8) are given as Rusticus and Germanilla. They caused their son to be baptized, and gave him the best attainable education; he attended "Gallic schools," in which, as St. Jerome wrote in A.D. 411 (Ep. 125, 6) "learning was most flourishing;" among these one of the chief, and the most accessible to a native of Auxerre, was at Lyons; after a time he went to Rome, studied for the bar, and practised as an advocate before "the tribunal of the prefect," on his return he married a lady named Eustachia, and rose to high secular office by becoming one of the six "dukes" of Gaul, each of whom had the government of a certain number of provinces (Gibbon, ii. 320). Auxerre was included in German's district: and the young duke, "whose habit then was rather to indulge in the pursuits of youth than to give serious heed to Christian duties," was a keen hunter, and used to hang up the heads of his game on a large pear-tree in the midst of his native city. This offended Amator, the bishop, who saw in it a resemblance to a Pagan fashion of honouring large trees. He often remonstrated with German, but in vain. However, one day the "duke" went to a country estate of his, and the bishop took the opportunity of destroying the pear-tree, and casting away the heads of game, which Constantius calls "oscilla." German, hearing of this, actually set off for Auxerre in order to kill the bishop: Amator, warned of his peril, and "thinking himself unworthy to be a martyr," took the extraordinary step of visiting the prefect Julius, then at Autun, and requesting his permission to make German a cleric, as he was the fittest person to succeed to his own see. Julius reluctantly assented: Amator returned, exhorted his flock to choose his future successor, because he felt his death to be at hand, led them to the church, bade them lay aside their weapons, and seeing German among those who obeyed, caused the doors to be barred, laid hands on the duke, cut his hair short, and then conferred on him the clerical character, bidding him live as one who was destined to be bishop. Soon afterwards he fell ill, obtained from his people a promise to elect German, and on Wednesday morning, May 1, 418, caused himself to be carried to the church, and just lived to be placed once more upon his throne. He was buried beside his predecessors in the neighbouring Mount Autricus, and German, unanimously elected, was consecrated on Sunday, July 7. "He received the episcopate under compulsion, but it wrought in him a sudden and total change." His wife became to him as a sister: he distributed his property to the poor: he became a severe ascetic, as Constantius says, a "persecutor of his body," abstaining from salt, oil, and even from vegetables, from wine, excepting a small quantity much diluted on Christmas-day or Easter-day, and from wheat bread, instead of which he ate barley bread with a preliminary taste of ashes (cinerem praelibavit). He wore the same hood and tunic in all seasons, and slept on ashes in a framework of boards. "Let anyone speak his mind," says Constantius, to whom some details of German's life must have come down not free from exaggeration: "but I positively assert that the blessed German endured a long martyrdom." Withal he was hospitable, and gave his guests a good meal, though he would not share it with them. He founded a monastery outside Auxerre, on the opposite bank of the Yonne, which he often crossed in a boat to visit the abbat and brethren. His biographer, who believes miracles to have accompanied him through life, tells us that some oil blessed by him was effectual against an epidemic affection of the throat, which had proved widely fatal.

We must now follow German to Britain. Pelagianism had been rife in its founder's native island; and the British clergy, unable to refute the heretics, requested help from the church, we may say from their mother church, of Gaul. Accordingly "a numerous synod was assembled, and by consent of all application was made to the two glorious luminaries of religion, German and Lupus, the bishop of Troyes, both of whom accepted the call, the more andily because of the labour involved" in it. So says Constantius, who is followed and for the most part transcribed by Bede (i. 17). But here comes a difficulty. Prosper of Aquitaine, a contemporary, in his Chronicle for the year 429, says that pope Coelestine, "at the suggestion of the deacon Palladius, sent German as his representative" (vice sua) into Britain: and in his Contra Collatorem, written about 432, speaks of Coelestine as "taking pains to keep the Roman island" (Britain) "catholic" (c. 21, or 24). Now Prosper could not but be well informed about the proceedings of Coelestine, for he was at Rome, for the express purpose of lodging a complaint against Gallic Semi-Pelagians, in 431. Constantius wrote about sixty years after German's British journey, but with full access to local information. Unless Prosper wrote a mere falsehood, Coelestine must have had something to do with German's mission; but it is likely enough that Prosper from his "Roman" standpoint would overrate the importance of Coelestine's action, and also that Constantius would dwell simply on the action of the Gallic synod. The truth probably lies in a combination of the pope's action with the councils, at any rate so far as German was concerned. Lupus is not named with German by Prosper; of him evidently Coelestine took no thought, but we may reasonably believe that Coelestine gave some special commission to German either before (as Tillemont thinks, Mémoires, xiv. 154) or at the time of the Gallic synod: it is not probable that, as Lingard supposes, the synod's commission was only to Lupus, and German was "sent" by the pope alone (Angl. Sax. Ch. i. 8).

When the two prelates, travelling northward, reached Metrodovum or Nanterre, near Paris, German saw in the crowd which came to meet them a girl named Genovefa, asked her whether she wished to dedicate herself to God, received her affirmative answer, and bade her live as one espoused to Christ. She became "St. Geneviève of Paris." German and Lupus had a perilous voyage across the Channel: Constantius, in whose eyes German's path was, as a matter of course, strewn with miracles, affirms that he stilled the storm by pouring oil into the sea, with invocation of the Trinity. Arrived in Britain, the bishops preached the doctrines of grace in churches, in the country, on the roads, with great effect: at last the Pelagian leaders took heart, and challenged them to a discussion, which took place apparently near Verulam. A great multitude assembled; "on the one hand," says Constantius, "was Divine authority, on the other, human presumption;" the heretics, conspicuous by their wealth and their rich garb, were collected by obsequious disciples, and opened the debate in speeches more verbose than forcible. The two bishops replied, appealing to Scripture in support of the Catholic position; "pouring forth," says Constantius, "the torrents of their eloquence with the thunder peals (Bede alters this into 'showers') of evangelists and apostles." They silenced their opponents, and the shouts of the audience hailed their victory. German and Lupus then visited the reputed tomb of the British protomartyr Alban, and Constantius tells the famous tale of the Alleluia Victory. The Britons are menaced by Picts and Saxons;

German and Lupus encourage them to resist, catechize and baptize the still heathen majority in their army, and then, shortly after the Easter of 430, station them in a narrow glen, and at the invaders' approach repeat thrice the Paschal Alleluia. The Britons send the shout ringing through the defile; the enemy is seized with panic, and "faith without the sword wins a bloodless victory." On returning home German found the people of Auxerre suffering under an unusual demand of tribute; he set forth at once for Arles, the seat of the central government, and obtained from the prefect Auxiliaries a "remedium," or remission of the demands.

In 447 he was again entreated by British churchmen to aid them against Pelagianism. He took with him Severus, bishop of Treves, a disciple of Lupus, and having, on his way, vindicated Genovefa against calumniators, he landed in Britain, and (not without a miracle, according to Constantius) triumphed again over the Pelagians, and procured their banishment from the island. Welsh traditions have much to tell about German's activities on behalf of the British church. They lay the scene of the Alleluia victory at Maes-garmon, near Mold; they speak of colleges founded by German, of national customs traced to his authority; and although much of this is legendary, and the stories in Nennius about his relations with king Vortigern are apocryphal, it seems not improbable that he did more for British Christianity than Constantius knew of, or felt an interest in recording. He had no sooner returned home than another occasion for his humane intervention presented itself. The Armoricans, whose country had not yet acquired, through British immigration, the name of Brittany, were in a state of chronic revolt against the empire. They were, if not the whole, yet the greater part of that vast coalition of insurgents who went by the name of Bagaudae (Life of St. German, p. 219), but who had been goaded into insubordination or rebellion by the villanies and robberies, the proscriptions and spoliations carried on by the provincial government (Salvian, Gub. Dei, v. 6). Aetius, now again at the head of affairs under the emperor Valentinian III., and invested with the dignity of patrician, gave permission to Eochar, king of the Alani, to invade their territory, which had once apparently been under German's rule as duke. He now stepped between the people and their enemies; he went to meet the Alani, where "cavalry, like an iron mass, filled the road" (Constant. ii. 5). He reached the presence of Eochar, and entreated him to pause; the barbarian put aside the request; the old bishop, taking his life in his hand, grasped the king's bridle, and this daring act overawed the barbarian into promising a truce until German should have obtained favourable terms for Armorica from the emperor or from Aetius. German set forth at once for Italy, and a beautiful instance of his kindness of heart occurred while he was crossing the Alps. He fell in with a poor old labourer, lame, and carrying a burden. They came to a torrent crossed by slippery stones. The bishop of Auxerre, the envoy between Armoricans and their emperor, himself about 70 years old, carried over on his own shoulders first the bundle, and then the old man himself. It was June 19, 448, when he reached Milan; after leaving it, he yielded, against his attendants' wish, to a request for his presence on the part of a fever-stricken family. He entered Ravenna by night, but his hope of their escaping a public reception was disappointed. Galla Placidia, the empress-mother, sent him a silver dish full of delicate food, but containing no meat. He sold the dish for the poor, having given its contents to his attendants; in its place he sent back a little wooden platter with barley bread; the empress, we are told, kept the bread, and encircled the plate with gold. He was said to have opened a prison by his prayers; the fact being, apparently, that the empress, at his entreaty, released the inmates. He obtained pardon and immunity for the Armoricans, but unfortunately news came that they had again revolted. His power of helping them was thus destroyed by their own act; they were punished by the invasion which could no longer be delayed. German's life-work was now over; he had a dream in which he seemed to receive from his Lord provision for a journey to his country. The bishops who constantly attended on him, and to whom he told the dream, interpreted it in an earthly sense; he answered, "Well do I know what that country is which God promises to His servants." He was soon afterwards taken ill. His lodging overflowed with visitors; a choir kept up ceaseless psalmody by his bedside. He expired on the 31st of July, 448, having been bishop 30 years and 25 days: his body was embalmed, and a magnificent funeral journey to Gaul attested the reverence of the court. In Gaul, roads were mended and bridges made in expectation of the corpse; and the interment took place in a chapel near Auxerre, on October 1. So lived and died St. German, of whom the "Missa S. Germani" says, in a terse summary of his career, "He so began as to increase; he so fought as to conquer." Constantius's 'Life of Germanus' is in Surius de Probatis Sanctorum Historiis, vol. iv. A metrical "Life" and a prose account of his "miracles," both by a monk named Hereric, are in Acta Sanctorum, July 31. Hereric wrote under Charles the Bald. He follows Constantius in ignoring a papal commission to German (Metr. Life); but he gives the legend of German sending his disciple Patrick to Celestine, and Celestine sending him to Ireland (De Mirac.). He professes to give incidents which Constantius had passed over. In spite of his wearisome prolixity and exaggerations, one line of his on German's excellence is worth quoting; after mentioning his teaching, labour, kindness, constancy, fervour, he adds: "Quodque est praecepium, dilectio plurima fratrum."

GERMANUS (9), bishop of Amiens, said by Rosweyde, on the authority of Belgian MSS., to have been "Anglus natione" converted by St. Germanus of Auxerre in 429. Other accounts make him Scotch (i.e. Irish) by birth, and relate that his father, prince Audinus, came for some purpose to Britain, and there fell in with the French saint. Rosweyde also believes him to be the same with St. Eloquius, who came with SS. Fursey, Columbanus, and others from Ireland to Gaul. By others he is supposed to have been a companion of St. Boniface in the 8th century.

His legend contains an extraordinary notice of Julian the apostate, whom it makes to have been a priest. In this legend Germanus of Auxerre meets Audinus and his wife Aquila with their little son, and struck with their angelic appearance takes the child, gives him his own name, and educates him. The young Germanus, when grown up, sailed on a waggon-wheel to Gaul, and working everywhere plentiful miracles, visited Rome, Spain, and England again, but was at last martyred at Amiens. (Boll. Acta SS. 2 Mai. i. 259.) [R. T. S.]

GERMANUS (10), reputed bishop of Man. In the Mart. Tallaght on July 30 there is the commemoration of German, son of Goll, said by many to have been the Germanus who was appointed by St. Patrick to be the first bishop of Man, as related by Joceline. His consecration is assigned to the year 447, and he is still reckoned patron of the ruined church within the precincts of Peel Castle, in the parish of St. Germain, Isle of Man. His ancient feast in Man was July 3. (Colgan, Acta SS. 59, cc. 1, 2, 60, n.⁵, and Tr. Thaum. 86, c. 92, 98, c. 152, 113, n.¹⁰⁸; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. vi. 181, Ind. Chron. A.D. 474; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 204, n.⁵, 207; Keith, Cat. Scott. Bps. 295.) [J. G.]

GERMANUS (11), bishop of Rouen, at the first council of Tours, A.D. 461. (Mansi, vii. 947; Gall. Christ. xi. 9.) [R. T. S.]

GERMANUS (12), bishop of Peradam in Byzacene, present at the convention of bishops, A.D. 484, and said to have been scourged by order of Hunneric. (Vict. Vit. Notit. 57; De Perssec. Vand. ii. 16, v. 1; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 244.) [R. S. G.]

GERMANUS (13), bishop of Pisaurum (Pesaro) c. A.D. 497. He was sent on a mission to Constantinople, together with Cresconius bishop of Todi, by pope Anastasius II. (Mansi, viii. 189 d; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 948; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 341; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. p. 61; Ceillier, Auteurs sacr. x. 518.) [R. S. G.]

GERMANUS (14), bishop of Verona, probably towards the end of the 5th century. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 747, 813; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. i. 28, ii. 2.) [R. S. G.]

GERMANUS (15), third bishop of the Vermandui (Vermandois) before the 6th century. The seat of the bishopric was afterwards fixed at Noyon. (Gall. Christ. ix. 979.) [R. T. S.]

GERMANUS (16), bishop of Capua, sent with other legates in 519 to Constantinople by pope Hormisdas. They were instructed to hold communion with no one who would not sign the Libellus, which contained the condemnation of the patriarch Acacius and his successors, Euphemius and Macedonius, on the ground of their unorthodoxy in the matter of Monophysitism. The legates were received with great honour in Constantinople. Hormisdas wrote several letters to Germanus and his companions (Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 67-69; Mansi, viii. 442, seq.). Gregory the Great relates that St. Benedict saw the soul of Germanus carried up by angels to heaven. (Greg. Magn. Dial. iii. 35; iv. 7.) [A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (17), bishop of Aemonia (now Cittanova), about ten miles north of Parenzo in Istria, c. 546. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 747.) [A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (18) (GERMAIN), ST., 20th bishop of Paris, born at Autun of parents of rank named Eleutherius and Eusebia (circ. A.D. 496). He was sent to school at Avalon, between Autun and Auxerre, and next, to Luzy (Lausis), between Autun and the Loire, where he was well educated. In due time he was ordained deacon by St. Agrippinus, and three years later priest. He was next made abbat of the monastery of St. Symphorian at Autun, by Nectarius the bishop. Here his generosity to the poor was so great that he nearly starved his monks, who rose in rebellion. In 555, being present at Paris on some mission to Childebert, when that see was vacant by the death of Eusebius, he was raised to the archbishopric. His great object seems to have been to check, as far as he was able, the unbridled licence of the Frank kings, and to ameliorate the misery produced by the perpetual civil wars. In 557 he was present at the third council of Paris, at which the assembled prelates tried to devise some cure for the evils suffered by the church from the miseries and disturbances of the times. He appears to have exercised considerable influence over Childebert, though the authenticity of the charter cannot be sustained, in which that king purports to give to him and the Church of Paris the royal domain of Celles in the district of Melun. It is not unreasonable to suppose that Childebert's edict against the pagan revelry with which holy days were celebrated was due to St. Germanus (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 1121). It was no doubt, too, at his instigation that Childebert built the church of St. Vincent to receive the stole of that martyr which he had brought from Spain. (See the charter given by Aimoin, de Gest. Franc. ii. 20, ed. Jac. du Brevi, Paris, 1602, and cf. the Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 270.) This church was said to have been consecrated by St. Germanus on the day on which Childebert died (Dec. 23, 558). Childebert's successor Clotaire was, according to Venantius Fortunatus, at first not equally amenable, but a sickness changed his disposition. It was to St. Germanus that Radegund in 559 wrote Sacramentales Litteras, conjuring him to intercede for her with the king, who was on his way to take her by force from her monastery at Poitiers. Throwing himself in tears at Clotaire's feet before the shrine of St. Martin of Tours, the archbishop induced him to forego his resolve and ask the queen's pardon. In 566, at the second Council of Tours, he was one of the seven prelates who signed the letter to Radegund sanctioning rules for her monastery, and he consecrated Agnes the first abbess. In 568 Charibert was excommunicated by him for sacrilege. In 573 St. Germanus was present at the fourth Council of Paris, at which Promotus was deposed, and he subscribed the letter addressed by the council to Sigebert, with special words of entreaty of his own. In 575 when Sigebert was preparing to crush his brother Chilperic, and for this purpose had summoned to his standard the barbarians from across the Rhine, Germanus appealed in a letter to queen Brunichilde to avert the destruction which was impending over the country (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 77; cf. Ceillier, xi. 307), and when Sigebert arrived in Paris on his way to besiege Chilperic in Tournay, St. Germanus met him and prophesied his death if he persisted in seeking his brother's destruction. The assassins of Fredegund soon after verified the prediction. Germanus himself survived but a short time, dying the 28th of May. The year is not certain, being variously given as 575, 576, and 577. He was buried in an oratorium near the vestibule of the church of St. Vincent, and a metrical epitaph, ascribed to Chilperic, but not perhaps his unaided composition, was placed above his remains. (Aimoin, iii. 16; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. i. 245, Paris, 1668-1701; Gall. Christ. vii. 20.)

In some of the MSS. of Aimoin (de Gest. Franc. iii. 9, Bouquet, iii. 69, n.) there is a story, apparently without foundation, that he made a pilgrimage to the holy places at Jerusalem, and on his return visited Justinian at Constantinople, whose presents of gold and silver he refused, but gladly accepted some relics for his church of St. Vincent. This story is repeated in the Chroniques de St. Denis (liv. iii. 2, Bouquet, iii. 210-211).

In the 7th century his tomb was enriched and ornamented by St. Eligius of Noyon (Audoenus, Vita S. Eligii, i. 32, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 504), and in A.D. 754 the body was removed with great ceremony by Lantfredus, abbat of St. Vincent, from the oratory into the church itself, in the presence of Pippin and his son, Charles the Great, then a child. This church henceforth was called after him (St. Germain des Prés).

Besides the letter to Brunichilde above mentioned, there is extant by St. Germanus a treatise on the mass, or exposition of the old Gallic Liturgy (Patr. Lat. lxxii. 89; cf. Ceillier, xi. 308 seq., for the reasons for ascribing it to him). It was first published by Martene and Durand (Thesaurus Anecdotorum, v. 91). For a description and criticism of its contents see Ceillier ut supr. and the Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 312 seqq. Among his writings is also generally counted the privilege which he granted to his monastery exempting it from all episcopal jurisdiction (circ. 565). This document is mentioned by Gislemar, who lived in the 9th century (Vita S. Doctrovi, Bouquet, iii. 438), and given in full by Aimoin (de Gest. Franc. iii. 2, pp. 75-6, ed. Jacob du Brevi, Paris, 1602). Its authenticity has been vehemently attacked and defended (see Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 81 n. and the authorities there referred to). St. Germanus's life was written by Venantius Fortunatus, his contemporary and friend, but the work is infected with the worst faults of the age, and is, in fact, little else than a string of miracles. It is to be found in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. i. 234-245, Paris, 1668-1701. Besides, and more important than it are the scattered notices in Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 26, 42, 52; v. 8; ix. 39; De Glor. Conf. lxxx.; Venant. Fort. Misc. ii. 13 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 102; Gesta Reg. Franc. c. xxxiii; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. iii. 16; Vita S. Doctrovi in Bouquet, iii. 437-8; Vita S.

GERMANUS (19), bishop of Damascus, and metropolitan of the province Phoenicia Secunda. He is mentioned by Theophylactus Simocatta (lib. ii. cap. 1, 2), as having lived in the time of the emperor Maurice. He was invited to the camp of Priscus, to perform the ceremonies and services proper to Passion week and Easter, in order to calm a rebellion among the soldiers. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 863. The account given by Theophanes varies considerably, but it is less trustworthy than that of Theophylact.)

GERMANUS (20), bishop of Syracuse, c. 609. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 619.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (21), a bishop of Bologna. He is said to have succeeded Petrus, who was living A.D. 616, and to have been followed by Constantinus, but his exact date, if not his existence, is very uncertain. (Alidosi, Pont. Bologn. p. 4; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 470; Ital. Sacr. ii. 11.)

[R. S. G.]

GERMANUS (22), bishop of Dumium in 633. He signs the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633) 27th out of 62. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385; Esp. Sagr. xviii. 39.)

[M. A. W.]

GERMANUS (23), bishop of Ciumtuturbium in Africa (in what province is uncertain), at the council held in proconsular Africa A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 940 e; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 144.) It has been suggested that the name of the town may be a corruption of civ. m. Tuburbium, i.e. civitas major (or minor) Tuburbii (Victor Vitensis, p. 15, vid. Patr. Lat. lviii. note 52, 291 b).

[R. S. G.]

GERMANUS (24), bishop of Umana (Numana) near Ancona, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the heresy of the Monothelites. (Mansi, x. 866, 1163; Hefele, § 307.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (25), bishop of Tarentum, signed the second letter of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 299.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GERMANUS (26), 49th bishop of Constantinople, and patriarch, between John VI. the heretic and Anastasius I. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 235).

He was born of a noble family, about 635, in the days of the emperor Heraclius. His father, Justinian, was a Patricius, who held many of the highest offices of state, but having become involved in a scheme against the succession of Constantine Pogonatus, was executed with the other conspirators. Germanus was on the same occasion castrated for his violent conduct (Theoph. Chronog. p. 293, sub anno mundi 6160). This was about 668, so that if Germanus was born in 635 he must have been now over thirty years of age. By 680 he had risen to a leading position, for it is stated in a subsequent letter of pope Gregory II. to Leo the Isaurian that the sixth general council in that year originated in the zealous efforts of Germanus. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxix. 517 B.)

The date of his appointment to the see of Cyzicus is not known; but we learn from Theophanes (Chronog. A.C. 704, p. 320 in Pat. Gr. cviii. 771), and from Nicephorus the patriarch (De Reb. post Maur. p. 54, in Pat. Gr. c. 951 A) that he was bishop there in the reign of Philippicus, who was emperor from Dec. 711 to June 713. He is said by Theophanes and Nicephorus to have written at this time against the 6th General Council, and to have helped Philippicus in his efforts for the Monothelites. But from the letter of Gregory just referred to, and from the further testimony borne to Germanus at the second council of Nicaea in 787 (Mansi, xiii. 718 E) this accusation is scarcely probable, and it is likely that the story which reached Theophanes and Nicephorus arose among Isaurian opponents.

On June 4, 713, the Catholic Artemius or Anastasius II. received the crown of the East. In his second year, 715, August 11, he held a synod, and procured the deposition of the heterodox patriarch John VI., and the translation of the bishop of Cyzicus. Germanus must have been at this time eighty years old. How Stephanus junior, then an unborn child, through the eagerness of his mother obtained the patriarch's blessing at the ceremony of his enthronization in the great church will be related in the life of Stephanus.

Germanus signalized his first year of office by holding a synod of a hundred bishops, in which he anathematized his predecessors Sergius, Cyrus, Pyrrhus, Peter, Paul, and John, and declared for the Two Wills and Two Operations. He thus avowed himself on the side of complete orthodoxy. This Council is said to have been held during the first siege of Constantinople by the Saracens. Mansi (xii. 258) dates the council at the end of 715 or the beginning of 716.

About Jan. 716 Anastasius was dethroned by Theodosius IV., the Adramyttian. Germanus was sent with other friends of the fallen emperor to Nicaea to acquaint him with the events of the capital and the hopelessness of his cause (Theoph. 323; Niceph. 58), but does not seem to have otherwise suffered by this revolution.

The rule of Theodosius, who shewed himself a zealous Catholic, terminated in March 717. The chronology of these few ephemeral reigns is obscure, and we have followed Pagi who has investigated it. (Baron. ann. 714; Pagi, i.-vi.)

On March 25, 717, Germanus crowned Leo the Isaurian. The ceremony was performed with all the customary honours of an orthodox prince, on the demand of the new emperor himself. Leo swore that he would keep the Catholic faith undefiled in all things, and wrote to pope Gregory II. asking for communion. Germanus also wrote to the pope, assuring him of the truth of the professions of Leo.

The early years of the reign of Leo were disturbed by another siege of Constantinople by the Saracens. It is spoken of by Bede, Paul the Deacon, and Anastasius, and appears to have lasted more than a year. Three hundred thousand persons are said to have died of the plague that raged inside the walls. The Saracen fleet was at length broken up by a storm (A.D. 717), a result which was attributed to St. Mary the Mother of Jesus, and to the intercessions of Germanus, who, "though far advanced in life, was vigorous in mind, blossoming with all good deeds, renewed like an eagle in his extreme old age." This deliverance is alluded to by Gregory II. in a letter to Germanus (quoted in the fourth action of the second council of Nicaea, Mansi, xiii. 91).

In 719 and 720 Germanus officiated at the coronation of the empress Maria and at the baptism and coronation of her infant son Constantine Copronymus.

In 726 the emperor Leo began his enterprise against the worship of images, and in that year occurred the demolition of the great statue of Christ in the Chalcoptatia.

On the public declaration of Leo's plans, the aged patriarch, now over 90, called by Baronius (ann. 727, xvii.) the first Coryphaeus who raised the standard of Confession against the Iconoclasts of the East, sent a message of remonstrance. He argued that idolatry was only the worship of heathen deities, and adduced the legends of St. Veronica painting a portrait of Our Lord, of Abgarus sending for this picture, of Luke painting St. Mary.

Interviews followed. Leo appealed to Holy Scripture. "I have heard," replied Germanus, "that the holy images will be cast down, but not in your time." "Under whose reign?" asked the emperor. "That of Conon, sire," answered the patriarch. "Why, my baptismal name was really Conon," said the reformer. "Far be it, sire, from thy reign," said the aged prelate, "to work such a woe. It is the forerunner of Antichrist who shall do this thing, the destroyer of the Incarnation." Leo began now to speak with some firmness; Germanus reminded him of the oaths he had taken at his coronation. Three years passed away in what must have been on the whole a fairly amicable controversy.

Germanus wrote to pope Gregory II., giving him an account of the controversy. The letter is lost, but the reply is extant, and is of great length. He also wrote three letters to Constantine bishop of Nacolia, John archbishop of Synnada, and Thomas bishop of Claudiopolis. These remain (Pat. Lat. xcvi. 55). The anathemas pronounced by the second council of Nicaea against those who refused to worship images were taken from these letters of Germanus.

The prolonged vitality of the archbishop and his vigorous opposition to the imperial measures, supported as it was also by Gregory of Rome and John of Damascus, seem to have perplexed Leo. He did not wish to eject him, or to use force, but could not help wishing that he had to appoint a successor. He allowed Anastasius, chancellor of St. Sophia, to understand that to him the choice would fall. Anastasius was one day attending the archbishop to the palace, and neglecting to pay the due respect to his aged superior, trod on the border of his robe. "Do not be in a hurry," said the patriarch, turning round: "the day will come when you will be carried into the circus faster than you wish."

The end of the struggle now came. In January, 730, Leo summoned an assembly at his palace, determined to make a new effort. The patriarch was invited. The old man weary of the contest took off his pontifical robe, and concluded a long speech with these words: "If I am a Jonah, throw me into the sea; apart from a general council, sire, I can make no change in the faith." He retired to an estate of his family, and lived the rest of his life in prayer and silence. He was ninety-five years old at the time of his abdication, and lived rather more than three years afterwards, dying on May 12, 733.

The earliest biographical account of Germanus is a short notice in Basil's Menology under May 12, on which day he was commemorated. The letters of pope Gregory II. his contemporary, contain a few interesting passages relating to him. From these sources, and from other later writers, a memoir of the patriarch was drawn up by Henschen (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 155). Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. xi. 155) gives a list of his works, which is reprinted with annotations by Migne, and placed with the Vita by Henschen in vol. xcvi. of the Patrol. Graec.

Besides the three letters already mentioned, A Letter from the Greeks to the Armenians in Defence of the Decrees of the Council of Chalcedon is attributed with plausibility to Germanus. The Treatise on Lawful Retribution described by Photius (cod. 233) has been lost. It defended Gregory of Nyssa from those who imputed to him the doctrines of Origen. History of the Holy Councils and of the Heresies since the Preaching of the Apostles. [HERESIOLOGISTS.] This is not to be confounded with a Treatise on the Six General Councils, edited without a name by Justellus, Harduin, and Galland, and occasionally attributed to Germanus. Another work attributed by Cardinal Mai to Germanus, according to the authority of a very old MS. in the Vatican, is a Discourse on the Limit of Life, among the questions of Photius to Amphilochus. This work sets the fathers on an equality with the Apostles, especially Basil, Gregory the Theologian, and Athanasius. The mystical treatise on the ceremonies of the Liturgy is thought to be more safely attributed to Germanus II., Patriarch in the 13th century. But there is no reason why the Sermons and Hymns on the Virgin, the Presentation, the Worship of the True Cross, and others usually given among the works of Germanus I., should not be his. [W. M. S.]

GERMANUS (27)—July 7. Martyr under Trajan. Seeing a martyr, Astus, smeared with honey and stung by wasps, Germanus blessed him, for which act he was arrested with six others, and executed. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANUS, presbyter of Antioch. [GERMANUS (1).]

GERMANUS (28)—Nov. 3. Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, with Theophilus, Caesarius, and Vitalis, in the Decian persecution, A.D. 250. [CAESARIUS (4).] (Mart. Rom. Vet., Mart. Adon., Usuard., Wandalbert.; Petrus de Nat. in Catalog. lib. x. cap. 18.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANUS (29), martyr at Gerona with Paulinus, Justus, and Scicius, during Diocletian's persecution. Germanus and Paulinus are said to have been brothers, and first cousins of Justus and Scicius, who were also brothers. They all were sculptors or stone-cutters, and were put to death by Rufinus, the deputy of Dacianus, the praeses of Spain, for refusing to make images of heathen gods. On the taking of Gerona by Charlemagne their bodies were found in the church outside the walls then dedicated to the Virgin, but afterwards to St. Felix, and were translated to the cathedral. Amaldus, canon, and afterwards bishop of Gerona from about A.D. 1198 to A.D. 1216, removed their remains to a chapel he founded in their honour. The only source of our information about these saints is an apocryphal life, said to have been procured at Rome by the above-mentioned Amaldus. This life is considered by the Bollandist editors to be the work of some forger, who imposed upon the simplicity of the good canon. The names of Dacianus and Rufinus were well-known, and the part they had played in Diocletian's persecution, and the fact that the saints in question were four in number, suggested to the composer of the legend to borrow from the story of the "Quatuor Coronati" the circumstances of their having been sculptors, and having suffered martyrdom for refusing to make images of heathen gods. The same editors doubted whether they should include these Acta in the AA. SS., but finally decided to do so, and leave them to the reader's judgment. These saints are commemorated on June 8. (Boll. AA. SS. June, ii. 58; J. T. Salazar, Mart. Hisp. iii. 463; Esp. Sagr. xliii. 272.) [F. D.]

GERMANUS (30)—Oct. 23. A martyr in Spain with Servandus, under the president Viator, during the Diocletian persecution. Germanus was buried at Emerita (Merida) near St. Eulalia. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANUS (31)—Nov. 13. A martyr in Palestine with Antoninus and Zebinas, A.D. 308. (Eusebius, de Mart. Palaest. c. 9; Bas. Men. i. 196.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANUS (32), a presbyter of Constantinople, one of Chrysostom's most faithful adherents. He was one of the deputation who conveyed to the council of the Oak the reply of Chrysostom himself and that of the assembled bishops. (Pallad. Dial. pp. 13, 70.) After the conflagration of the cathedral, he with Cassian the deacon, as custodians of the treasury, drew up an inventory of the goods of the church Chrysostom had been accused of confiscating. In A.D. 405 he and Cassian were the bearers of a letter to pope Innocent from the clergy and laity of Constantinople describing the violent deposition and expulsion of Chrysostom and the persecutions to which his friends were still exposed (ib. p. 27; Soz. H. E. viii. 26; Innoc. Pap. Epp. 7, 10, in Pat. Lat. xx. 501 note 5, 512; Chrysostom's first ep. to Innocent, § 2, in Pat. Gr. lii. 531). He was a very intimate friend and probably a relation of Cassian, whom he accompanied in his travels in Egypt and elsewhere. So great was their attachment to one another that they were said to have one soul in two bodies. Germanus's name frequently occurs in the Conferences of Cassian. (Joann. Cassian. Collat. var. loc. esp. i.

1, 9, where see notes by Gazaena, in Pat. Lat. xlix. 483, 493; Ceillier, viii. 147, &c.) [E. V. and I. G. S.]

GERMANUS (33), April 29, presbyter; martyr at Alexandria. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 426.) [G. T. S.]

GERMANUS (34), deacon, who with Memnon, the keeper of the sacred vessels, and the priest Epiphanius, was sent by the council of Constantinople, A.D. 448, to convey their third citation to Eutyches to appear before the council. (Mansi, vi. 496 n.) [F. D.]

GERMANUS (35), presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, who subscribed by the hand of the deacon Glycerius the deposition of Eutyches, at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 448 (Labbe, iv. 232). He appears also among the orthodox archimandrites, who appealed to the emperor Marcian against the Eutychians in A.D. 451. [FAUSTUS (28).] [C. G.]

GERMANUS (36), brother of St. Gihbrian, a Scot, one of the many Christian teachers attracted to Rheims by the fame of St. Remigius, the bishop. Colgan says he flourished in the year 509. (Colgan, Acta SS. 232 n. 2, 271, c. 1; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 15; Dempster, Hist. Ecc. Gent. Scot. i. 301, 303.) [J. G.]

GERMANUS (37), nephew of the emperor Justinian I., and addressed as "vir illustrissimus" during the lifetime of Justinus I. by pope Hormisdas, when he wrote to him in A.D. 519, and recommended to his good offices three papal legates, the bishops Helias, Thomas, and Nicestratus (Mansi, Conc. viii. 473-4, epp. 60, 61). But he appears to have been little mixed up with the church's history. [J. G.]

GERMANUS (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 137), teacher of St. Columba. [GERMANUS.] [J. G.]

GERMANUS (38), prior of Westminster. He is said, in the legendary history of Westminster, to have succeeded Ordbriht, the first abbat, with the title of prior, in the year 616 (Sporley, MS. Hist. West. Mon. Angl. i. 266). The whole list of these early abbats is mere fabrication. [S.]

GERMANUS (39), abbat of Grandivalle or Münsterthal in Alsace, and martyr, in the 7th century. He was a native of Treves, where his father Optardus was of senatorial rank. In his youth he was educated by Modocaldus, bishop of Treves (cir. 625). When grown up he distributed his property to the poor and sought out bishop Arnulphus, then living as a hermit in the desert of Horenberg, who gave him the tonsure and sent him to the monastery of St. Romaric, then called Castellum and afterwards Herrenberg on the summit of the mountains. After residing here for a time he went in company with a Burgundian named Chuanes to the monastery of Luxovium (Luxeuil) in the Vosges mountains, where Waldebert was then abbat. Waldebert having built a monastery upon an estate which he named Grandis Vallis, given him by Gundonius dux of Alsace, placed Germanus over it. After a time Gundonius was succeeded in his honours by Bonifacius or Cathicus, who oppressed the monastery, devastated its lands, and ill-used the tenantry. Germanus remonstrated, for which he was set upon by the tyrant's marauders and murdered. He was commemorated on Feb. 21. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 264.) [C. H.]

GERMARUS, abbat. [GEREMARUS.]

GERMERIUS, ST., May 16, eighth in the list of the bishops of Toulouse, succeeding Heraclianus, and followed by Magnulfus, early in the 6th century. According to the apocryphal Acta, purporting to be by Pretiosus, his contemporary and comrade, he was born at Angoulême, or, according to another reading, Jerusalem. Upon the conquest of Toulouse by Clovis, in 507 or 508, and consequent establishment of the orthodox faith, he settled in that city, and was ordained subdeacon, and deacon, by Gregory, bishop of Saintes, and finally consecrated bishop of the diocese by Tornoaldus, with the approbation of Clovis, signified by an invitation to his palace and gifts to the church of Toulouse. Upon his death, after fifty years passed in the episcopate, he was buried at Doz, where a monastery was afterwards built and called by his name. His remains were said to have been in later times translated to the church of St. James, at Murellum, or Muretum, on the Garonne. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 591; Gall. Christ. xiii. 7.) [S. A. B.]

GERMINATOR. [GENIALIS.]

GERMINTIUS (1), bishop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of the Hellespontine province, who was translated to Sirmium in Pannonia by the emperor Constantius, A.D. 356 (Athan. H. Arian. 407). He belonged to the Arian party, and was the joint composer with Valens, Mark of Aréthusa, and George of Alexandria of the third Sirmian creed, drawn up in his episcopal city, sometimes called the "dated creed" because its heading recites the consuls for the year and the day of the month, May 22, 359, which provoked the sarcasm of Athanasius (de Synod. 8). At the council of Ariminum, in the same year, his creed was produced and read, but was indignantly rejected by the supporters of the Nicene faith, who deposed Germinius along with the other leaders of the Arians and semi-Arians, declaring them enemies and disturbers of the church, and wrote a letter to Constantius telling him what they had done. (Socrates, H. E. ii. 37; Soz. I. E. iv. 15; Le Quien, O. C. i. 749.) [L. D.]

GERMINTIUS (2). The eighteenth sermon of St. Gaudentius bishop of Brescia, according to the common reading, is addressed to a person of this name, and this is the reading adopted by Ceillier (Auteurs sacrés, viii. 41). Migne's edition (Patr. Lat. xx. 971) prefers the reading Germinius, and mentions that one MS. reads Germinius. Gaudentius praises him as a person who was well acquainted both with profane and sacred learning. The subject of the letter is an explanation of the parable of the Unjust Steward, which Germinius had requested Gaudentius to give him, as he had been unable to find any satisfactory interpretation of it. The precise date of Gaudentius's episcopate is uncertain, but it is probable that it extended from about A.D. 386 to A.D. 410. [F. D.]

GERMOCHUS, ST., an Irish chief who accompanied St. Breaca (Vol. I. p. 833) to Cornwall in the middle of the 5th century. The parish of Germoe is next to Breage, and they are united parishes. There is a holy well in the parish, and a building called king Germoe's throne, which may have taken the place of an earlier one. William of Worcester gives St. Germoe's day as June 24 (p. 107, ed. Nasmith). [C. W. B.]

GEROBOLDUS. [GOBALDUS.]

GEROCH succeeded St. Willibald as bishop of Eichstätt in A.D. 786. He is said to have given to his cathedral a golden chalice and a jewelled case of gold for keeping the Gospels in. The date of his death is given as Feb. 2, A.D. 801. Popp however (Anfang des Christenthumes in Süd Deutschlands, 225) points out that the dates of the five bishops who followed St. Willibald are doubtful. The Liber Pontificalis of Gundekar, the source of the early history of the diocese of Eichstätt, states their episcopates lasted one hundred years, and later writers divided this period into five nearly equal parts, assigning one to each bishop, and it is in this way the date of A.D. 801 for Geroch's death is arrived at. (Potthast, Bibl. Suppl. p. 311; Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae, ix. 243, 256.) [F. D.]

GEROLDUS, fortieth bishop of Mentz, succeeding Richbertus or Rigobertus. According to a quotation in the Gall. Christ. from Merseus, he was a man of wisdom and capacity, able in the transaction of business, but civil rather than ecclesiastical, of distinguished personal appearance, undaunted courage, and great magnanimity, but fonder of the life of courts than of the services of the church, for which he cared little or not at all. He was killed in battle by the Saxons in one of Carloman's campaigns (A.D. 743), and was succeeded by his son Gewilib, who avenged his father's death and was deposed at the second council of Germany. [GEWILIBIS.] (S. Bonifacii Vita, lib. i. cap. 37; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 652; Gall. Christ. v. 437.) In the Gallia Christiana he also appears among the bishops of Worms (v. 663). [S. A. B.]

GERONCIUS (THERONCIUS), bishop of Assido (Medina Sidonia, or Xerxe de la Fontera (Esp. Sagr. x. 15, Cortes y Lopez, Dicc. Geogr. Hist. de la España Antigua), from about A.D. 690 onwards. He subscribed the acts of the sixteenth Council of Toledo, A.D. 693. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333; Esp. Sagr. x. 60.) [RUFINUS.] [M. A. W.]

GERONTIUS. See also GERUNTIUS.

GERONTIUS (1) (LEONTIUS), bishop of Larissa in Syria Secunda, south of Apamea. He was one of the fifteen bishops who took part in the synod of Neo-Caesarea, c. A.D. 315, held shortly after that of Ancyra, and attended by nearly the same persons. Considerable doubts have been cast upon the real date, and even the existence, of this synod; however, the record in the Libellus Synodicus (Mansi, ii. 551) contains several important differences. (Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. 210; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, ii. 640; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 917.) He subscribed also, according to some MSS., the canons of the council of Nice in A.D. 325.

Other MSS. read Leontius, but Gams (Series Episc. 436) prefers the former reading. (Mansi ii. 547, 694, 698.) [J. de S. and F. D.]

GERONTIUS (2), bishop of Come-Charran (Charra) in the province of Phoenicia Secunda, north-east of Damascus. He was one of the bishops who attended the first general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 694; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 849.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS of Barium. [GERVASIUS (2).]

GERONTIUS (3), bishop of Raphanea in Syria Secunda, south of Apamea. His name appears among the signatures at the synod of Philippopolis, A.D. 344, where his see is written erroneously "Lamphania." (Mansi, iii. 139; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 921.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS (4). Amongst the subscriptions to the canons of the Sardican council, 347, is found "Gerontius a Macedonia de Brebi," and "de Brevi," corrupt readings that, in all probability, should be altered to Berrhoea, or perhaps it should stand Dobero. Doberus was a town in Macedonia, of which two bishops are mentioned. (Mansi, iii. 39, 41; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 71, 77; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. vol. vii. "St. Athanase," note 50; Gams, Series Episc. 429.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (5), bishop of Tomi, or Constantiana (the modern Kustendji), in Scythia Minor, present at the council of Constantinople, 381 (Mansi, iii. 572); in the law of Theodosius, issued to Auxonius, proconsular of Asia, he is called Terentius bishop of Scythia. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1213.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (6), bishop of Claudiopoli, the metropolis of the province of Honorias, present at the synod at Constantinople under Nectarius, A.D. 394. (Mansi, iii. 852; Le Quien, O. C. i. 569.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (7), bishop of Nicomedia, metropolitan of Bithynia, "a singular specimen of an ecclesiastical adventurer." He had been a deacon at Milan during the episcopate of Ambrose, whose grave displeasure he incurred by publishing a ridiculous story of an Empusa, or spectre with asses' legs (δυσσεύς), by which he asserted he had been attacked by night. Gerontius set at nought Ambrose's injunction to remain in seclusion for a year and pass his time in penitence, and repaired to Constantinople, where his skill in medicine, aided by a plausible address and popular manners, gained him favour with persons of power at the imperial court, through whose instrumentality he obtained the metropolitan see of Nicomedia. He was consecrated by Helladius, bishop of Caesarea, and exarch of Pontus, for whose son Gerontius's court influence had procured a high appointment in the army. Ambrose, on hearing of Gerontius's elevation to the episcopate, wrote to Nectarius, the bishop of Constantinople, demanding his deposition. The emperor, however, had speedily managed to get so completely with the people that the intelligence of Ambrose's deposition was resisted, which Gerontius was enabled to resist. He was assisted with power, speedily employed it to rid the church of so great a scandal. Gerontius was deposed, and Pansophius, formerly tutor to the empress Eudoxia, was consecrated in his room. The loss of their favourite bishop gave great umbrage to the Nicomedians. They rose in open sedition, and extolled both in public and private the excellences of Gerontius, and the benefits both rich and poor had derived from his medical skill. Both at Nicomedia and also at Constantinople, to which they sent deputations, the people paraded the streets singing litanies, as in the time of some great public calamity. Chrysostom stood firm, and compelled Gerontius to retire. The Nicomedians parted from him with great reluctance, and shewed the utmost aversion to his pious and gentle successor. The deposition of Gerontius was one of the charges brought against Chrysostom at the council of the Oak (Soz. H. E. viii. 6; Photius, Cod. 59, p. 60; Le Quien, O. C. i. 588.) [E. V.]

GERONTIUS (8), a Macedonian bishop. Two letters of pope Innocent I. are addressed to him. The first names twenty-two other bishops along with him, is dated Dec. 13, A.D. 414, and is in reply to letters sent by the bishops to the pope by the archdeacon Vitalis. The questions it chiefly deals with are whether the clergy might marry widows; whether if a man whose wife had died before he had been baptized had married again, he should be considered to have married twice; and how those ordained by heretics, and especially by Bonosus, were to be treated? The second is addressed to him with six others "episcopis per Macedoniam constitutis," and relates to the case of Bubalius and Taurianus, who had been condemned by the Macedonian bishops. (S. Innocentii Epist. 15 and 18, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 526, 557; Ceillier, Histoire des Aut. sacr. vii. 574.) [BONOSUS.] Gerontius is one of the ten orthodox bishops of Macedonia to whom, with Anysius, a letter of Chrysostom is addressed. (Chrys. Epist. 163, in Migne, Patr. Graec. lii. 706.) [ANYSIUS.] [F. D.]

GERONTIUS (9), bishop of Claudiopoli in Isauria, on the Calycadnus. He was present at the first meeting of the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and signed the protest against the commencement of its deliberations in the absence of John of Antioch. (Mansi, iv. 1270; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1027.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS (10), bishop of Basilinopolis in Bithynia, present at the synod held at Constantinople by Flavian, A.D. 448 (Mansi, vi. 757), and also at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451; he is probably the bishop referred to by Anastasius of Nicaea at the 13th session as having been consecrated by his predecessor at Nicaea, and so claimed as his suffragan. (Mansi, vii. 305; Le Quien, O. C. i. 625.) [L. D.]

GERONTIUS (11), bishop of Salencia Pieria in Syria, present at the Ephesine Latrocinium, A.D. 449, and two years later at the council of Chalcedon. He also signed the synodical epistle of his province addressed to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458, referring to the murder of Proterius at Antioch, and also the encyclical of Gennadius against the simoniacs. (Mansi, vi. 914; Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 1620; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 779.) [J. de S.]

GERONTIUS (12), bishop of Arcadiopolis, a town unknown in the province of Asia; at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, his name was subscribed in his absence to the definition of the faith by Hesperius of Pitane at the instance of Stephen of Ephesus. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 711.)

GERONTIUS (13), bishop of Milan, probably c. A.D. 465. He succeeded Eusebius, and was followed by Benignus, but the dates are not precisely ascertained, Gerontius being placed by different authorities at various periods between A.D. 462 and 479. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 78; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 110.)

[R. S. G.]

GERONTIUS, bishop of Camerinum (Camerino). [HIERONYMUS.]

[R. S. G.]

GERONTIUS (14), bishop of Fidenae, present at the third Roman synod under pope Symmachus, Oct. 501, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who accepts with a slight alteration the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 252.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GERONTIUS (15), bishop of Cervia (Ficodensis), near Ravenna, martyred c. 501. (Acta Sanct. Boll. 9 Mai. ii. 461.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GERONTIUS of Bologna. [GERARDUS (1).]

GERONTIUS (16), a bishop to whom Ennodius bishop of Pavia, from A.D. 511 to A.D. 521, addresses a poem (Ennod. Carm. lib. ii. 55, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 350). In it he praises Gerontius, saying that his predecessor had no reason to fear death when he knew he would have such a successor.

[F. D.]

GERONTIUS (17), a presbyter living as a solitary, whom in 405 Chrysostom prevailed upon to undertake missionary work among the pagan inhabitants of Phoenicia. He was anxious to visit Chrysostom at Cucusus on the way to the scene of his labours; but Chrysostom advised him to proceed straight to Phoenicia as he had already lost time by illness, and he might be detained by winter which was approaching. It is evident that Gerontius was relinquishing his life of solitary contemplation with a reluctance which Chrysostom endeavoured to overcome by enlarging upon the greater glory and higher reward of the active exertions for the souls of others on which he was about to enter. Constantius, he informed him, had orders to supply him with necessary funds for building, and the relief of those in want, and he urged instant despatch. (Chrysost. Epist. 53, 54.)

[E. V.]

GERONTIUS (18), priest of Constantinople, deposed in company with Celopodius (q. v.), as a Eutychian heretic, by the archbishop Anatolius in A.D. 451 (Labbe, iv. 522 D). Some one of the same name appears among the Eutychians, headed by Charosus, who, claiming to be archimandrites, appealed to the emperor Marcian in the same year asking for a general council (Labbe, iv. 524). The orthodox archimandrites however in the council of Chalcedon did not recognise this Gerontius whether as archimandrite or as anything else, stating Γερώντιον οὐκ ὀνομαζόμενον. (Labbe, iv. 518.)

[C. G.]

GERONTIUS (19), bearer of two letters from Julian bishop of Cos to pope Leo (Leo. Mag. Epp. 140, 1295; 141, 1296, Migne) in the end of A.D. 454, or the beginning of 455; also carried letters from Leo the pope in September 457 to the emperor Leo (Ep. 148 of Ep. 158, 1328) and at the same time to Julian and to Aetius, presbyter of Constantinople (Epp. 152, 153; 1314, 1315).

[C. G.]

GERONTIUS (20), archimandrite, to whom Theodoret wrote, thanking him for his letters which expressed the piety of his soul, and his active services on his behalf, and asking for his prayers. (Theodoret, Epist. 50.)

GERONTIUS (21), archimandrite of Palestine towards the middle of the 5th century, successor of Melania in the government of her convent at Jerusalem, which he held for 45 years. He was a resolute Eutychian, and attached himself to Theodosius the intruding bishop of Jerusalem, refusing to communicate with Juvenal the legitimate prelate. He was sent by Theodosius, together with Elpidius another archimandrite, to Euthymius the celebrated solitary, to invite him to a conference with the view of settling their doctrinal differences. This invitation was indignantly rejected by the aged anchorite, whose words convinced Elpidius of his errors, but failed to have any effect on Gerontius (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthym. §§ 74, 76). He was equally deaf to the exhortations of the empress Eudocia, who, after an interview with Euthymius, had renounced the doctrines of Eutyches, and by her conversion had led many to adopt the Catholic faith (ibid. 86). When the rest of the schismatic monks (apochistae) had been prevailed upon by Martyrius, soon after his accession to the episcopal throne, A.D. 478, to return to the unity of the church, Gerontius and Romanus of Thekoa alone remained obstinate. For this they were expelled from their monasteries, and passed the remainder of their days as homeless wanderers in great misery (ibid. 124).

GERONTIUS (22), a turbulent Eutychian monk, whom the schismatic party at Jerusalem elected as their president (ἀρχιμανδρίτης) after the flight of Theodosius the intruding bishop of that see, c. 476, who is stated to have been guilty of as many acts of violence and homicide as Theodosius himself (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthym. § 113). He seems to be different from Gerontius, St. Melania's successor. (Cf. Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. vol. xvi.; Acace de C. P. n. ix.)

[E. V.]

GERONTIUS (23) (GERAINT), son of Erbin, and king of Damnonia, killed A.D. 508 (or 530) at the battle of Llongborth, perhaps near Lyme Regis, fighting against Cerdic. (Lapenberg, i. 108, transl.; Nash, Talesin, 328; Rees, Welsh Saints, 113, 169, 232.) He was perhaps called a saint from his being killed in battle against the pagan Saxons. His pedigree is given under CONSTANTINUS, ST., Vol. I. 660. The celebrated elegy on him is attributed to Ilywarch Hên and he is the hero of the second Mabinogi, which Tennyson has followed in his Idyll.

[C. W. B.]

GERONTIUS (24) (GERAINT), king of Cornwall, died A.D. 596 at Din-gerein, the round

fort existing in the parish of St. Gerrans, near St. Just in Roseland, east of Falmouth Harbour. (Leland, and Earle's Saxon Chronicle, 290.) In the life of St. Teilo it is said that the saint on his way from Wales to Brittany, at the time of the yellow death, visited king Gerennius and promised to come back to him before his death, which was seven years and seven months afterwards. (Liber Landavensis, 102, 107.) The king was probably canonized by the popular voice. The feast day of this parish was on Aug. 10, and is now on the second Sunday in August. (Whitaker, Cathedral of Cornwall, i. 202, 293, 303; ii. 17.) [C. W. B.]

GERONTIUS (25), the accuser of Lampetius. (Photius, Cod. 52.) [EUCHITES.] [G. S.]

GERONTIUS (26), abbas, presiding over the monastery of St. Euthymius in Palestine, who related to John Moschus the following story. One day he was ascending the mountains on the other side of the Dead Sea, in company with two other anchorets, when they observed at a distance another anchoret walking on the shore. They saw some Saracens pass him, one of whom presently turned back and decapitated him. As Gerontius and his companions were deploring the dead, they suddenly beheld a bird swoop down from the sky, carry the Saracen up in the air, let him drop, and kill him. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 21, in Pat. Lat. lxxiv. 129.) [C. H.]

GERRIG, Welsh saint. [GERRIG.]

GERTRUDIS (1), ST., first abbess of Nivelles in Brabant, daughter of Pippin of Landen, the first of the three Pippins, mayor of the palace under Clothaire II., Dagobert I., and Sigebert II. Landen, the home of the family and the birthplace of Gertrude, was about twenty miles west of Tongres and some forty miles north-east of Nivelles. Pippin and Iduberga or Itta his wife, who were afterwards honoured as saints, had three children: Grimoald who succeeded his father; St. Begga, mother of Pippin of Heristal and foundress of the monastery of Anden, and Gertrude, the youngest. Gertrude shewed her vocation to a religious and celibate life at a very early age, by her refusal, more decided than courteous, of an offer of marriage made to her by Dagobert I. on behalf of a young nobleman then present. This must have happened in 625. On the death of Pippin in 639 Itta, by the advice of the bishop St. Amandus, built a large double monastery at Niviuola (Nivelles) on land belonging to herself and Gertrude. She made her daughter abbess, and passed the rest of her life as a nun under her rule, helping her with advice and sympathy. It was Gertrude's great delight to receive pilgrims and religious travellers, and entertain them hospitably; she often procured relics or sacred books by their means from Rome or elsewhere, or got them to teach her and her nuns hymns or portions of Scripture, of which she was so fond that she is said to have learnt nearly the whole of the Bible by heart in the course of her life. With the assistance of her mother, she gave an estate at Fosse or Mors les Fossez to the Irish monks, SS. Foillan and Ultan, that they might build a monastery there, to be a perpetual place of reception for pilgrims and travellers journeying that way; she gave them all that was needful for the work, and when it was finished Ultan took the government of it, and Foillan returned to Nivelles to teach psalmody to the nuns, and be useful to Gertrude in many ways. Twelve years after the death of Pippin, and five from the time that Gertrude became abbess, Iduberga died.

Gertrude then chose a few of the best qualified of her monks and nuns to help her in managing the affairs of the community. Nevertheless she soon found herself overburdened by the duties and responsibilities of her office. She was about the age of thirty when she resigned her post to her niece Wulfetrude, who was twenty, and had been brought up from childhood under the care of her saintly aunt and grandmother. She lived three years in increased asceticism and constant devotion, and died at the age of thirty-three, about 659 or 664; Baronius and Henschenius give the earlier date, Mabillon the later. She is one of eleven holy women named Gertrudis venerated by the Benedictines as belonging to their order, four of whom lived in the 7th century, and one in the time of Charlemagne. She seems to have been regarded during her life as a person of supernatural holiness, and to have been worshipped as a saint very soon after her death; a church was dedicated in her name in the next generation by Agnes, third abbess of Nivelles, whom she had brought up with St. Wulfetrude. All biographies of this saint are based on one by a contemporary monk, who had some of the facts from herself, and the others from eye-witnesses. It is given in full by Mabillon (AA. SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. 464), part of it is in Bouquet (iii. 517, De Dagoberto). She is mentioned in the life of B. Peppin, the duke (Bouquet, ii. 603; AA. SS. Bolland. Feb. iii. 260; Duchesne, Script. i. 594). The accounts of her endowment of the Irish monks and of her death are given at considerable length in the life of St. Ultan (AA. SS. Bolland. May i. 118). She is also incidentally mentioned in most of the biographies and chronicles of her time collected by Bouquet, and generally with some epithet indicating her reputation for sanctity. Her name is in the martyrology of Bede, and in the metrical one attributed to him, and in the modern Roman Martyrology, on the 17th of March. She appears also in the martyrology of Usuard, and in the Additamenta to that of Ado.

She is patron saint of travellers, pilgrims, cats, of several towns in the Netherlands, against fever and against damage by rats and mice, especially the out of door sorts. She is represented with rats and mice at her feet, or running up her pastoral staff, or on her dress.

[A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (2), ST., abbess of Hamay. Her parentage is not recorded. By her husband Rigomar she became the mother of Gerberta, and perhaps also of Sigfrid. When a widow, Gertrude built the abbey of Hamay on the Scarp, very near that of Marchiennes, founded by Rictrude, the wife of her grandson Adalbald. She adopted her great-granddaughter Ennebia, daughter of Adalbald, and made her her heiress and successor. St. Gertrude died about A.D. 649 or 655, and was honoured Dec. 6. The chief authority for her is the Life of St. Rictrude (Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. 984, ed. 1669; Boll. Acta SS. 12 Mai. iii. pp. 87 c, 101 f, 154 b). [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (3), virgin and martyr of Valduletum (Vauxdiuellet) in the country afterwards called Lorraine. Her feast immediately followed Ascension Day. She was the daughter of a heathen prince of Brabant, and embraced Christianity without her father's knowledge. He wished to marry her to another pagan prince, but she refused, having determined upon a celibate life. She fled into the wilderness, but was followed and murdered by her brothers at Belval. She is reputed to have been the niece of Gertrude, abbess of Nivelles (No. 1), and if so, she belongs to the 7th century; but there is not much reliance to be placed upon her Life. (Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vii. 515.) [G. T. S.]

GERTRUDIS (4), ST. (CEBETRUDE, CEBEDRUDE, GEBERTRUDE, GEBETRUDE, TECTA, TETTA), third abbess of the double monastery of Habend, afterwards Remiremont, in the 7th century, succeeding Gegoberga. [GEGOBERGA.] In Mabillon's Observationes praeviae to the Life of St. Gertrude of Nivelles (Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. 462, ed. 1669), the Gertrude of this article is called first abbess of Habend; but she was in fact third abbess, as appears from the Life of St. Amatus (Mab. ut supra, 129, 133), that of St. Romaric (p. 415 et seq.), and that of St. Adelphius (p. 602 et seq.). She succeeded St. Cecilia, otherwise Clara or Gegoberga, and was followed by St. Perpetua, according to Mabillon's Observationes praeviae to the Lives of St. Romaric and St. Adelphius. It is recorded of this abbess that she went out with candles, crosses, and music, at the head of a procession to meet the funeral of St. Adelphius, the third and contemporary abbat of the male side of the community, who had died at Luxeuil, but was brought back to be buried at Habend. [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (5), ST., nun at Blangy in Artois, eldest of five daughters of Sigfrid son of Rigomar. Her mother was St. Bertha, foundress and first abbess of Blangy. About A.D. 682, Ruodgarius, a great man of the court, tried to insist on Gertrude's marrying him although she had taken the veil, and he refused to leave the monastery without seeing her. St. Bertha having allowed him to see her as she stood at the altar singing with the other nuns and dressed like them, told him that if he dared to carry off the bride of Christ he might do so. Ruodgarius did not dare. The authority for this story is a Life of St. Bertha written in the 11th century, given at length in Boll. Acta SS. 4 Jul. ii. 52, the bulk of it being, as observed by Bouquet (Recueil, iii. 621) and Duchesne (Script. Franc. i. 665), silly and fabulous. [A. B. C. D.]

GERTRUDIS (6), ST., of Neustadt. There is a legend that Gertrude, alleged to have been a sister of Charlemagne, fled from his court to become a nun, and founded a church at Neustadt and a monastery at Carleburg, both near Würzburg in Franconia. The Bollandists, as Mabillon observes, leave no stone unturned to discover anything about this saint, but come to the conclusion that Charlemagne had no sister Gertrude, and that all trustworthy accounts of the saint whose cloak was kept in veneration at Neustadt, are hopelessly lost, the monastery having been sacked by the mob in 1525, and the books and documents destroyed. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. iii. pars i. 718, ed. 1672, Life of St. Burchard of Würzburg and introduction to Life of St. Gertrude of Nivelles; Boll. Acta SS. 17 Mart. ii. 601, notes to St. Gertrude of Nivelles.) [A. B. C. D.]

GERULPHUS—Sept. 21. Murdered about the middle of the 8th century, at Truncinium (Dronghesse) in Flanders, when returning from a confirmation held by Eliseus bishop of Noyon. His life was written in the 10th century by a Belgian monk, who inveighs against his father because he left unfulfilled his son's bequests to the church. Gerulphus was buried by his father at his birthplace, a village called Merendra, whence, on Oct. 8, 915, his relics were translated with great pomp to Dronghesse. In 1030 all the relics in Flanders were gathered to Oudenarde, in Western Flanders, and borne in solemn procession, to secure peace, when his body, as being that of a Flemish martyr, took the first place. (Molani, Nat. SS. Belg.; Acta SS. Boll. Sept. vi. 250–270.) [G. T. S.]

GERUNTIUS (1). Among the works attributed to St. Jerome is a letter addressed to the daughters of Geruntius. Their father had inserted in his will a clause disinheriting them on account of their devoting themselves to chastity, and their love of religion, and the letter is an answer to their inquiries as to what they should do. The writer advises them not to appeal to the secular judge, and exhorts them, if they have offended Geruntius for Christ's sake, to persevere in offending him. For if Christ is the cause of offence, the disinheriting clause of their impious father's will is a reason for joy and not for grief. It appears probable that the author of this letter was the presbyter Eutropius, who is stated by Gennadius (de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis, c. 49, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 1087), to have written two letters to two sisters who had been disinherited by their parents for their devotion to religion, in which he supported his position not only by arguments but by numerous quotations from Scripture, a description which agrees with the letter ascribed to St. Jerome. This letter was written about A.D. 400, as it speaks of St. Paulinus of Nola's retirement from the world, which took place about A.D. 395, as a recent event (S. Hieronymi Opera, xi. Ep. 2, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxx. 45; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, vii. 647). [F. D.]

GERUNTIUS (2), a presbyter of the Capadocian Caesarea, to whom Firmus his bishop wrote, expressing his regret that he should have been detained so long from his duties, and especially those of the Easter Festival, by sickness, and gently reminding him that now that his indisposition had yielded, and only delicacy of health remained, he should return as soon as he could. Firmus thanks him for his Easter gifts to his table, two brace of partridges, half a home-fed pig, as big as a wild boar, and an amphora of wine, as well as a pair of young colts. (Firmus, Epist. 10.) [E. V.]

GERUNTIUS (3), abbat, with another named Chalcedonius, over the twin abbeys,

Viviers and Castel, of the monastery founded by Cassiodorus. They appear to have been the first abbats, but it is not said to which of the houses they respectively belonged (Ceillier, i. 238). Cassiodorus gives his abbats excellent advice for the higher training of their monks. He bids them especially to exercise hospitality, to succour the poor, to instruct the country people in good manners, and in the way of salvation; to study the Holy Scriptures and the commentaries of the doctors, the lives of the fathers, and the Acts of the saints; to mortify their passions, and to believe all that they ought. (Cassiod. Inst. Div. Lit. cap. 32, in Patr. Lat. lxx. 1147.)

[C. H.]

GERUNTIUS (4), king of Damnonia, to whom Aldhelm, abbat of Malmesbury, wrote, A.D. 705, at the request of a synod, respecting the time of keeping Easter, and the mode of making the tonsure. The letter was addressed, "Domino gloriosissimo, occidentalis regni sceptrum gubernanti, Geruntio Regi, simulque cunctis Dei sacerdotibus per Domnoniam conversantibus" (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 268: see above, v. ALDHELM, i. 78, and Malmesbury's Gesta Pontificum, v. § 215, p. 361), and it had the desired effect. Gerontius reigned at least till A.D. 710, for in that year the Saxon Chronicle says, "Ine and Nun, his kinsman, fought against Gerente, king of the Welsh." That the Celtic chronicles preserved no account of this important chief of the West Britons, under whom the schism was healed, proves the truth of Nennius's words, "I have endeavoured to write some extracts which the broken spirit (hebetudo) of the British nation had cast away, for the teachers of that island, Britain, have had no knowledge, nor have they set down any memorial in books." They had no heart to chronicle the misfortunes of their nation. (See Haigh in Yorkshire Archaeol. Journal, 1877, iv. 446.) Ine's humane laws, about A.D. 690, shew that the English had been conciliating their Celtic subjects. Perhaps Glastonbury, which was taken before 658, was the first Christian church that the conquerors spared, and it thus became a meeting-point for the traditions of the two races. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 164.) Probably two bishops of the Cornish church joined with Wini, the English bishop of Wessex, in consecrating Ceadda to York, A.D. 664. (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 124.)

GERVASIUS (1), June 19 (Us.); Oct. 14, (Bae. Menol.). Martyr with Protasius at Milan, under Nero. Their history is very curious. They were two brothers, the sons of Vitalis, whose martyrdom at Ravenna and mythical acts are recorded in Mart. Adon. April 28. After 300 years, and when their memory had entirely faded from among men, God is said to have revealed their place of burial to St. Ambrose in a dream. [AMBROSIUS.] The empress Justina was striving to obtain possession of one of the churches of Milan for Arian worship, and help was needed to sustain the orthodox in their opposition to the imperial authority. Just at this time a new and splendid basilica was awaiting consecration. The people, as a kind of orthodox demonstration, wished it consecrated with the same pomp and ceremonial as had been used in the case of another new church near the Roman Gate. To this St. Ambrose consented, on condition that he should have some new relics to place therein. He therefore ordered excavations to be made in the church of St. Nabor and St. Felix, near the rails which enclosed their tomb. Very soon their labours were rewarded by the discovery of the bodies of "two men of wondrous size, such as ancient times produced" (Amb. Ep. xxii. § 2), with all their bones entire and very much blood. They were removed to the church of St. Fausta, and on the next day to the new Ambrosian church, where they were duly enshrined. At each different stage St. Ambrose delivered impassioned and fanciful harangues. In that pronounced on the occasion of their enshrinement, he claims that they had already expelled demons, and restored to sight a blind butcher, one Severus, who was cured by merely touching the pall that covered the sacred relic. The Arians on the other hand ridiculed the matter, asserting that Ambrose had hired persons to feign themselves demoniacs. The whole story has afforded copious matter for criticism. Mosheim (cent. iv. pt. ii. c. 3, sect. 8), Gibbon (c. xxvii.), Isaac Taylor (Ancient Christianity, vol. ii. 242-272), consider the thing a trick got up by the contrivance and at the expense of St. Ambrose himself. Taylor, indeed, in the lengthened passage just cited, discusses the action of the archbishop in the most merciless manner. There are two distinct points which demand attention. 1st, the finding of the bodies; 2nd, the reputed miracles. All the hostile critics seem to consider the discovery of the bodies either a miracle or a trick. This dilemma is not, however, exhaustive. The churches were very frequently built in cemeteries, and a chance excavation in any of them might easily be rewarded by a discovery of two bodies. Then, again, some have fixed the Diocletian persecution as the time of their martyrdom. St. Ambrose, as the official custodian of the church records, might therefore have some knowledge of their resting-place, and in times of intense theological excitement, we know how very often and how very easily men have imputed to dreams or supernatural assistance that for which, under calmer circumstances, they would account in a more commonplace way. Indeed, it is hardly possible to read through the epistle of St. Ambrose to his sister Marcellina (Ep. xxii.), in which he gives an account of the discovery of the relics, and still imagine that such genuine enthusiasm could go hand in hand with conscious knavery and deceit. There remains, however, the question of the miracles, which St. Ambrose and St. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, xxii. 8; Confess. ix. 7; Ser. 286 and 318) testify were wrought by the relics. These miracles were of two distinct kinds: the restoration of demoniacs, and the healing of a blind man. As to the case of the demoniacs, we cannot decide either way. At times of religious excitement cases akin to such cures have occurred and can be accounted for on purely natural grounds. In any case they belong to an obscure region of psychological phenomena, which yet awaits a thorough examination. The case of the blind man, whose cure is reported by St. Augustine, then resident at Milan, as well as by St. Ambrose, stands on a different footing, and it is the one really important point of the narrative with which Taylor fails effectively to grapple. On

On the one hand, we must observe in favour of the miracle that St. Ambrose calls immediate attention to it, and that no one seems to have challenged either the fact of the man's blindness, or the reality of his restoration to sight. There is also to be noted the further fact that Severus devoted himself in consequence as a servant of the church, wherein the relics were placed, and continued such for more than twenty years. On the other hand we must observe that we have no means of judging as to the nature of the disease in his eyes with which Severus was affected. He was not a man born blind, he had simply contracted some kind of ocular disease, since he was a butcher by trade. He might therefore have only been affected in some such way as powerful nervous excitement might cure, but for which he and St. Ambrose would naturally account by the miraculous power of the martyrs. In the Criterion of Miracles, by bishop Douglas (pp. 130-160, ed. 1803), there are many acute observations on similar reputed miracles in the 18th century. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Bedae, Usuard.; Kal. Carthag.; Kal. Front.; Till. Mem. ii. 78, 198; Fleury, H. E. viii. 49, xviii. 47; Ceill. v. 386, 490, ix. 340.) [G. T. S.]

GERVASIUS (3), given by Ughelli as the first known bishop of Barium (Bari), present at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vii. 593). The name does not occur in Mansi's lists, and seems to have been taken from the "Gerontius de Brebi" and "de Brebi," which occur there (Mansi, iii. 39 b, 42 d, 46 e). Gams (Ser. Ep. 856) apparently understands it so. [GERONTIUS (4).] [R. S. G.]

GERVASIUS (3), bishop of Tarentum, 659. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 132; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ix. 126.) [A. H. D. A.]

GERVASIUS (4)—July 6. He was a native of Chalon-sur-Saône, and living in the 7th century. Having made a pilgrimage to Rome, he was murdered by robbers on his return, when but a few miles from home. He was thereupon elevated to the rank of a martyr, and miracles were ascribed to him. His acts are of the 10th or 11th century, and worthless as historical records. They testify, however, to the existence at that time of the practice of infant communion in the West. "At his baptism, which was performed by the bishop, after the ceremony was completed, he placed the holy body of Christ in the infant's mouth, as is the custom. Then, seeing a drop of blood on the child's lips, he said to those around, 'Know, for certain, that this child as he is joined by name to the blessed martyr Gervasius, so he will be a brave soldier of Christ, being joined to Him by His blood.'" On the custom of infant communion, consult Suarez, Disp. 62, de Eucharistia, sect. 4, and Disp. 69, sect. 2. Concerning apparitions of Christ's body in the sacrament, sometimes as a boy, sometimes as flesh or blood, see Suarez, Disp. 55, de Eucharist. sect. 1-4. (Calixtus, Bull. Jul. ii. 314-316.) [G. to Bertrada, Charles the Great's mother, by whose influence he was elevated to the bishopric. But three years after the Queen mother's death a vacancy occurred in the abbacy of Fontanelle by the death of Wido. The post had been promised to Witboldus, Wido's nephew, and Charles the Great's chaplain, but as he was engaged on a mission at Constantinople, which was likely to be of long duration, the abbacy was conferred on Gervoldus (A.D. 786 or 787). To obtain this dignity, he relinquished the see, in which his successor's name is unknown. Gervoldus had been much employed on state affairs, and at one period of his life had been entrusted by Charles with the collection of dues and tributes. According to the Chronicle of Fontanelle, his journeys had even extended to Britain, and brought him into contact with king Offa of Mercia, to whom Charles had sent him as ambassador, and with whom he had contracted an intimate friendship. The same authority states that about the year 794, when he was now an abbat, he was chosen by Charles to conduct the negotiations with reference to his son Charles's marriage with Offa's daughter. Offa consented to the alliance, but on the condition that his son should also marry Charles's daughter Berta. This Charles would not listen to, and an open quarrel was only averted by the wise entreaties of Gervoldus. But all this is problematical.

He was very liberal to his monastery. A long inventory of the plate, vestments, and MSS. which he gave to it is to be found in the Annals of Fontanelle. The monastery buildings were restored by him, and, finding a general ignorance of letters, he established a school in the abbey, especially devoted to music, in which he provided the best instruction the times could afford, for he himself, the annalist informs us, though not overmuch skilled in other learning, was versed in the art of song, and not wanting in sweetness and excellence of voice. Finally, on his death-bed he gave to the monastery all his possessions near Evreux. He died A.D. 806.

Le Cointe distinguishes him from the Gerbodus, whose expulsion from the episcopate which he had usurped was decreed by the council of Frankfort in A.D. 794. (Chron. Fontanellense, cap. xvi. Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 277; Pertz, Monument. Germ. Hist. ii. 291-2; Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 788, n. ii.; an. 790, n. lxxxiii.; an. 794, n. cix. *Gall. GERWYN, ST. [BERWYN.]

GÉRY. [GAUGERICUS.]

GESALIC (GIBALEICUS), natural son of Alaric II. (Visigoth, king of southern Gaul and Spain from 485 to 507), and half brother, therefore, of Amalaric, Alaric's lawful heir. After the fatal battle of Vouillé or Voulon, near Poitiers (see Dahn's Könige der Germanen, v. 109, note 8), in 507, at which Alaric was killed, and the power of the Visigoths in southern Gaul was permanently broken by the Franks; the defeated Visigoths split into two parties, one supporting Amalaric, then a child of five years old, the other preferring the elder Gesalic, on the ground, so often taken in every German state, of maturity and seniority. Gesalic was elected king at Narbonne, while Amalaric and his supporters fled into Spain. From the time of the battle near Poitiers until June 508, the victorious Franks and Burgundians pressed their advantage in southern Gaul, finding little or no resistance, and helped everywhere by the Catholic party, whose efforts had been for some time past directed towards transferring the rule of southern Gaul from the Arian Visigoths to the orthodox Franks. [EURIC, ALARIC II.] Chlodwig's (Clovis's) son Theuderic with the Burgundians under Gundebad marched on the towns of the Rhone and Loire early in 508, and Gesalic, attacked by Gundebad, fled from Narbonne—which was taken—over the Pyrenees to Barcelona. In June, 508, however, the great Theuderic appeared on the scene from Italy on behalf of his grandson Amalaric, and matters changed greatly. His championship of Amalaric led Gesalic later to seek an alliance with the Franks and Burgundians against his half brother and Theuderic, but as Dahn points out (L. c. p. 114) the assertion hitherto made by Aschbach, Lemoine, and others, that already in 507 he had betrayed Narbonne and what remained of southern Gaul to the Franks in return for aid against Amalaric in Spain, finds no authority in the sources. After great successes against the Franks and their allies in 508-9, Theuderic's general, Ibbas or Ebba, attacked Gesalic at Barcelona, and drove him from Spain in 510. He fled to Africa to seek help from the Vandals (mindful perhaps of his grandfather Euric's old alliance, with Genseric), was however refused it (according to Isidore, Hist. Got. ad ann. 507. Esp. Sagr. vi. 456), and returning not to Spain, but to Aquitania "ob metum Theuderic," opened negotiations with the Franks. He stayed there one year, and then entered Spain with an army (furnished him by the Franks?), met Ibbas near Barcelona, was defeated, pursued, and killed (512). His personal character was all along such as allowed him no chance of success. During his short reign at Barcelona, he made himself hated by his own partisans; and Isidore says of him, "sicut genere vilissimus, ita infelicitate et ignavis summus." He counts, however, as the rightful successor of Alaric, and Amalaric's reign only begins from his death. (Dahn, v. L. c.; Lafuente, Hist. de España, ii. 331.) [M. A. W.]

GESSIUS, an advocate, to whom Firmus, bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, wrote to comfort him on his brother, a military man, being called away on a fresh campaign, and to strengthen his hope in his safe return (Firm. Epist. 6). [L. V.]

GESTIDIUS, a friend of Paulinus of Nola, who addresses two letters to him. The first is partly in prose and partly in verse, and was sent with a present of beccaficos, which had been caught with birdlime, to which they had and 668. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 370, 387, 318; Esp. Sagr. xii. 66.) [BASILICA.] [M. A. W.]

GETA, bishop of Jubaltiana, in Byzacena, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 128.) [H. W. P.]

GETHER, king of the Heruli. [GIESSEN.]

GETULIUS (1), a bishop calumniated and ill-treated by the Donatists, and even forced to perform on his knees an act of penance. (Opt. ii. 19, 25.) [H. W. P.]

GETULICUS (2), Donatist bishop of Victoriana in Mauretania Caesariensis, present at the Donatist council of Cabarusia, A.D. 393. (Aug. Ep. in Ps. 36, 30.) [H. W. P.]

GETULIUS—June 10. Martyr under Hadrian, with Symphorosus his wife, seven sons, his brother Amantius, and Cerialis. Their acts are mere mediæval inventions, though admitted by Ruinart into his Acta Sincera. As a specimen they tell us that, when thrown into a furnace, they walked about therein without feeling any hurt, and even sang praises to God (Rom. Mart. Vet., Adon. Usuard.; Till. Mem. ii. p. 341). Dodwell, however, in Dissert. Cyprum, xi. sect. 28-33, de Pseuditis Mart. throws great doubt on all stories in the Martyrologies of any persecution of martyrs under Hadrian, especially at Rome. He says expressly, sect. 33, "Nullius martyris in probis monumentis extare memoriam qui passus fuerit sub Hadriano." [G. T. S.]

GEWILIEB (GEWILSON, GOSLWONDA, GEWELIF, GEWILSO, GEWILUS), forty-first bishop of Meitz, deposed at the second council of Germany, A.D. 745. His father Geroldus, who preceded him in the see, fought under Carloman against the Saxons, and was killed. The son thereupon took orders and was elevated to the bishopric. Soon afterwards (A.D. 744) Carloman started on another campaign against the Saxons, and Gewilieb accompanied him. While the two armies lay encamped on opposite sides of the river Wharaha, Gewilieb sent his servant to the Saxons to seek the slayer of his father and challenge him to single combat. Riding to the charge the two met in the centre of the stream, and the Saxon fell pierced by the bishop's sword. The battle became general, and the Saxons were routed. For this crime of homicide, and for sporting with hawks and hounds, he was deposed at the council on the accusation of Boniface, who was made bishop in his place. The deposition is alluded to in a letter from pope Zachary to Boniface (S. Bonifacii Vita, lib. I. cap. 37 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 652; Zach. Pap. Epistolæ, xlii. in Migne, 949; Bar. xii. ann. 745, lii. iv.).

Serarius (Rerum Moguntinarum, tom. I. p. Frankfort, 1722) quotes from a MS. of mine to the effect that after his deposition left all his property to the church, and for his sustenance the villula of Spangmünd a church called Caput Montis, where in good repute fourteen years and especially the virtue of hospitality. He pain sought to attend councils or synods, but sometimes at the Lord's Supper rash feet in the churches, is taken of his similarity, and at length died peacefully (765). An epitaph is also given by Serarius expressive of the bishop's penitence. In the Gallia Christiana he also appears in the list of the early bishops of Worms (v. 663). See also Monument. Mogunt. Jaffé, pp. 2, 3, 151, 471-473, 495, 496.

GHILLO (GUIDULPHUS), is said to have been servant of Guthagon, and to have remained at Westkirk in Flanders after Guthagon's death. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 315-16) puts his death in A.D. 299, yet much doubts the Christianity of Scotia at that time. [GUTHAGON.] Fisher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 16, Wks. vi. 315, Ind. Chron., A.D. 299; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 14, 213.

[J. G.]

GIBERIUS, bishop of Bigastrum from 656 till before 673. He appears at the eighth and ninth councils of Toledo, A.D. 653, 655, and is represented at the tenth by his vicar, Gila. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; iv. 145, 158; Sp. Sagr. vii. 127.) [VINCENT.] [M. A. W.]

GIBRIANUS, GIBRIANUS (GIBIRINUS, GIBRIAN), commemorated May 8. In the Lives of S. Tressan, S. Gibrian, S. Eloquentius, and others, we have an account of the arrival of a band of Christian teachers in Gaul in the time of Clovis I., but it is very doubtful whether all the reputed members of that band belonged even to the 6th century. According to some accounts there were seven brothers and three sisters, the chief among the former being Tressan, German, and Gibrian. The last-named spent a holy life in the district of Châlons-sur-Marne, and long after he had died there, his remains were translated to the abbey church of St. Remigius at Rheims, where his memory was kept on May 8. (Hist. Lit. de la France, v. 676.) He is usually assigned to the beginning of the 6th century. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 15; Camerarius, de Scot. Hist. lib. iii. c. 4, pp. 139-143; Boll. Acta SS. Maii, ii. 297-300; Tanner, Bibl. 316.) [J. G.]

GIBOALDUS, tenth bishop of Angoulême, in the early part of the 7th century. He is mentioned, though without his see, in the will of St. Bertchramnus, bishop of Le Mans, as the former possessor of an estate thereby devised. (Labill. Vet. Analecta, p. 261, Paris, 1723; Gene. Patr. Lat. lxxx. 404; Gall. Christ. ii. 1.)

GIBULDUS (GEBAUDUS, GEBAVULTUS), a king of the Alemanni, towards the close of the 5th century. In the Acta S. Lupi (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 70, 81) this king is spoken of as showing especial reverence for St. Lupus, and setting free, without ransom, some prisoners whom his people had carried off from Brienne, in Champagne, on receiving a letter from that saint. In the Vita S. Severini (c. vi. § 27, Boll. Acta SS. n. 1, 491) he also appears as friendly to St. Severinus the apostle of Noricum, to whose treaties he granted the release of some other captives. We do not know whether he was the king of the Alemanni whom Clovis conquered in 486. (Masou, Hist. of the Ancient Germans, 8, 5; Bar. an. 482 n. liv.-lvii.) [S. A. B.]

ness of the world around having led him to adopt an ascetic life, he wrote to acquaint Gregory with his determination, and to request him to pay him a speedy visit. His letter also contained a clear statement of the orthodox faith on the Trinity, the perusal of which caused Gregory the greatest joy, which he expressed in his reply. He could not promise to visit him immediately on account of the approach of winter and the feebleness of his health, but he would come when he could (Greg. Naz. Epist. 239). On a subsequent occasion he fulfilled his intention, but found Gigantius absent, so that, as he complains in an epigram, having come to the fountain and found it without water, he went away more thirsty than ever. (Carm. Iamb. 29, p. 180.)

GIGNANTIUS or GIGANTIUS, a bishop present at the council of Milevis against Pelagianism, A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 176.)

[H. W. P.]

GIGNEUS, a disciple of St. Enna, and also a foreigner. He was living at Ballynacourty, co. Galway, when St. Enna visited that district, and he may be the cook of St. Enna, who for a slight transgression of the monastic rule was banished from Aran, and perhaps took up his abode on the island of Tawyn or Tawna, in the parish of Ballynacourty. (Colgan, Acta SS. 709, c. 24, 711, c. 1.)

GILABERTUS of Geneva. [GUBERTUS.]

GILBERTUS (1)—June 24. Martyr with Agoadus, near Paris; they were, according to legend, converted by missionaries sent into Gaul by St. Peter. (Mart. Usuard.; Acta SS. Boll. Jun. iv. 815-817.)

[G. T. S.]

GILBERTUS (2), 13th bishop of Nevers, succeeding St. Deodatus, or, according to Coquille's list, twelfth, between Rauracus and Rogus. It is said that in old MSS. of the church of Nevers he is described as sitting in A.D. 665 (Gall. Christ. xii. 628; Gams, Series Episc. 584; Coquille, Hist. du Nivernois, sub fin. Paris, 1612).

GILBERTUS, bishop of Noyon. [GISLEBERTUS.]

GILDARDUS (1) (GILDAREDUS, GODARDUS), bishop of Rouen. A belief prevailed in the middle ages that he and St. Medardus were twin brothers, were ordained on the same day, and died on the same day. But no mention of Gildardus occurs in the earliest lives of St. Medard, and Gildardus attended the first council of Orleans in 511, while St. Medard was not consecrated till 530. He was buried in a chapel of St. Mary, in later times called after him, at that time without the walls, but afterwards enclosed by the growth of the city. He was commemorated at Rouen with his reputed brother, June 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 67; Mansi, viii. 356; Gall. Christ. xi. 10.)

GILDARDUS (2) ST., priest of Luperciacum (Leurcy), in the district of Nevers, conjecturally assigned to the 7th century and com-

morated Aug 24. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 840; Usuard. Martyrologium, Auctaria.) [S. A. B.]

GILDAS (GILDASTUR, GILDUR, GILLAS), commemorated January 29. A close and accurate account of Gildas is surrounded with difficulties, and after all that has been written, the facts of his life and his very existence are left in uncertainty. In the mediaeval Lives he appears in a well-defined individuality, but a more critical view detects so many anachronisms and historical defects, that it has been questioned, first, as to whether he ever lived, and secondly, as to whether there were more Gildases than one, and if more, how many. Though he is mentioned by name, and his writings quoted from by Bede, Alcuin, William of Newburgh, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Giraldus Cambrensis, there is no memoir of him written within several centuries of the time when he is supposed to have flourished, and the two oldest, on which the others are based, cannot be regarded in a higher light than as ordinary specimens of that unhistorical tone of mind which prevailed in the 11th and 12th centuries. In order to surmount the chronological and historical difficulties, Ussher, Ware, Bale, Pitseus, Colgan, and O'Connor have imagined that there must have been at least two, an elder and a younger, perhaps even four or six, about the 5th and 6th centuries. These have received different designations to mark them, and thus have obtained a recognized position in history. But the more probable and more generally received opinion is that, though called Albanicus, Albanus, Badonicus, Cambrius, Hibernicus, Hibernius, Historicus, and Sapiens, there was but one Gildas, and that he could not have lived earlier than about the end of the 5th century, or later than about the end of the 6th. The oldest authority is Vita Gildae, auctore monacho Ruyensi anonymo, first published by Johannes a Bosco (in the Bibliotheca Floriacensis, pp. 249 sq.), then by Colgan (Acta SS. 181 sq.), Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. i. 138 sq. ed. Paris, giving the complete text), and the Bollandists (Acta SS. 29 Jan. iii. 573 sq.). This Life has often been published in Latin and English since that time, and is attributed to the 11th century, or earlier. The other was written by Caradoc of Llancarvan in the 12th century, and first published in Stevenson's Gildas de Excidio Britanniae (Engl. Hist. Soc. 1838) from two MSS. in the British Museum: on this Capgrave's De S. Gilda Abb. et Mart. (Nov. Leg. Angl. f. 156) is founded. (For published and MS. Lives, see Hardy's Descript. Cot. i. pt. i. 151-6, pt. ii. 799.) Along with voluminous notes and special sections treating of the many points in dispute regarding Gildas, the Bollandists give only one Life as above, but Colgan publishes four, the two principal being Capgrave's, followed by some extracts from the Life by Caradoc as given by Ussher, and the Ruyensian: the former he calls Vita S. Gildae Albanis Abb. et Confess. from Capgrave, and the latter Vita S. Gildae Badonici Abb. et Confess. from John a Bosco. Proceeding upon what seems more or less a common groundwork of fact, these Lives present much that is irreconcilable in themselves and with each other. "Nor need this seem so very strange," says O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 473-4), "when both accounts had been drawn up several centuries after the lifetime of Gildas, and when they had been written in different centuries and in separate countries. The diversities of chronological events, and of persons hardly contemporaneous, will only enable us to infer that the sources of information were occasionally doubtful, while the various coincidences of narrative seem to warrant a conclusion, that both tracts were intended to chronicle the life of one and the same person. It deserves remark, however, that" (quoting from Mon. Hist. Brit. i. pt. i. 59, n.) "both are said to have been born in Scotland. One was the son of Nau, the other of Cau: the eldest son [? brother] of one was Huel, of the other Cuil. Both lives have stories of a bell, both Gildases go to Ireland, both go to Rome, and both build churches. The monk of Ruys quotes several passages from Gildas' De Excidio, and assigns it to him: and Caradoc calls him, 'Historiographus Britonum,' and says that he wrote Historiae de Regibus Britonum." To this we may add the short conclusion of Bp. Nicolson (Eng. Hist. Libr. 32, 3rd ed.): "He was monk of Bangor about the middle of the 6th century: a sorrowful spectator of the miseries and almost utter ruin of his countrymen by a people under whose banner they had hoped for peace."

By those who suppose there were two or more bearing the same name Albanus is placed in the 5th century (425-512, Ussher), and Badonicus in the 6th (520-570, Ussher). Those who believe there was only one Gildas do not entirely agree as to his dates, one for his birth being sought between A.D. 484 and 520, and one for his death between A.D. 565 and 602. In his De Excidio Britanniae he says he was born in the year of "obsessionis Badonici montis, qui prope Sabrinum ostium habetur, . . . annus . . . qui jam et meae nativitatis est" (c. 26). The Annales Cambriae place the "bellum Badonis" in the year 516, and the Annales Tigernachi Gildas' death in the year 570; these dates are probably to be accepted as nearest the truth.

The writing ascribed to Gildas was long regarded and spoken of as one treatise, De Excidio Britanniae; but it is now usually divided into the Historia Gildae and Epistola Gildae. The former is a dry and barren recital of the events of British history under the Romans, and between their withdrawal and his own time; the latter is a querulous, confused, and lengthened series of bitter invectives cast into the form of a declamatory epistle addressed to the Britons, and relating specially to five kings, "reges sed tyrannos," named Constantinus, Aurelius, Conan, Vortiporus, Cuneglasus, and Maglocunus.^b Accusations, however, and reproaches are cast so freely against kings, priests, and people, especially against the crimes of the kings, and the ignorance, avarice, idleness and other faults of the priesthood, that many, though probably without quite sufficient reason, have come to regard the composition as the work of a later writer, and as intended in the ecclesiastical differences of the 7th and 8th centuries for purely polemical purposes, while others would assigning it even a still later date. (See useful notes on both sides in Notes and Queries, 4 ser. i. 171, 271, 511, and on the side of genuineness and authenticity, Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 280 sq.)

^b Skene (Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. 63, 64) regards them as contemporary rulers, and as living, one in Devon and Cornwall, two in Wales, and two probably in the north of Ireland.

Of Gildas's work only two MSS. are known to exist, both in the library of the University of Cambridge (Dd. i. 17, and Ff. i. 27, the latter having only the Historia); a third MS. (Cotton Libr. Vit. A. vi.) is lost, but fortunately represented with great accuracy in Josseline's edition. The work has often been published in this country and on the continent; edited by Polydore Virgil, Lond. 1525; by Josseline, London, 1568; by Stevenson, London, 1838 (Eng. Hist. Soc.); and republished at Berlin, 1844, with German introductions and notes, by San-Marte. It is also found in Mon. S. Patr. Orthodox. t. i. Bas. 1555, and t. ii. Bas. 1569; Hist. Brit. Script. xv. ed. Gale, Oxon. 1691; Mon. Hist. Brit. 1847; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., Oxford, 1869. Translations are by Habington, Lond. 1638; by Giles, Lond. 1841; republished, with additions, in Bohn's Six Old English Chronicles. (For its bibliography, see Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. Ang.-S. per. 134; Mon. Hist. Brit. i. pt. i. 59 sq.; Man. Brit. Hist. 1, 2, ed. Pickering, Lond. 1845; Giles, Hist. Doc. Anc. Brit. iii. iv. pref.; Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 280-284.)

His history is often confounded with the Historia Britonum of Nennius [NENNIUS], and many other works have been attributed to the one or more Gildases; the De Victoria Ambrosii Aurelii, which is quoted by Geoffrey of Monmouth, is not now, and probably never was, extant, and the prophetic verses ascribed to him by Bede are evidently spurious. Some canons or rules of discipline, ascribed to Gildas, are given by D'Achery (Spicil. Vet. Scrip. t. ix. 4-50, Paris, 1669). He is sometimes (Rees, Welsh Saints, 225 sq.; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 17, 18, 166) identified with the Welsh poet Aneurin, and the Irish annalists associate David, Cadoc, and Gildas in the giving an order of mass to the second order of Irish saints, which proves at least the strongly Irish connexion through which he has been called Hibernus and Hibernicus. (Bollandists, Acta SS. 29 Jan. iii. 566-582; Colgan, Acta SS. 176-203, 226-228; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 9; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. cc. 13-17, and Ind. Chron.; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. Ang.-Sax. per. 115-135.) [J. G.]

GILDAS. (I.) Albanicus, Albanus, commemorated Jan. 29. If we assume with Ussher and others that Gildas Albanicus or Albanus, was a real person in history distinct from others of the name of Gildas, and that the Vita Gildas, written by Caradoc of Llancarvan, is the memoir of this saint, we find him to have been one of the twenty-four sons of Nau (called Can by Capgrave, Caunus by Mabillon, and Navus by Bale), king of Albania (Scotland); to perfect his learning he went seven years to Gaul, and on his return became anchoret, teacher, and preacher throughout the three kingdoms of Britain (called by Camden, Brit. 573, the Silures, Dimetae, and Ordovices), announcing at this time the birth of St. David. He also passed over into Ireland and resided chiefly at Armagh, where he converted many to the Catholic faith. There the news reached him that his brothers had gone to war against king Arthur, and that his eldest brother Huel had fallen. Leaving, therefore, his school at Armagh, he returned to Britain, met Arthur, and gave him the forgiveness he desired for having been the cause of Huel's death, proceeded to Rome with a famous bell (which he wished to present to the pope, but which shewed by its silence that St. Cadoc had a better claim to it), and on his return to Britain had a school at Llancarvan, co. Glamorgan, where he wrote a beautiful copy of the Gospel, which was long preserved in the church of St. Cadoc. He afterwards retired with St. Cadoc to an island in the Severn, and after a time, finding this place disagreeable on account of the pirates from the Orkney Islands, he went to Glastonbury and wrote his Historiae de Regibus Britanniae. He then became a recluse near Glastonbury, built a chapel to the Holy Trinity, died, and was buried there in the middle of the church of St. Mary. Following this Life, Abp. Ussher places Gildas's birth in the year 425, his visit to Armorica in 455, his return to Britain in 462, Huel or Howel's death in the island of Mona and Gildas's return from Ireland in 508, his resort to Glastonbury in 510, and his death in 512 (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. cc. xiii. xv., Works, v. 506 sq., vi. 216 sq., and Ind. Chron., ed. Elrington; Stevenson, de Exc. Brit. xxxi.-xli.; Colgan, Acta SS. 179, 180; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xi. c. 3). There are attributed to him, but without any semblance of truth (except in the one fact of a Gildas having written De Excidio Britanniae), Commentarii Quart. Evangeliorum, lib. iv.; De primis habitatoribus insulae, lib. i.; Versus vaticiniorum, lib. i.; De Sexto Cognoscendo, lib. i.; Super eodem Sexto, lib. i.; Regum Brytannorum historia, lib. i.; De victoria Aurelii Ambrosii, lib. i.; Acta Germani et Lupi, lib. i. (Tanner, Bibl. 319, following Bale and Pitseus; Ware, Ir. Writ. ii. c. 1; Biographie universelle, t. xvii. 365; Pitseus, de Ill. Angl. Scrip. 92, 93; Balaeus, Ill. Maj. Brit. Scrip. f. 27.)

(II.) Badonicus, Historicus, and Sapiens, commemorated Jan. 29. Accepting this Gildas as different from the preceding, and following the account given by the monk of Ruys in his S. Gildas Sapiensis Vita, we seem to have a distinct historical outline. This Gildas was born at Arecluta on the river Clut (Dumbarton on the Clyde in Scotland); his father was Caunus, and of his four brothers the eldest was called Cuillus, and succeeded his father in the kingdom. Gildas was educated by St. Illutus, and his school companions were St. Samson and St. Paul, who were afterwards famous bishops in Armorica. From Llantwit he went to Ireland, took priest's orders apparently there, and returned to North Britain, where he laboured among those who were Christians, but not Catholics, being entangled in divers heretical deceits. At the invitation of St. Brigida (Feb. 1), and also of king Ammericus (Ainmire), he returned to Ireland, the foresaid king promising to obey the holy man in all things if he would restore the Catholic faith in his kingdom. From Ireland he passed through England to Rome and Ravenna, and, returning to Brittany in the reign of king Childeric, built a monastery at Ruys (in Monte Reuvisii), where he died and was buried. At Ruys he wrote "epistolarem libellum in quo quinque Reges ipsius insulae

(i.e. Britain) redarguit diversis sceleribus atque criminibus irretitos." As in this he says of himself that he was born in the year the battle of Mons Badonicus was fought (hence his name Badonicus), Ussher places his birth in the year 520, his writing his querulous epistle in 564, and his death at Ruys in 570. (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. cc. xiii. xv., Works, v. 506 sq., vi. 216 sq., and Ind. Chron., ed. Elrington; Tanner, Bibl. 319-322, but mixing up the two Lives, and adding in a note that he wrote De Immortalitate Animae, lib. i.; De Excidio Britanniae, lib. i.; in sui Temporis Clerum, lib. i.; De Gestis Britonum Historia, lib. i. See also Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xii. c. 10; Colgan, Acta SS. 181-202, with notes and learned appendix of four chapters; Cave, Hist. Liter. 424-426, putting him later than Ussher does; Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 279-285, following the Life in Mabillon, and putting his arrival in Armorica in the year 520, his writing in 530, and his death in 565, giving also a detailed and most important account of the works attributed to him and their editions on the continent; Fleury, Hist. Christ. xxxiv. 15; Ware, Irish Writ. ii. c. 1; Gen. Biog. Dict. i. 851, 852; Biographie universelle, t. xvii. 365-367; Balaesus, Ill. Maj. Brit. Scrip. fol. 33; Pitseus, de Ill. Angl. Scrip. 102; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 165, 166; Rowlands, Mon. Ant. Rest. 138-180, 2nd edit.)

(III.) Cambrius. This Gildas is evidently a reflexion of the historical writer, but is placed by Pitseus (de Illust. Angl. Scrip. 70), Balaesus (Maj. Ill. Brit. Scrip. f. 15), and others, in the 1st century of the Christian era, and credited with the authorship of numerous writings; he seems, however, to be entirely fictitious. (Tanner, Bibl. 319.)

(IV.) Quartus has received his name to distinguish him from Albanus, Badonicus and Cambrinus, and is said by Pitseus to have flourished as an old man in 860, and by Dempster in 870. According to these writers he was an Irishman, monk at Bangor, and writer of Historia Britanniae, lib. i.; Breviarium Gildae, lib. i.; De Mirabilibus Britanniae, lib. i.; De Primis Habitatoribus Britanniae, lib. i.; De Rege Arthuro, lib. i.; De Sepulchro ejus incognito, lib. i.; and some others. But these are more than doubtful, especially as the first work is Nennius's History. Ussher places him in A.D. 820, and says he wrote Liber de Computo, in 99 chapters, of which in his Sylloge (Wks. iv. 472) he gives the preface, which is addressed to a monk called Rabanus, the work itself being in MS. in the Cottonian Library. (Colgan, Acta SS. 201, 202, c. 4; Pitseus, de Illust. Angl. Scrip. 70, 166; Balaesus, Vit. Ill. Brit. Scrip. ii. 21; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 322; Ware, Ir. Writ. ii. c. 1; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 604; Cave, Hist. Liter. 519.)

[J. G.]

GILDASIUS, abbat, fellow-student of St. Samson and St. Paul. He came from Ireland to France in the reign of king Grallon, who built for him and his disciples a monastery on the island of Ruys in the 5th or 6th century. Colgan (Acta SS. 176) takes this account from the Breviary of Nantes, and presents it at Jan. 29; but the legend is evidently a part of that of Gildas Badonicus, and reappears, only under a different form, and in more detail connecting him with St. Philibert of Jumiéges in the 7th century, in the memoir of St. Gildasius, confessor of Blavet at Jan. 31, taken by Colgan (ib. 226-8) from the Breviary of Quimper. [GILDAS (II).] (O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, Jan. 29 and 31, i. 495, 496, 602-607; Usuard, Mart. Auct. 27 Jan. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 702.) [J. G.]

GILDEMIRUS (SULDEMIRUS), bishop of Complutum, from before 681. He is represented by his vicar Annibonius at the twelfth Council of Toledo, A.D. 681. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270; Esp. Sagr. vii. 188.) [ASTURIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GILDO (1), a presbyter appointed to succeed Rufus as bishop of Lamzellum, in Numidia, but not yet installed at the time of Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 206.) [H. W. P.]

GILDO (2), son of Nubel and brother of Firmus [FIRMUS (7)], invested by Theodosius with the title and authority of count of Africa. Having revolted against Honorius, he was defeated by his brother Mascezel, A.D. 398, and died by his own hand (Gibbon, c. xxix.). During the time of his ascendancy he favoured the Donatists, and Optatus, bishop of Thamugada, received the name of Gildonianus in consequence of the support which Gildo gave to him, and the violence which he exercised towards the Catholics. (Tillemont, 73, vol. vi. p. 181.) [OPTATUS.]

[H. W. P.]

GILES. [AEGIDIUS.]

GILMIR. This is the name, according to Villanueva (Viage Litterario, xiii. 6), of the bishop of Gerona, otherwise known as Miron, whose signature is found to the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693. (Mansi, xii. 85 a.) Gams (Ser. Episc. 32) places both Miron and Gilimir in the list of bishops of Gerona. (Esp. Sagr. xliii. 67; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 586.) [F. D.]

GILLAS, British historian. [GILDAS.]

GILLENUS is spoken of by the Scotch annalists, Fordun, John Major, Camerarius, and Dempster as a Scot who lived in Gaul, and was a disciple or contemporary of St. Columbanus (Nov. 21). Dempster says he wrote Speculum Vitae Humanae, lib. i., Epistolae ad Fratres, lib. i. and flourished A.D. 540, but this must be too early. Fordun says he lived in the time of the Scotch king Eugenius, or Eocha Buidhe in the beginning of the 7th century, and Camerarius commemorates him on June 23; he must, however, have been an Hibernian Scot. (Fordun, Scotichr. l. iii. c. 32; Joannes Major, de Gest. Scot. l. ii. c. 7; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 159, and Kal. June 23; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 308.) [J. G.]

GILLES. [EGIDIUS.]

GILLUS (GELOS), Aug. 30, martyr at Ancyra with six others. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 429.) [G. T. S.]

GILULFUS (EGILULFUS), bishop of Asta (Asti), c. A.D. 813. It is said that the archives of his cathedral were burnt A.D. 820. His successor was Roserius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 479; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiv. 28.)

[R. S. G.]

GIOVANNICIUS. [JOANNICIUS.]

GIRICUS. [GÖERICUS.]

GIRRIG (GERRIG, GWRIG), patron of Llangirrig or Llangwrig, in Montgomeryshire. The more common form of his name is Curig or Cyricus. [CYRICUS.] (Rees, Welsh Saints, 82, 307; Cambr. Quart. Mag. i. 490, iii. 507.) [J. G.]

GISA, daughter of Grimoald king of the Lombards. She was given by her brother Romuald, duke of Benevento, as a hostage to the emperor Constantine, who was besieging Benevento, c. 663. She afterwards died in Italy. (Paulus Diaconus, v. 8, 14; Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 148-150.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISELBERGA, wife of Luitprand's nephew Gregory duke of Benevento, c. 732. (Paulus Diaconus, Gest. Lang. vi. 55.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISALEICUS, Visigoth king. [GESALIC.]

GISELHERE, GISELHERUS, the seventh bishop of the South Saxons at Selsey (M. H. B. 618). His date, as ascertained by charters, falls between 772 and 787; in the former year his predecessor Osa or Oswald was in office (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402), and in the latter his successor Totta (ib. p. 461). The name of Giselhere appears in the list of prelates present at the Council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439), and in a grant of Oslac, ealdorman of the South Saxons, dated at Selsey in 780. (Kemble, C. D. 1012.) [S.]

GISELPERTUS, duke of Verona in the time of Paulus Diaconus. He opened and rifled the grave of king Alboin. (Paulus Diaconus, ii. 28.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISELTRUDA, sister of Anselm the first abbat of the monastery of Nonantula, and wife of Aistulph king of the Lombards, 749-756. (Vita Anselmi Abb. Nonan. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. p. 567.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISIBARIUS, a priest, Scot, disciple and associate of St. Rudbert, or Rupert. He wrote Ad Boiarios Homilias, and flourished about A.D. 630. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 308; Tanner, Bibl. 326.) [J. G.]

GISILARIUS, priest. [GISLARIUS.]

GISIUS, bishop of Mutina (Modena), succeeded Geminianus IV. c. A.D. 796, and died probably A.D. 811 or 812. His successor was Deodatus. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 113; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xv. 233.) [R. S. G.]

GISLA (1) (GISILA, GISLANA), daughter of Pippin and only sister of Charles the Great, born A.D. 757. The robes in which she issued from the baptismal font were sent by her father to the pope, Paul I., in token of her spiritual adoption by him (cf. the letter of Paul, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 1183). Her hand was sought in marriage by Constantine Copronymus, the emperor of the East, for his son Leo, and later by Adalgisus, son of Desiderius, king of the Lombards; but both offers were opposed by the reigning popes, and neither was accepted (cf. the letter of Stephen III. written in 770 to Charles CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

and Carloman in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 255, and Bouquet, v. 543). Almost from girlhood she was dedicated to religion, and became ninth abbess of Chelles (Cala), the monastery of St. Bathildis, where she built at her own cost the church of St. Mary and St. Saviour. Here she was visited by Charles, when sick, in 804, and by Alcuin, of whom we have two letters addressed to her. (Bouquet, v. 615, 616; Migne, Patr. Lat. c. 362, 363.) There is extant a diploma by which she granted large possessions to the monastery of St. Denys in A.D. 799 (Bouquet, v. 760). Her death took place in 810. (Annales, in Pertz, i. 11; Eginhardi Vita Caroli Magni, § xviii.; Bouquet, v. 97, 613; Monum. Carolin. ed. Jaffé, var. loc. see index; Translatio S. Bathildis, in Mabill. Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iv. pars 1, p. 452, Paris, 1668-1701; Gall. Christ. vii. 560.) [S. A. B.]

GISLA (2) (GISOLA), daughter of Charles the Great and Hildegard, baptized, and received from the font at Milan, by Thomas the archbishop, in A.D. 781. With the rest of her family she is celebrated in the magniloquent verse of Angilbert (229-242; Pertz, ii. 397), who lauds her beauty and her horsemanship in the chase, to which she was wont to accompany her father. Alcuin wrote her a short letter (Migne, Patr. Lat. c. 363; Bouquet, v. 616), exhorting her to lead a life of holiness. (Eginhardi Vita Caroli Magni, xviii. in Bouquet, v. 96; Annales Laurissenses, and Einhardi in Pertz, i. 160-1.) [S. A. B.]

GISLA (3), daughter of Theodulfus bishop of Orleans (ob. A.D. 821), who addresses one of his poems to her with the gift of a psalter (Carm. iii. 4 in Migne, Patr. Lat. cv. 326). [S. A. B.]

GISLARIUS (GISILARIUS, GIZOLARIUS), presbyter of Salzburg about the middle of the 8th century, a companion of St. Hildulph, St. Rudbert and others in Germany; he probably was an Irishman, and seems to have died at Salzburg. Associated with St. Chunibaldus he is commemorated at Feb. 8, Sept. 24, and Oct. 20. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 8 Feb., ii. 151) place them among their praetermissi at Feb. 8, and give at Sept. 24 a Sylloge Historica, "de SS. Chunialdo et Gisilario presbyteris Salesburgi in Germania, de cultu translatione et gestis, circa saec. viii." (ib. Sept. tom. vi. 708-13). Colgan was preparing a life of the same two holy men for Sept. 24. (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 374; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 111, ii. 414; Hansiz, Germ. Sac. ii. 45, 46.) [J. G.]

GISLEBERTUS (GILBERTUS), thirty-third bishop of Noyon and Tournay, between Dido, or Dodo, and Pleon. He was educated in the monasterium Elonense (St. Amand on the Scarpe, dep. Nord) and before his elevation became its abbat. In A.D. 769 he subscribed the Lateran Council under Stephen III. He died A.D. 782 in his own monastery, and was buried in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. Two epitaphs, one of them by Alcuin, are extant. (Gall. Christ. iii. 256; ix. 986; Mansi, xii. 715.) [S. A. B.]

GISLEMORIUS—Sept. 16. One of the Thebaean legion, and regarded as patron of Borgo di San Donnino in Italy. [MAURITIUS; LEGIO THEBAEA.] [G. T. S.]

GISLENUS (GUILAIN, GUISEIN), ST., founder and first abbat of the monastery of Cella, afterwards St. Guislain, in the 7th century. The story of his life, which has come down to us, is as follows. He was born of noble stock in Attica, and after being trained in philosophy at Athens entered a monastery subject to the rule of St. Basil. In time he became a priest, and bethinking him of the example of St. Dionysius the martyr, who left Athens to seek Rome, he resolved to go thither likewise. He had not been there long when a voice from heaven bade him depart and come to Hainault. Thither he went, accompanied by two disciples, called Lambert and Bellirius. On his arrival he sought an interview with St. Amandus, whose fame filled the neighbourhood, and commenced to build a cell on a spot called Castrilocus. He afterwards obtained from Dagobert a site upon the Haine in Hainault, and here he built a monastery, which was at first called Cella, and afterwards gave rise to the town named from him St. Ghislain or St. Guislain. Autbert archbishop of Cambray (656-668) and Amandus consecrated it. The remainder of his life was spent in works of piety, and among other good deeds he persuaded St. Waldegrude to purchase the spot on which he had first settled, and there build a monastery. In this work she was assisted by St. Hidulfus, and the monastery of Castrilocus (St. Vaudru de Mons; cf. Gall. Christ. iii. 144) was there erected. To him too, St. Aldegundis, who founded the monastery of Melbodium (Maubeuge), and others, owed their conversion. He died at Cella (A.D. 681, according to Mabillon's conjecture), and was buried in his own church, though, in the time of Charles the Great, when the oratorium was restored by abbat Elefans, his bones were removed for the consecration, and were not again restored to their original resting-place.

The foregoing account is from the anonymous Life published by Mabillon (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 788, Paris, 1668-1701) and by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. iv. 1030). In his preliminary observations Mabillon enumerates as many as six different lives. In the Auctaria of Molanus to Usuard (Mart. Oct. 9) Gislenus is called bishop of Athens, but there seems to be no foundation for such a statement. His day was Oct. 9 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 1010). [S. A. B.]

GISLHERE (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. No. 143, A.D. 781), bishop of Selsey. [GISELHERE.]

[C. H.]

GISLOALDUS, fifteenth bishop of Verdun, succeeding St. Paulus and followed by his nephew Gerebertus. He had been a monk of Tholey (Theologium), in the diocese of Treves. He was perhaps the bishop Gislochardus, one of those consulted by Sigebert as to the foundation of the monasteries of Malmédy and Stavelo in the Ardennes, which took place in A.D. 648, the year of his consecration (Notger, Vit. S. Remaci; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 680). He was also one of the bishops to whom Numerianus, archbishop of Treves, addressed his charter in favour of the monastery built by St. Deodatus of Nevers, in the Vosges (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1191). His death is placed A.D. 665. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 1170, instr. 291.) [S. A. B.]

GISO (1) (GUMO), 15th archbishop of Cologne, succeeding Aldewinus and followed by Anno. According to Le Cointe he was sitting in 695 when Pippin buried the remains of the martyred Hewalds at Cologne, as related by Bede, Hist. Eccl. v. 10. (Gall. Christ. iii. 628; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 695, n. iii. tom. iv. p. 312.) [S. A. B.]

GISO (2), c. 790, bishop of Vercelli. (Cappell. Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 369; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 764.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISOLA, daughter of Charles the Great. [GISLA.]

GISTLIANUS (GISTILIANUS, GIUSTILIANUS, GUISTLIANUS, GWESLAN), bishop at Menevia before St. David his nephew, and son of Gynyr of Caer Gawch, by his second wife Anna, daughter of Gwrthefyr Fendigaid (Vortimer). His first house was at Old Menevia, near the present St. David's, and was endowed by his father Gynyr, but was afterwards removed to Rosina, where the cathedral now stands, at the suggestion of St. David. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 162, 163, 173, 194; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 425; Leland, Collect. iii. 103; Jones and Freeman, Hist. of St. David's, p. 243.) [J. G.]

GISULFUS, first duke of Friuli, and the first Lombard duke appointed upon the invasion of Italy by Alboin in 569. The district was the first conquered by Alboin, who, before proceeding farther into Italy, offered the charge of it to his nephew and marshal (marpahis) Gisulf. Upon condition of being allowed to retain certain selected families to settle with him he consented, and received the title of the "ductor." (Paulus Diaconus, ii. 9.) Gisulph was one of the dukes under whose rule the Lombards lived for ten years after the death of Kleph, when there was no king (Paul. Diac. ii. 32). After some discord with the king Agilulf, of which the cause is unknown, he was received peaceably by him, c. ann. 602 (Paul. Diac. iv. 27). Together with the king he ratified the appointment of a bishop (or patriarch) to Aquileia, which was then in opposition to the see of Grado. He lost his life, together with the greater part of his army, c. 610, in resisting an invasion of the Avars. His son, Grimoaldus, then a child, escaped to the court of Benevento, and afterwards became duke of Benevento, and eventually seized the kingdom. It is possible that the first duke appointed was Grasulf, father of Gisulf, and that Paulus Diaconus is wrong. (Mommsen. Langob. Rerum, 1878, p. 77; Muratori, Ann. a. 590; Pabst, Forschungen z. d. G. p. 426.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GISULFUS, a Lombard duke, who upon the advance of Romanus, exarch of Ravenna, into Istria, gave himself up with his whole army. He was at the time quite young (Letter of Romanus to Childebert, king of the Franks; Troya, Cod. Dipl. i. p. 132). It is possible that he is the same as the above-mentioned Gisulf. (This is not allowed by Troya, but see Muratori, Ann. a. 590.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISULFUS, duke of Benevento, 689-706, succeeded his brother Grimoald. In the time of pope John VI., c. 702, he laid waste Campania, and took many captives, who were all redeemed by the pope. (Paulus Diaconus, G. L. vi. 2. 27, and Gesta Pontif. Vita Johann. vi. cf. note in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. p. 174.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISULPHUS, bishop of Chiusi (Clusium), appeared apparently to act as judge upon Ausfredus bishop of Siena, mentioned in a letter of pope Stephen III., May, 752, to Stabilis bishop of Arezzo. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. iv. 413; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. p. 189.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISULPHUS II., duke of Benevento, son of Romuald, and nephew of king Luitprand. His father died c. 731, when he was quite a child. An attempt was made to kill him, but the people of Benevento protected him. Luitprand then came and carried him off for a while to his court at Pavia, placing another nephew, Gregory, in the duchy. Gregory died in 739, and Godescalc became duke, but on the arrival of Luitprand, three years after, he prepared to fly to Constantinople, but before embarking was killed by the Beneventans. Gisulf then became duke of Benevento in 742. His gifts and concessions to the monasteries of Alife, S. Vincenzo on the Volturno and others, range from September, 742, to the beginning of 751, in which year he probably died. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. n. 553-643 passim. Oelsner, König Pippin, excurs. i. p. 444; Paulus Diaconus, vi. 55-58.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISULPHUS, bishop of Cajazzo in Campania, a. 776. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xx. 62.) [A. H. D. A.]

GISVALDUS, confessor, companion, and disciple of St. Dysibod, accompanied his master to Belgium, and flourished A.D. 664, but Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 313) refuses the suggestion of Leslaeus (de Reb. Scot. lib. iv. p. 154) that he lived at Fulda. [J. G.]

GIULFUS (BIULFUS), ninth bishop of Strasburg, said to have ruled in the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. v. 779; Potthast, Biblioth. Suppl. p. 414.) [R. T. S.]

GIUSTILIANUS. [GISTLIANUS.]

GIVERICUS (GIVERINUS), bishop of Mentesa (nr. Jaen), before 646. He sent a deacon, Ambrosius, to represent him at the seventh Council of Toledo, A.D. 646 (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 423; Esp. Sagr. vii. 259). [PARDUS.] [M. A. W.]

GIZOLARIUS, priest. [GISLARIUS.]

GLADUSA, Welsh saint. [GWLADUS.]

GLAINDIUBAIR (GLAINDIBUR, 'Ann. Ult. A.D. 766), abbat of Laraghbrine, co. Kildare, died A.D. 767. (Four Mast., by O'Donovan, A.D. 762, i. 365.) [J. G.]

GLAPHYRA, virgin, of Amasea, Jan. 13. She appears to have been in Licinius's household at Nicomedia, and afterwards at Amasea, where she became acquainted with Basileus the bishop, assisted him, with the help of Licinius's wife, who was Constantine's sister, to build a church at Amasea, and at last suffered death with him about the beginning of the 4th century. Her Acta are given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 13 Jan. i. 771-2) from the Acta Martyrū S. Basilei Episcopi Amaseae; see also Assemani (Act. Martt. Occid. et Orient. pt. ii. 216), but they do not amount to history. [J. G.]

GLASANUS (GLASSICUS) is commemorated at Oct 1, in Mart. Doneg., and may be the same as the Glassicus, whom St. Patrick left at Kilglas, when that saint was preaching in Dalaradia, co. Antrim, and was being opposed by the sons of Coelbadius. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 147 c. 131, 182, n. 207; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 338.) [J. G.]

GLAUCIAS, an alleged interpreter (ἐρμηνεύς) of St. Peter, who was claimed as the instructor of BASILIDEA. (Clem. Al. Strom. vii. 17, p. 898.) [G. S.]

GLAUCUS, bishop of Alii (Alini), in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 393; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 809.) [L. D.]

GLEWIS, lay witness to a grant by Erb, king of Gwent and Ergyng, to St. Dubricius and the see of Llandaff (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 318). He may be the same as Glywys of Glewissig (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 309). [GLYWYS (2).] [J. G.]

GLIN-MAUR, i.e. magni-genu, surname of Eata of Northumbria. [EATA (3).] (Hist. Nennii in M. H. B. 75 B.) [C. H.]

GLIUUSUS, GLIVISSIUS, GLIVISUS, Welsh chieftain, the father of Gwynllyw Filwr (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 145; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. 87, 88). [GLYWYS (2).] [J. G.]

GLODWY, clerical witness to grant of Cner Riou, near Monmouth, by king Athrwys, son of Ffernwaël, to bishop Cadward (Catgwarett and the see of Llandaff in the 8th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 464.) [J. G.]

GLORINUS, bishop of Junce, in Mauretania Caesariensis, and supposed to have been primate of that province, was banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Vict. Vitens. Notit. 59; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 193.) [R. S. G.]

GLORIOSUS (1), Donatist bishop of Migispa, or Migirpa, in proconsular Africa, at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 126.) [H. W. P.]

GLORIOSUS (2), bishop of Ostia, contemporary with Gregory the Great, who addressed a letter to him and other bishops. (Lib. ix. indict. ii. Ep. 25. Migne, lxxvii. 964.) [A. H. D. A.]

GLORIOSUS (3), bishop of Camerino, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 866.) [A. H. D. A.]

GLORIUS, a person to whom, in conjunction with Eleusius and Felix, St. Augustine addressed two letters. In the first of them the name Grammaticus is added, and other persons are mentioned, though not by name. [ELEUSIUS (3).] (Aug. Epp. 43, 44.) [H. W. P.]

GLOWYBWY, clerical witness to a grant by king Rhys, son of Ithael, to bishop Cadward (Catgwarett) and the see of Llandaff in the 8th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 465.) [J. G.]

GLUIGIUS, Welsh chieftain. [GLYWYS (2).] 2 X 2

GLUNSLACH, son of Costamhail. O'Clery suggests that this saint, who was of the race of Irial, son of Conall Cearnach, and lived at Sliabh-Fuaid, a mountain near Newton-Hamilton, co. Armagh, may have been a famous outlaw, who forsook his evil ways, joined himself to the company of St. Coemgen, and died in sanctity, being commemorated on the same day as his master, June 3. Colgan had a Life in preparation for that day. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 145; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 373.) [J. G.]

GLUVIAS (GLUVIANUS or GLUVIACUS), ST., the saint of a parish which includes Penryn, in Falmouth harbour. It is possible that the name is connected with that of Glywys Cerniw in the 6th century (Rees's Welsh Saints, 114, 233, 268). [C. W. B.]

GLYCERIA—May 10. Virgin and martyr at Trajanopolis in Thrace, under Sabinus, the president in the time of Antoninus Pius, or of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 138–180. She seems to have challenged the martyr's fate. When the president was sacrificing, she publicly reproved him, for which she was tortured and cast to the beasts. She converted her guard, Laodicius, who suffered with her. (Bas. Menol.; Surii Vitae SS. 10 Mai.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. iii. 189–192; Dodwell, Dissert. Cyprian. xi. de Paucit. Mart. sect. 33–38.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIA, martyr with Anna and Theodato; commemorated on Oct. 22. They embraced the Christian faith on witnessing the sufferings of bishop Alexander, and shared in his martyrdom. (Basil. Menol. i. 134.) [C. H.]

GLYCERIUS (1), April 23. Martyr with Donatus and Therinus in A.D. 303. (Acta SS. Boll. April. iii. 164.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIUS (2), Dec. 18. Presbyter and martyr under Maximian. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIUS (3), Jan. 14. Deacon, martyr at Nicomedia. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 423.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIUS (4), June 8. Martyr at Antioch with Hesperius and Sosistratus [HESPERIUS]. (Wright, Syrian Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 427.) [G. T. S.]

GLYCERIUS (5), a deacon in Cappadocia, who caused Basil much annoyance by his extravagant and disorderly proceedings circ. 374. Glycerius being a vigorous young man, well fitted for the humbler offices of the church, requiring actual labour, and having adopted the ascetic life, was ordained deacon by Basil. The name of the church he served is doubtful. It is given in different MSS. as Venesa, Veësa, Venata, and Synnasa. His elevation turned the young man's head. He at once began to neglect the duties of his office, and gathered about him a number of young women, partly by persuasion, partly by force, of whom he took the direction, styling himself their patriarch, and adopting a dress in keeping with his pretensions. He was supported by the offerings of his female followers, and Basil charges him with adopting this spiritual directorship as a trade, that he might get his living without work. The wild and disorderly proceedings of Glycerius and his deluded adherents created great scandal in his own city and neighbourhood, which caused him to be gravely admonished by his own presbyter, his chorepiscopus, and finally by Basil himself. Glycerius, however, turned a deaf ear to all, and having swelled his fanatical band by a number of young men, he one night hastily left the city with his whole troop, many of the girls being compelled to join him against their will. The scandal of such a band wandering about the country under pretence of religion, singing hymns, and leaping and dancing in a disorderly fashion, great in itself, was increased by the fact that a fair was going on at the time, so that the young women were exposed to the rude jests of the lowest rabble. The fathers who came to rescue their daughters from such disgrace were driven away by Glycerius with the utmost contumely, and he carried off his whole band to a neighbouring town, of which a certain Gregory was bishop; who this Gregory was is uncertain. Garnier is inclined to believe that it was Gregory Nazianzen (among whose letters the correspondence concerning Glycerius is found, as well as in the letters of Basil), though he allows that there is much in favour of Gregory Nyssen (Vita S. Basil. c. xxxi. § 4). Gregory not only allowed Glycerius and his motley band to remain unchallenged, but appears to have been disposed to regard him with some degree of favour. On this Basil wrote to him narrating the whole circumstances, and shewing how little Glycerius deserved any consideration. He requested him to order Glycerius to return at once with his whole band of virgins. If he did this, and brought commendatory letters from Gregory, he might depend upon lenient treatment; if he refused to obey, Basil begged Gregory to send back the virgins, or at least to enable those who desired it, to free themselves from Glycerius' spiritual tyranny. If Glycerius continued obstinate he threatened that he should be removed from the ministry (Basil, Epist. 169 [312]). At the same time Basil wrote to Glycerius himself, promising to deal with paternal kindness towards him if he would return at once, and send to their homes the disciples whom he was leading not to God but to the abyss (ibid. 170 [314]). Their return being still delayed, Basil wrote again to Gregory, hinting that his unwillingness to compel them to come back might be due to some desire to carry favour with others, or to some unfriendly feeling towards himself, and begged him to put all such feelings aside and induce them to return without any apprehension. If they continued obstinate he washed his hands of them. (Ibid. 171 [313].) The further issue is not known. [L. V.]

GLYCERIUS (6), bishop of Milan between Martinianus and Lazarus, cir. A.D. 432–440 (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 49; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 109, 301). Ennodius dedicates a short poem to his memory (carm. 82 in Pat. Lat. lxiii. 349). [C. H.]

GLYCERIUS (7), 2nd bishop of Conserans, following St. Valerius and succeeded by Theodorus, subscribed the council of Agde (A.D. 506), and is said to have died in 548. (Gall. Christ. i. 1125; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 337, Flor. 1739–98.) [S. A. B.]

GLYCERIUS (8), emperor of the West, afterwards bishop of Salona. In March 473, being at that time comes domesticorum, he asserted the imperial title at Ravenna in succession to Olybrius; but the emperor of the East, Leo I. the Thracian, set up Julius Nepos in opposition, who was proclaimed at Ravenna late in 473 or early in 474, marched against Glycerius and took him prisoner at Portus. (See art. GLYCERIUS in the Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog.) It is the episcopate of Glycerius that claims the chief notice in this work. He has been reckoned bishop of Portus, of Milan, and of Salona. The Chronicon of Marcellinus Comes under the year 474, states that Glycerius "imperio expulsus, in portu urbis Romae ex Caesare episcopus ordinatus est, et obiit" (Patr. Lat. li. 931); on the strength of which passage he has been named bishop of Portus, as by Paulus Diaconus, who writes: "Portuensis episcopus ordinatur" (Hist. Misc. lib. xv. in Patr. Lat. xcv. 973 B). Ughelli (who calls him Gulcerius) assigns him to that see between Petrus and Herennius, and Cappelletti does the same (Ug. Ital. Sac. i. 111; Capp. Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 497). This conclusion from the doubtful language of Marcellinus might pass were there no other statements to be considered. Evagrius, for instance, relates (H. E. ii. 16) that Nepos appointed Glycerius bishop of the Romans ἐς Σάλωνας, scarcely however intending to say, as Canisius understands him, that Glycerius was made bishop of Rome. He must mean (writing as a Greek) that Glycerius was ordained bishop for Salona by the Roman ecclesiastical authorities, that his see belonged to the Roman or western part of the empire, and to the Roman patriarchate rather than the Byzantine. Jornandes likewise states that Nepos "Glycerium ab imperio expellens, in Salona Dalmatiae episcopum fecit" (Jorn. de Reg. Succ. in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script. t. i. p. 239 B). It is therefore best to understand with Canisius (note on the passage in Evagrius, vid. Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. pt. 2, p. 2546) that the deposition of Glycerius took place at Portus, where at the same time he was ordained to the see of Salona. So also Farlati understands (Illyr. Sac. ii. 117-120). It should be remarked that the principality of Dalmatia belonged to Nepos independently of the imperial title. Thither he retired before his successful competitor Orestes, and then was brought into contact once more with Glycerius. Photius (Biblioth. cod. 78) mentions the now lost Byzantine History of Malchus the Sophist as stating that Nepos having divested Glycerius of his Caesarian authority and invaded "the empire of the Romans," clericated Glycerius, made him a bishop, and finally perished by his machinations (insidiis petitus), not "assassinated" as stated by Gibbon. Farlati assigns six years to the episcopate of Glycerius, placing his death in 480.

The supposition that the ex-emperor was bishop of Milan rests on very slender ground. Ennodius bishop of Pavia, who dedicates short poems to several successive bishops of Milan, inscribes one of them to bishop Glycerius, whom he places between Martinianus and Lazarus (carm. 82, in Patr. Lat. lxiii. 349); but there is nothing in the verses to identify him with the ex-emperor. Ennodius likewise, in his Life of Epiphanius bishop of Pavia, mentions the emperor

Glycerius as shewing so much veneration for that saint as to accept his intercession for some people in the diocese of Pavia, who had incurred the imperial displeasure (Ennod. Vit. Epiphan. in Patr. Lat. lxiii. 219 A). These are the sole grounds on which Gibbon hazards, though doubtfully, the statement (Decl. and Fall, vol. iv. p. 295, ed. Smith) that Glycerius was promoted by Orestes from the see of Salona to the archbishopric of Milan in reward for his assassination of Nepos. [C. H.]

GLYCON, bishop of Caesarea, in Palestine. His name appears in the catalogue of bishops who accepted the decision of the council of Chalcedon. He signed through a representative, Sozimus or Zosimus "episcopus Minoidensis" or "Edinensis." (Labbe, Concil. iv. 83, 788.) [E. V.]

GLYWYS (1) Cerniw, son of Gwynllyw Filwr, and founder of a church at Coed Cerniw, now Coedkernew, co. Monmouth, in the 6th century. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114, 233.) [J. G.]

GLYWYS (2) (GLEWIS, GLIUSUS, GLIVIS- SIUS, GLIVISUS, GLUIGIUS), ap Tegyd ap Cadell (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114), was father of Gwynllyw-Filwr [GWYNLLYW (2)], and "nobilissimus rex Australium Britonum" (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 145). He is supposed to have been chieftain of a district called from him Glewissig, probably including parts of the present counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth; according to the legend, he married Gwladus, or Gladusg, daughter of Brychan, and was father of seven sons, of whom Gwynllyw was the eldest (Rees, ib. 145, 309), and amongst whom his sovereignty was divided at his death. Williams (Emin. Welsh, 174) numbers him among the Welsh saints, and says he founded the church of Machen in the hundred of Wentllooge, Monmouthshire (Rees, ib. 449 n.) [J. G.]

GNATHNAT (GNATNAD), called abbess of Kildare in Four Masters, and abbat by Tigernach, died A.D. 690. (Ann. Tig. eod. an.; Four Mast. A.D. 687.) [J. G.]

GNAVAN, disciple of St. Cadoc, probably a Briton. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 326.) [J. G.]

GNOSIMACHI (Γνωσιμάχοι). A sect who are said to have opposed all scientific theology (πᾶσι γνῶσει χριστιανισμοῦ) on the plea that nothing more is required of Christians than a holy life. Damascenus mentions it among those which arose after the emperor Marcian, A.D. 451-457. (Jo. Damasc. de Haeres. lxxxviii.; Migne, Patr. Gr. xciv. 758; Nicet. Choniat. Thesaur. Orth. Migne, u. s. cxxxix. 1095; Suicer, Thesaur. s. v.) [T. W. D.]

GNOSIS, one of the mythical beings who, in the Barbelite system described by Irenaeus (i. 29, p. 108), answer to the Valentinian Aeons. From her is represented to have sprung the "Tree," also called knowledge. With this is to be compared that part of the system of JUSTINUS (Hippol. Ref. v. 26) which counts the trees of paradise as angels, and in particular the tree of knowledge, as the angel Naas. In PISTIS SOPHIA also one order of celestial beings is designated as trees (pp. 18, 192). [G. S.]

GNOSTICISM. The zeal with which a learner commences the study of ecclesiastical history is not unfrequently damped at an early stage, when he finds that, in order to know the history of religious thought in the 2nd century, he must make himself acquainted with speculations so wild and so baseless that it is irksome to read them and difficult to believe that time was when acquaintance with them was counted as what alone deserved the name of "knowledge." But it would be a mistake to think too disdainfully of those early heretics who go by the common name of Gnostics. In the first place, it may be said in their excuse that the problems which they undertook to solve were among the most difficult with which the human intellect has ever grappled; namely, to explain the origin of evil, and to make it conceivable how the multiplicity of finite existence can all have been derived from a single absolute unconditioned principle. And besides, these speculators only did what learned theologians have constantly since endeavoured to do; namely, combined the doctrines which they learned from revelation with the results of what they regarded as the best philosophy of their own day, so as to obtain what seemed to them the most satisfactory account and explanation of the facts of the universe. Every union of philosophy and religion is the marriage of a mortal with an immortal; the religion lives; the philosophy grows old and dies. When the philosophic element of a theological system becomes antiquated, its explanations which contented one age become unsatisfactory to the next, and there ensues what is spoken of as a conflict between religion and science; whereas, in reality, it is a conflict between the science of one generation and that of a succeeding one. If the religious speculations of the 2nd century appear to us peculiarly unreasonable, it is because the philosophy incorporated with them is completely alien to modern thought. That philosophy gave unlimited licence to the framing of hypotheses, and provided that the results were in tolerable accordance with the facts, no other proof was required that the causes which these hypotheses assumed were really in operation. The Timæus of Plato is a favourable specimen of the philosophic writings which moulded the Gnostic speculations; and the interval between that and a modern treatise on physics is fully as wide as between Gnosticism and modern scientific theology. So it has happened that modern thought has less sympathy with heretical theories deeply coloured by the philosophy of their own time than with the plain common sense of a church writer such as Irenæus, which led him to proceed by the positive historical method, and reject what was merely fanciful and speculative. And it may be said that deeply important as were some of the particular questions discussed in the conflict between the church and Gnosticism, yet even a more important issue of that conflict was the decision of the method by which religious knowledge was to be arrived at. The Gnostics generally held that the Saviour effected redemption by making a revelation of knowledge, yet they but feebly attempted to connect historically their teaching with His; what was derived from Him was buried under elements taken freely from heathen mythologies and philosophies, or springing from the mere fancy of the speculator, so that, if Gnosticism had triumphed, all that is distinctively Christian would have disappeared. In opposition to them, church writers were led to emphasize the principle that that alone is to be accounted true knowledge of things divine which can be shewn by historical tradition, written or oral, to have been derived from the teaching of Christ and His apostles, a principle the philosophic justice of which must be admitted if Christ be owned as having filled the part in the enlightenment of the world which orthodox and Gnostics alike attributed to him. Thus, by the conflict with Gnosticism reverence in the church was deepened for the authority of revelation as restraining the licence of human speculation, and so the channel was marked out within the bounds of which religious thought continued for centuries to flow.

The plan of this Dictionary embraces an article on the name of every Gnostic teacher, and on every Gnostic technical term; consequently, the information which in some other works of the same kind is given in a single article on Gnosticism is in this work scattered through several articles. We only deal here with some general aspects of the subject, referring to the subordinate articles for details as to the special tenets of the different Gnostic sects.

Use of the Word Gnosticism.—In logical order we ought to begin by defining Gnosticism, and so fixing what extension is to be given to the application of the term, a point on which writers on the subject are not agreed. Baur, for instance, reckons among Gnostics the sectarians from whom the Clementine writings emanated, although on some of the most fundamental points their doctrines are diametrically opposed to those commonly reckoned as Gnostic; and his work on Gnosticism includes a discussion of the doctrines of Jacob Böhme, Schelling, Schleiermacher, and Hegel. We conform to more ordinary usage in giving to the word a narrower sense, but this is a matter on which controversy would be only verbal, Gnosticism not being a word which has in its own nature a definite meaning. If we speak, for instance, of Valentinians, we speak of a sect having a certain real unity, the members of which owned the authority of the same teacher, and held in common certain doctrines derived from him, and whose mutual relationship was recognised alike by themselves and by their opponents. But when we use the word Gnostic, we have no proof that the members of every one of the sects which we comprise under the name ever claimed the title for themselves or had it applied to them by others; with regard to those who did claim the title for themselves, we have no proof that they would have conceded it to the others whom we join with them under the same designation, or that they had any relationship with those others save that of being alike condemned by the church. There is no difficulty in naming common characteristics of the sects commonly called Gnostic, though perhaps none of them is distinctive enough to be made the basis of a logical definition. If we were to lay stress on the characteristic already noted, viz the failure of the Gnostic sects to offer satisfactory proof that their doctrines formed part of Christ's revelation, we might be forced to own that on this subject the difference between them and the church was not one of principle. They did profess to be able to trace their doctrine to the apostles. Basilides was said to have learned from a companion of St. Peter; gospels were in circulation among them which purported to have been written by Philip, Thomas, and other apostles; and they professed to be able to find their doctrines in the canonical scriptures by methods of allegorical interpretation which, however forced, could easily be paralleled in the procedure of orthodox writers. If we made our definition turn on the claim to the possession of Gnosis, and to the title of Gnostic, we should be forced to count Clement of Alexandria among the Gnostics and the First Epistle to Timothy among Gnostic writings; for the church writers refused to surrender these titles to the heretics and, claiming to be the true Gnostics, branded the heretical Gnosis as "falsely so called." If we fix our attention on the predominance of the speculative over the practical in Gnosticism, which, as Baur truly remarks, led men to regard Christianity less as a means of salvation than as furnishing the principles of a philosophy of the universe, we must allow that since their time very many writings have been published in the church which are open to the same criticism. We come very close to what we are in search of if we make the criterion of Gnosticism to be the establishment of a dualism between spirit and matter; and, springing out of this, the doctrine that the world was created by some power different from the Supreme God, yet we might not be able to establish that this characteristic belongs to every one of the sects which we count as Gnostic; and if we are asked why we do not count such sects as the Manichaeans among the Gnostics, the best answer is that usage confines the word to those sects which took their origin in the ferment of thought when Christianity first came into contact with heathen philosophy, excluding those which had clearly a later beginning.

The history of the use of the name is that a title of honour claimed by these sectaries for themselves, and at first refused them by their opponents, was afterwards adopted as the most convenient way of designating them. We have no reason to think that the earliest Gnostics intended to found sects separated from the church and called after their own names. Their disciples were to be Christians, only elevated above the rest as acquainted with deeper mysteries, and called γνωστικοί, because possessed of a Gnosis superior to the simple faith of the multitude. Probably the earliest instance of the use of the word is by Celsus, quoted by Origen, v. 61, where, speaking of the multiplicity of Christian sects, he says that there were some who professed to be Gnostics. There is no reason to suppose that Celsus would be careful that there should be no overlapping in his enumeration, and therefore the fact that other sects are in the same context mentioned apparently as distinct, which we should now count as Gnostic, does not warrant us in inferring that the word was then used in a narrower sense. Irenaeus (l. xv. 5, p. 104), speaking of the Carpocratians and in particular of that school of them which Marcellina established at Rome, says that they called themselves Gnostics. It is doubtless on the strength of this passage that Eusebius (H. E. iv. 7), quoting Irenaeus in the same context, calls Carpocrates the father of the sect called that of the Gnostics. In the habitual use of the word by Irenaeus himself it does not occur as limited to Carpocratians. Irenaeus, in his first book, when he has gone through the sects called after the names of heretical teachers, gives in a kind of appendix an account of a number of sects, in their general characteristics Ophite, but he does not himself use that name. He calls them "multitudo Gnosticorum," tracing their origin to Simon Magus, and counting them as progenitors of the Valentinians. And constantly we have the expression Basilidians, Valentinians, &c., "et reliqui Gnostici," where, by the latter appellation, the Ophite sects are specially intended. The form of expression does not exclude from the title of Gnostic the sects named after their founders; and the doctrine of the Valentinians is all through the work of Irenaeus a branch of "Gnosis falsely so called": yet it is usually spoken of less as Gnosticism than as a development of Gnosticism, and the Valentinians are described as more Gnostic than the Gnostics, meaning by the latter word the Ophite sects already mentioned. In the work of Hippolytus against heresies, the name is almost exclusively found in connection with the sect of the Naassenes or Ophites, and three or four times it is repeated (v. 2, p. 93; 4, p. 94; 11, p. 123) that these people called themselves Gnostics, claiming that they alone "knew the depths." Though Hippolytus believes Naassenes to have been their older, Gnostics their later, name, the probability is all the other way. The value which they attached to knowledge appears from their saying (pp. 95, 132) that the beginning of perfection was the knowledge of man, and the knowledge of God was complete perfection; see also the expressions in the Ophite hymn, p. 123. That the word, however, is used by Hippolytus in a wider sense appears from his giving the name to Justinus (v. 28, p. 159). The common source of Epiphanius and Philaster had an article on the Nicolaitans, tracing the origin of the Gnostics to Nicholas the Deacon (see also Hippolytus, vii. 36, p. 258, and the statement of Irenaeus [II. ii. p. 188] that Nicolaitanism was a branch of Gnosis). Epiphanius divides this article into two, making the Gnostics a separate heresy (Haer. 26). He gives several alternative names for them, and from the doctrines and language which he attributes to them it is plain that he had in view one of the Ophite sects. Several later writers have naturally followed Epiphanius in counting one of the branches of the sects now commonly known as Gnostics as constituting a separate sect of "Gnostics." It is plain from this sketch that ancient usage leaves a good deal of latitude to modern writers in deciding which of the 2nd century sects they will count as Gnostic.

Classification of Gnostic Sects.—For the same reason that we have thought ourselves able to decline controversy concerning the definition of Gnosticism, we have not found it necessary to make any classification of Gnostic sects, beyond the alphabetic arrangement of them forced on us by the plan of this work. Some general principles of philosophic classification may be easily agreed on, but when they come to be applied, it is found that there are some sects to which it is not obvious where to assign a place, and that some sects are separated whose affinities are closer than those of others which are classed together. A very important, though not a complete, division is that made by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 5) into the ascetic and licentious sects: both parties agreeing in holding the essential evil of matter; the one endeavouring by rigorous abstinence to free as much as possible man's soul from the bondage to which it is subjected by union with his material part; and refusing to marry and so enthrall new souls in the prisons of bodies; the other abandoning as desperate any attempt to purify the hopelessly corrupt body, and teaching that the instructed soul ought to hold itself unaffected by the deeds of the body. All actions were to it indifferent, for to the pure all things were pure; nay, it was a duty to set at nought restrictions only imposed by the commands of that Being who did the evil work of shutting up men's souls in matter. The division of Neander is intended to embrace a wider range of sects than that just described. Taking the common doctrine of the Gnostic sects that the world was made by a Being different from the supreme God, he distinguishes whether that Being was held to have acted in subordination to the Supreme, and on the whole to have carried out his intentions, or to have been absolutely hostile to the supreme God. Taking now into account the generally acknowledged principle that the Creator of the world was the same as the God worshipped by the Jews, we see that Gnostics of the second class would be absolutely hostile to Judaism, while those of the former class might accept as one of the stages ordained by the Supreme in the enlightenment of the world. Thus Neander's division classifies sects as they are not unfriendly to Judaism or hostile to it; the former class taking its origin in those Alexandrian schools where the authority of such teachers as Philo had weight, the other among Christian converts from Oriental philosophy whose early education had given them no prejudices in favour of Judaism. Neander, with a good deal of ingenuity, deduces from the opposite decisions on his fundamental point of distinction the leading doctrines of the schools on both sides, though in each case it is easy to see that he has chiefly in view the opinions of one representative sect, and that his descriptions do not equally apply to all the sects which he has joined together. In fact, the sects which are joined together in this classification are not those whose natural affinities are the greatest. Marcion is joined with the Ophites, while the Valentinians, who have a closer resemblance to the latter, are on the opposite side: Basilides is on one side, his later followers on the other. Baur improved on Neander's principle of classification by taking into account not only how the sects regarded Judaism, but also how they regarded heathenism. All regarded Christianity as the absolutely true religion, but the point of difference was whether they represented it as absolutely hostile to the two other systems, or whether they would recognise seeds of religious truth in each of these dispensations. Thus then he divides into (1) sects which were willing to allow Christianity to look with a certain countenance of friendliness both on Judaism and on heathenism, (2) which made Christianity look with absolute hostility on both, (3) which identified Christianity with Judaism while placing both in opposition to heathenism. The last class embraces only the sectaries of the Pseudo-Clementines; and it may be suspected that it was only in order to maintain the symmetry of his classification that Baur was led to count these as Gnostic at all. Setting these aside, it is found that the result of Baur's method is to place the school of Marcion on one side and all other Gnostic sects on the other, a classification which really carries us but a little way. Gieseler divides into Alexandrian Gnostics, whose teaching was mainly influenced by the Platonic philosophy, and Syrian strongly affected by Parsism. In the former the emanation doctrine was predominant, in the latter dualism. Undoubtedly the most satisfactory classification would be if it were possible, as Matter suggested, to have one founded on the history of the generation of the sects, distinguishing the school where Gnosticism had its beginning, and naming the schools which successively in different places altered in different directions the original scheme. But a good classification of this kind is rendered impossible by the scantiness of our materials for the history of Gnosticism. Irenaeus is the first to give us any full details, and he may be counted two generations later than Valentinus; for Marcus, the disciple of Valentinus, was resisted by one whom Irenaeus looked up to with respect as belonging to the generation above his own. On the other hand, the interval between Valentinus and the beginning of Gnosticism is likely to have been quite as great as that between Valentinus and Irenaeus. It has been already mentioned that we learn from Hippolytus that it was the boast of the members of the sect of the Naassenes that they alone "knew the depths": now we find that this same phrase, "knowing the depths," was also a watchword of the false teachers reprobated in the Apocalypse (Rev. ii. 24). We can hardly avoid the inference that the Naassenes of Hippolytus inherited a phrase continuously in use among heretical teachers since before the publication of the Revelation of St. John. Of the writers who would deny the pastoral epistles to be Paul's, a large proportion date the Book of Revelation only two or three years after St. Paul's death; therefore, whether we suppose or not that it was Paul who wrote of the "falsely called knowledge," it remains probable that heretical pretenders to Gnosis had arisen in Paul's lifetime. If we find reason to place the beginnings of Gnosticism in apostolic times, we have no reason for surprise that the notices of its origin given by Irenaeus, who wrote more than a century afterwards, are so scanty; and that the teachers to whom its origin has been ascribed, Simon, Menander, Nicolas, Cerinthus, remain to us shadowy or legendary characters. It follows that any conclusions we come to as to the order of succession of the early Gnostic sects and their obligations one to another, rest less on trustworthy historical evidence than on the critical sagacity of the modern enquirer, and consequently that such conclusions do not form a very secure basis of classification. Still, some general facts

In the history of the evolution of Gnosticism may be considered as fairly certain; and accordingly we are well disposed to accept as a whole the classification of Lipsius, and with him to count three stages in the progress of Gnosticism, even though with regard to particular sects there may be room for dispute as to what place in the division this or that sect is to be assigned. The birthplace of Gnosticism may be said to be Syria, if we count that word as including Palestine and Samaria, where church tradition places the activity of those whom it regards as the founders of Gnosticism, Simon and Menander. It may also be inferred from the use made of the Old Testament and of Hebrew words that Gnosticism sprang out of Judaism. The false teaching combated in the Epistle to the Colossians, which has several Gnostic features, is also distinctly Jewish, insisting, as it did, on the observance of sabbaths and new moons. The Epistles to Timothy and Titus, which deal with a somewhat later development of Gnosticism, describe the false teachers, whom they censure as "of the circumcision" as "professing to be teachers of the law," and as propounders of "Jewish fables." It is not unlikely that what these epistles characterize as "profane and old wives' fables" may be some of that Jewish Haggadah of which the early stages of Gnosticism are full. The story of Ialdabaoth, for instance, told by Irenaeus (i. 30), we hold to date from the very beginning of Gnosticism, if not in its present shape, at least in some rudimentary form, as may be inferred from the appearance of fragments of it in different Gnostic systems; in particular of the representation of the work of Creation as performed by an inferior Being who still fully believed himself to be the Supreme, saying, "I am God, and there is none beside me," until after this boast his ignorance was enlightened. The Jewish Cabbala has been asserted to be the parent of Gnosticism; but besides that the records of Cabbalistic doctrine are quite modern, and that any attempt to pick out the really ancient parts must be attended with uncertainty, the latest investigations have led to the result (see Lipsius, p. 270, and Grätz, referred to by him) that the Cabbala is certainly not older than Gnosticism, its relation to it being not that of a parent, but of a younger brother. If there be direct obligation, the Cabbala is the borrower, but many of the common features are to be explained by regarding both as branches from the same root, and as alike springing from the contact of Judaism with the religious beliefs of the farther East. Jewish Essenism especially furnished a soil favourable to the growth of Gnosticism, with which it seems to have had in common the doctrine of the essential evil of matter, as appears from the denial by the Essenes of the resurrection of the body, and from their inculcation of a disciplining of man's material part by very severe asceticism. Concerning these and some other affinities of Essenism and Gnosticism, see Lightfoot, Colossians, 119, seq. It may be added that the Ebionite sects which sprang out of Essenism, while they professed the strongest attachment to the Mosaic law, not only rejected the authority of the prophetic writings, but dealt in a very arbitrary manner with those parts of the Pentateuch which conflicted with their peculiar doctrines. We have parallels to this in theories of some of the early Gnostic sects which referred the Jewish prophetic books to the inspiration of Beings inferior to him by whom the law was given, as well as in the arbitrary modes of criticism applied by some of the later sects to the books of Scripture. What has been said as to the affinities of Essenism and Gnosticism sufficiently illustrates the growth of Gnosticism from Judaism when the latter was brought into contact with the mystic speculations of the East, whether we suppose Essenism to have been a stage in the process of growth or whether we suppose both to have been independent growths under similar circumstances of development. Lipsius notes as the characteristics of those sects which he counts as belonging to the first stage of Gnosticism that they still move almost or altogether within the circle of the Jewish religious history, and that the chief problem they set themselves is the defining the relation between Christianity and Judaism. The solutions of this problem at which they arrive are very various. Those Jewish sects whose Essenism passed into the Ebionitism of the Clementines regarded Christianity as essentially identical with Judaism, either religion being sufficient for salvation. These sects are quite orthodox in their theories as to the Creation, their utmost deviation (if it can be called so) from the received belief being the ascription of Creation to the immanent wisdom of God. Other Jewish speculators came to think of the formation of matter as accomplished by a subordinate Being, carrying out, it may be, the will of the Supreme, but owing to his finiteness and ignorance doing the work with many imperfections. Then came the theory that this subordinate Being was the God of the Jews, to which nation he had issued many commandments that were not good, though overruled by the Supreme so as to carry out His ends. Lastly came the theory of the Cainites and other extreme Ophite sects, which represented the God of the Jews as the determined enemy of the Supreme, and as one whose commands it was the duty of every enlightened Gnostic to disobey. With all this variety of results, these sects agreed in the importance they attached to the problem of settling the true relations of Judaism to Christianity. They do make use of certain heathen principles of cosmogony, but these such as already had become familiar to Syriac Judaism, and introduced not so much with the object of effecting a reconciliation between Christianity and heathenism as with the view of giving an explanation of the exact service rendered to the world by the publication of Christianity, the absolute religion. This is made mainly to consist in the aid given to the soul in its struggles to escape the bonds of finiteness and darkness, by making known to it the supersensual world and awaking it to the consciousness of its spiritual origin. Regarding this knowledge as the common privilege of Christians, the first speculators would count their own possession of it as differing rather in degree than in kind from that of other Christians; and so it is not easy to draw a sharp line of distinction between their doctrine on the subject of Gnosis and that admitted as orthodox. Our Lord had described it as the privilege of His disciples to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; later when His followers learned to know the doctrine of a suffering Messiah, and of the fulfilment of the types and shadows of the Mosaic law in the person of Jesus, they felt that the veil which was spread over the Jewish mind in the reading of the law had been removed for them, and that they enjoyed a knowledge of the meaning of the Old Testament Scriptures to which their unconverted brethren were strangers. This feeling pervades the Epistle to the Hebrews, and still more that of Barnabas. Another doctrine which Paul describes as a mystery formerly kept secret, but now revealed through his gospel, is the admission of the Gentiles on equal terms with the Jews to the inheritance of the kingdom of Christ. It was no part of orthodox Christian doctrine that all Christians possessed the knowledge here referred to in equal degree. It was owned that there were among the Christians some who required to be fed with milk, not with strong meat, and who had not their senses exercised by reason of use to discern between good and evil. We have quoted, Vol. I. p. 565, the distinction made by Clement of Alexandria between faith and knowledge. We hesitate therefore to say that the earliest Gnostic doctrine concerning the relations between faith and knowledge was specifically different from that of the church, the difference, as we believe, mainly turning on the character of what was accounted knowledge, much of the Gnostic so-called knowledge consisting in acquaintance with the names of a host of invisible Beings and with the formulæ which were useful in gaining their favour.

Gnosticism, in its first stage, did not proceed far outside the limits of Syria. What Lipsius counts as the second stage dates from the migration of Gnostic systems to Alexandria, where the myths of Syriac Gnosis came to be united to principles of Grecian philosophy. Different Gnostic systems resulted according as the principles of this or that Grecian school were adopted. Thus, in the system of Valentinus, the Pythagorean Platonic philosophy predominates, the Stoic in that of the Basilidians as presented by Hippolytus. In these systems, tinged with Hellenism, the problem of assigning the true place to Judaism in the history of the world's development drops into the background, the Jewish religion being not so much controverted or disparaged as ignored. The mythological personages among whom in the older Gnosis the work of creation was distributed are in these Hellenic systems replaced by a kind of abstract beings (of whom the Valentinian aeons may serve as an illustrative specimen) which personify the different stages of the process by which the One Infinite Spirit communicates and reveals itself to derived existences. In these systems, again, the distinction between faith and knowledge, which in the older system had been one of degree, becomes sharpened, the persons to whom faith and knowledge respectively are to serve as guides being represented as essentially different in nature. The most obvious division of men into classes would have recognised but two classes: a kingdom of light, and a kingdom of darkness. Probably, the need of a third class may have first made itself felt from the necessity of finding a place for members of the Jewish religion, who stood on a level so far above heathenism, so far below Christianity. The Platonic* trichotomy of body, soul, and spirit, afforded a principle of threefold classification, and men are divided into earthly (ἐλκεῖ or χοῖκοι), animal (ψυχικοί), and spiritual (πνευματικοί). In these Hellenic Gnostic systems, the second class represents not Jews but ordinary Christians, and the distinction between them and the Gnostics themselves (who are the spiritual) is made so to rest on an original difference of nature as to leave little room for human free-will. The mode of salvation by faith and corresponding works is disparaged as suitable only for the psychical, the better sort of whom may, by this means, be brought to as high a position in the order of the universe as their nature is capable of; but the really spiritual need not these lower methods of salvation. It suffices for them to have the knowledge of their true nature revealed to them, when they become certain of shaking off all imprisoning bonds and soaring to the highest region of all. It results from these theories that ordinary historical Christianity runs the risk of meeting the same fate in the later Gnostic systems that befel Judaism in the earlier. The doctrines and facts of the religion are only valued so far as under their veils can be made to appear the peculiar notions of Gnosticism; and the method of allegorical interpretation is now so freely applied to the New Testament as well as the Old that all the solid parts of the religion are in danger of being volatilized away.

The natural consequence of this weakening of the historic side of Christianity was the removal of all sufficient barrier against the intrusion of heathen elements into the systems; while their moral teaching was injuriously affected by the doctrine that there were certain who were secure of salvation by necessity of their nature and irrespectively of their conduct. In the third stage of Gnosticism, it struggles in various ways to avoid these faults, and so again draws nearer to the teaching of the Catholic church. Thus the DOCKETÆ of Hippolytus no longer divide mankind into two or three great classes; but allow of immense variety corresponding to the diversity of the ideas derived from the world of aeons, which each has received, while again they deny to none a share in our Lord's redemption, but own that members of different sects are entitled, each in his degree, to claim kinship with Jesus, and to obtain forgiveness of sins through Him. So again in one of the latest of the Gnostic systems, that of PISTIS SOPHIA, there is no assertion of an essential diversity of nature among men, but the immense development of ranks and degrees in the spiritual world, which the work referred to professes to reveal, is used so as to provide for every man a place according to his works. Once more, in the system of Marcion, the theory of essentially different classes of men is abandoned; the great boast of Christianity is made to be its universality; and the redemption which the Gospel brings is represented, not as the mere rousing of the pneumatic soul to consciousness of privilege, which as a fact it had all along possessed, but as the introduction into the world of a real principle of moral life through the revelation of a God of love forgiving sins through Christ.

In the account which we have just given we have closely followed Lipsius; but we shall now attempt to supply materials for constructing or testing any more general classification of Gnostic systems by giving under each head of doctrine, irrespectively of any theory, a classified list of the tenets of each. We can only touch lightly, however, on the systems of Valentinus and Marcion, these being too important to admit of satisfactory treatment except in separate articles.

Doctrine with Regard to the First Principle.—Irenaeus states that nearly all the heresies acknowledged the unity of God, and in almost identical words he describes several of the earliest of them as counting as the first principle one Father unknown to all; but their systems may be divided into (A) those which, as far as our knowledge of them reaches, do not proceed beyond the limits of the old Jewish monotheism; (B) those which contain some perverse development of the Christian Logos doctrine, and personify immanent attributes of deity so as to make them distinct entities; (C) those which imply a knowledge of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. To class A belong Saturninus, as far as our scanty knowledge of him extends, Carpocrates, Cerinthus, and the Ebionites, Cerdo and Marcion. To class B we refer Simon and Menander, who, according to Irenaeus, agreed in teaching that angels and archangels were not produced directly by the Supreme, but by his thought or conception [ENNOEA] personified and regarded as a female originating principle. The account given by Hippolytus of the system of Simon more plainly brings it under this class; for Hippolytus himself remarks the analogy between the Simonian doctrine concerning the six "roots" and the Valentinian theory of aeons. Basilides, according to the account of Irenaeus, belongs to the same class, interposing, as he does, between the unborn Father and the angels the abstractions Nous, Logos, Phronesis, Dynamis, and Sophia.^b These do not appear in the account of Hippolytus (see Vol. I. p. 271). The Barbelite system described by Irenaeus (i. 29) contains a richer growth of similar personifications, and the method culminates in the aeonology of Valentinus. To class C we cannot help referring the Ophite system described by Irenaeus (i. 30). It is scarcely possible to account except through the influence of Christian doctrine for the representation in this system of the first principle as threefold, consisting of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, though the Syriac use of a feminine noun to denote the last led to the description of the third principle as female, on which was founded some revolting mythology. In the Basilidian system as described by Hippolytus, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit have an equally prominent part. The system of the Peratae, who belong to the Cainite section of the Ophites, retains the doctrine of two male and one female principle, but the last of those is changed, the three being now Father, Son, and Matter; and this is substantially also the teaching of Justinus. The Naassenes, Sethites, and Docetae of Hippolytus, who all appear to be later than the Irenaeian Ophites, agree in ascribing triplicity to the first principle.

In the Ophite system, both as described by Irenaeus and Hippolytus, the name Man is given to the first principle. This has been connected with the Adam Kadmon of the Cabbala; but it seems to us likely that this phraseology took its origin from the title Son of Man which in the Gospels our Lord applies to Himself (see Irenaeus, i. 12, p. 59).

Creation and Cosmogony.—Philo (de Op. Mund.) had inferred from the expression, "Let us make man," of the Book of Genesis that God had used other beings as assistants in the creation of man, and he explains in this way why man is capable of vice as well as virtue, ascribing the origin of the latter to God, of the former to his helpers in the work of creation. The earliest Gnostic sects ascribe the work of creation to angels, some of them making use of the same passage in the Book of Genesis (Justin. Dial. cum Tryph. c. 67). Simon and Menander, according to Irenaeus, represent the world as made by angels, but these angels not themselves the immediate work of God, but springing from his consort Ennoea. Saturninus appears not to have used this refinement; his angels are represented as made by the unknown Father, and those who made the world are represented as seven in number. It is they who use the words, "Let us make man"; but not after their own likeness, but after the likeness of a form descending from above, of which the Supreme Power permitted them to get a sight. They were unable, too, to give their creature power to stand erect until a spark of life was sent down into him through the pity of the Supreme Power. The Basilides of Irenaeus teaches substantially the same theory of creation, except that he more distinctly places the world-making angels at an immense distance below the Supreme, teaching that there are many heavens with their rulers, and that it was only the angels of the very lowest heaven who framed this earth. With him agree Carpocrates, who taught that this world and its contents were created by angels, greatly inferior to the unbegotten Father, and Cerinthus, who, in like manner, taught that the world was made by a power far separated from, and ignorant of, the Supreme Power. The story of the work of the creative angels is told more fully by Irenaeus in his account of the Ophite system (i. 30). In the preceding chapter he had related the cosmogony of the Barbelite system, which is proved by a number of verbal coincidences to be only another and shorter version of the same story. This story agrees with the system of Simon in making the creative angels the immediate offspring of a female principle, and not of the Supreme God; but not, however, of the first female principle the Holy Spirit, but of a second derived from her, to both of which the name of Wisdom is given. In this myth no explanation is given of the first creation of matter, but the lowest regions are represented as occupied from the first by a chaotic world of seething waters.

^b Neander makes up the number seven by adding to the five mentioned by Irenaeus two other incidentally mentioned by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 28, p. 437); but we count this to be a very insecure combination, and the word Ogdoad seems to be used in the passage of Clement as a name of place, not of number.

Into these lower regions the second Sophia descends, prompted, according to one account, by a desire to find a consort, and thence is long unable to return, being detained by the waters which eagerly lay hold of the light which she brings with her (see also Hippol. v. 19, p. 139; viii. 9, p. 204). There she gives birth to a son, Protarchontes or Ialdabaoth, who in turn generates other angels, and who frames the lower world, all in ignorance of his mother, and unaware that he has any superior; for he cries "I am a jealous God and there is none other beside me." In this legend the story of the creation of man is told nearly in the same way as in the doctrine of Saturninus, but with this difference, that the spark of light to animate the first formed man is given not by pity of the superior power, but by his father Ialdabaoth, Sophia having so contrived it, in order that Ialdabaoth may thus be emptied of the light which he had received from her. And according to this myth the world's subsequent history is that of the plans by which Sophia contrives to recover from these lower regions the light which souls of men have inherited, and to effect its restoration to the heavenly regions whence it came. Neander (Ch. Hist. ii. 146) sees in this story of Sophia a mythological expression of the Pantheistic doctrine of an anima mundi, the source of all spiritual life, which reabsorbs into itself all that has flowed out from it. This tale of a descent and recovery of Sophia early established itself as a part of divergent Gnostic systems. It is the principal subject of the book Praxis Sophia, and it is worked out in much detail in the system of Valentinus, who added certain explanations and developments, besides founding on it an explanation of the origin of matter, the pre-existence of which seems to have been assumed in the earlier systems. The Cosmogony of the Basilides of Hippolytus has been sufficiently detailed (Vol. I. pp. 271 seq.). To the indications noted p. 277, from which it is inferred that the system there described is later than Valentinus, may be added the use of the text, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Hippol. vii. 26, p. 239; Clem. Strom. ii. 8, p. 446), which was employed by Valentinus with respect to the fear and conversion of Sophia (Hippol. vi. 32, p. 191); the use made of Ex. vi. 2, 3 (Hippol. ii. 36, p. 106; vii. 25, p. 238); the application of the title Demiurgos to the great Archon (vii. 23, p. 234); the use of the word ἀρχαία (vii. 26, p. 241); the technical use of the word révor in reference to the Hebdomad (compare vi. 32, p. 191, vii. 24, p. 237, Excerpt. ex Script. Theol. 36), and the doctrine of the "Great Ignorance" which has ascribed to beings to a who to them create them. noted, however Basilides th adopted for Gnosts. which seem Basilides ribed in the t, the whole old's history f what had been a confused mixture (Hippol. v. 21, vii. 27), the illustration that a young child possesses potentially the faculties which he afterwards brings into exercise (v. 19, vii. 237), and the use of the spreading of fragrances to illustrate the operation of the Spirit (v. 19, vii. 22). If there be obligation on either side it must be on the Basilidian; for the connexion of the Sethite system with the earlier Ophite systems is so much closer than with the Basilidian that we cannot conceive the last interposed between the former. We have noted under DOCTYAN the resemblance between the doctrines of that sect and of this Basilidian system.

Doctrines with respect to Judaism.—The doctrine that the Creator of the world is not the supreme God leads at once to the question, what then is to be thought of the God of the Jews, who certainly claimed to have created the world? This question is most distinctly answered in the doctrine of the Ophite system (Iren. i. 30). According to it he who claimed to be a jealous God, acknowledging none other, was led by sheer ignorance to make a false pretension. He was in truth none other than the chief of the creative angels, holding but a subordinate place in the constitution of the universe. It was he who forbade to Adam and Eve that knowledge by which they might be informed that there were superiors to him, and who on their disobedience cast them out of paradise. It was he who brought a deluge on mankind, from jealousy that they did not pay him due honour, though baffled by a higher power in his attempt to destroy them. It was he who made a covenant with Abraham, that if his posterity would serve him they should possess the earth; he who brought that posterity out of Egypt, and gave them a law by Moses. It was he who inspired the Pentateuch and some other parts of the Old Testament; the rest of the volume was inspired by his subordinate angels; but yet his mother Sophia had provided that each of the writers should give intimations of those higher truths whereof the God of the Jews Himself was ignorant. Accordingly these sectaries used the Old Testament, but in a very arbitrary way, finding in it where they could confirmations of their theories, and rejecting without scruple whatever made against them. Yet all this polemic against Judaism has the marks of being addressed to men brought up to reverence the Old Testament, and who needed theories to make them feel themselves justified to disregard it. In systems previously described by Irenaeus we find traces of the same theory, though not so fully worked out. Their common statement, already quoted, that the Creative power was far below the supreme God, and ignorant of him, implies a rejection of the Old Testament doctrine, which plainly ascribes the work of creation to the Supreme, as well as a charge of ignorance against him who inspired the claim. It may be inferred also that the knowledge which they professed to communicate contained a revelation of that higher power of which the Creator was ignorant. The doctrine ascribed by Irenaeus to Simon is in many points identical with that which he ascribes to Carpocrates. Simon is represented as teaching a transmigration of souls,* and a consequent detention of souls in these lower regions until they have learned to cast off the yoke of the angels who made the world. It is these angels who inspired the teaching of the Jewish prophets which must be disregarded by enlightened men, who will live as they please, knowing that the actions which have the reputation of being righteous are not really so in their own nature, but only through the arbitrary appointment of these angels. This language would lead us to think of a rejection not of Jewish practices merely, but of the ordinary rules of morality; and accordingly church writers agree in accusing the followers of Simon of gross licentiousness of conduct. Besides this freedom of living, magical charms were the means by which they and the kindred sects hoped to bring under their power the makers of the world. The Ophite formulae preserved by Origen (cont. Cels. vi. 31), and that of the Marcosians given by Irenaeus (i. 13), are specimens of the valuable secrets which this Gnosis had to communicate. Saturninus and Basilides are described by Irenaeus as agreeing in the doctrines that the God of the Jews was but one of the creative angels, and that the Old Testament owed its inspiration to different sources, as already related. The opposition to the God of the Jews reaches its extreme in the system of the Cainites, which glorified Cain, Esau, Korah, and the others who are described in the Old Testament as disobedient to God. A specimen of this doctrine is to be found in the fragments of Peratic teaching preserved by Hippolytus (v. 16). The heroes of the Peratae are Cain, who refused to propitiate with a bloody sacrifice the God of this world, who delights in blood, Nimrod the mighty hunter, and Esau, who got no blessing from the blind old man, but whose face, notwithstanding Jacob saw, as though it had been the face of God. But in this system the place of honour is given to the serpent. In the system which we have so often referred to, described by Irenaeus (i. 30), though commonly called Ophite, the serpent is the father of the mundane demons, and the enemy of the human race, though sometimes, by the overruling influence of Sophia, made the minister of good. It is to be observed, however, that the name Nous is given to him, which is the title which in other Gnostic systems is given to one of the primal emanations of Deity. But in the Peratic system the serpent is identified with the Son, and is made the mediator between God and matter; it was he who gave wise counsel to Eve; he was the serpent-rod by whose means Moses performed his miracles; he was the brazen serpent who saved those who believed on him from being bitten by the serpents of the wilderness; it was he in whose likeness it was said the Son of man should be lifted up. They pointed out what a high place the serpent held among the constellations of heaven, and how the same form could be traced in the anatomy of the human frame. (See also v. 9, p. 119; 19, p. 142.)

The account of Valentinus given by Hippolytus (vi. 35, p. 194) would imply that he completely rejected the Old Testament, whose writers, inspired by the Demiurge, were as ignorant as himself, even as the Saviour said: "All who came before me are thieves and robbers." But from the account of Irenaeus (i. 7) we learn that Valentinus made the same discriminating use of the Old Testament as the earlier heretics, ascribing part of it to Sophia herself, part to her spiritual seed, and only the remainder to the Demiurge. His system looks on the Jews as like the Demiurge, whose people they are, limited in knowledge, but not incapable of enlightenment and spiritual elevation.

Doctrine concerning the Nature of Man.—We have already given the story told by Saturninus of the animation of a previously lifeless man by a spark of light from above.⁴ With this myth he connected the doctrine, in which he was followed by almost all the Gnostic sects, that there would be no resurrection of the body, the spark of light being taken back on death to the place whence it had come, and man's material part being resolved into its elements. Saturninus is said to have taught the doctrine, antagonistic to that of man's free will, that there were classes of men by nature essentially different, and of these he counted two—the good and the wicked. The doctrine became common to many Gnostic systems that the human frame contained a heavenly element struggling to return to its native place. The Basilides of Hippolytus must be counted an exception, whose doctrine it is that things always tend upwards, and who therefore refuses to admit any real descent of a heavenly element from above. But he explains that things below can be affected by things above without any real contact, in the same way as Indian naphtha will light up while still at a considerable distance from the fire. This illustration was also employed by the Peratae (v. 17, p. 137), who also used the illustration that heavenly forms are imparted to material things in the same way that forms are transferred by a painter to his canvas without his removing anything from the objects which he draws. And this seems also to have been the Docetic doctrine (viii. 9, p. 264). The Saturninian twofold division of man's nature was soon replaced by a threefold. In the Irenaeian Ophite system Adam is described as having (1) a body, before the fall, light and spiritual, but after his expulsion from paradise dark, gross, and sluggish; (2) a soul (mundialis insufflatio) inspired by Ialdabaoth; and (3) the sweet savour of the sprinkling of light bestowed on them by the compassion of the mother Prunikos. The Naassene system (Hippol. v. 6) divides man's nature into the parts νοερόν, ψυχικόν, and χοϊκόν. The system of Justinus relates that there have been implanted in man's body two mutually hostile principles, the soul, derived from Eden, the source of all man's errors and misery, and the spirit given by Elohim, destined one day to be liberated. Valentinus completely followed the Ophite doctrine just mentioned. He counted man's bodily part as twofold—a hylic or subtle body, such as Adam was first created with, and a choical or gross earthly body, the "coat of skin" (see Vol. I. p. 313), with which he was arrayed after the fall; he besides ascribed to man the ψυχή derived from the Demiurge, and the πνεῦμα, derived from Acha-moth, which, without the knowledge of the have been also taught by Basilides (Clem. Strom. iv. 12, p. 600; Excerpt. ex Script. Theod. 23, p. 976, Origen, v. 1 in Rom. vii. 9, vi. p. 336, Lomm.).

⁴ A similar story is attributed by the Naassenes to the Chaldees (Hippol. v. 7, p. 97).

Demiurge, was through his instrumentality inspired into the spiritual seed. These "spiritual," however, are only an ἐκλογή from among men; they are certain of salvation, whatever be their actions, even as pure gold remains gold though it be rolled in the mire; next to them come the psychical, the use of whose free will will decide whether they shall rise to a higher or sink to a lower lot, and who may accordingly be divided into two classes; last of all are the hylic, who are incapable of salvation. In the consummation all that is merely material will be burned up; the purified ψυχή will rise to the highest position below the Pleroma; the spiritual seed leaving their ψυχαί outside shall enter, pure spirit, into the Pleroma, and there enjoy bridal union with the angels who there have their dwelling. Basilides appears to have agreed with Valentinus in making the difference between the elect and others to be one of nature (Strom. v. 1).

Redemption and Christology.—The Gnostic systems generally represent man's spirit as imprisoned in matter, and needing release. The majority of them recognize the coming of Christ in the days of Herod as a turning-point in human affairs, but if we ask in what way man's redemption is effected, the answers of almost all reduce the Redeemer's work to the impartation of knowledge and the disclosure of mysteries. With regard to the nature of Christ, we may place as holding the lowest view Justinus, who describes Jesus but as a shepherd boy commissioned by an angel to be the bearer of a divine revelation, and who attributes to him at no time any higher character. Carpocrates, too, makes Jesus a man like others, only of more than ordinary steadfastness and purity of soul, possessing no prerogatives which other men may not attain in the same or even higher degree if they follow, or perhaps surpass, his example. Besides furnishing an example, he was also supposed to have made a revelation of truth, to secret traditions of which the followers of Carpocrates appealed. At the opposite pole from those who see in the Saviour a mere man are those who deny his humanity altogether. We know from St. John's epistle that the doctrine that our Lord had not really come in the flesh was one which at an early time troubled the church. Saturninus taught that the Saviour had been man merely in appearance, and the doctrine attributed to Basilides by Irenaeus makes him to be a spiritual being, the first-begotten Nous, and his sufferings and crucifixion to be but deceptive appearance. Other schemes attribute to the Saviour a double personality, representing him as a real man temporarily inhabited by a messenger from the unseen world. Cerinthus, for instance, taught that Jesus was an ordinary man, though of unusual righteousness and wisdom, but that on his baptism a spiritual Being, Christ, in the form of a dove, descended on him; that at his crucifixion Christ departed, leaving Jesus to suffer and rise again. Our imperfect accounts of Simon of Samaria leave us in some uncertainty as to his doctrine. He is said to have taught a real descent of the supreme God into the world, and his conjunction with a real human personality, viz. his own. But he is said also to have taught a previous incarnation of the Supreme in Jesus, and to have given a docetic account of his sufferings. All other Gnostic systems make the heavenly person who assumes human form to be subordinate to the Supreme. The Irenaeus Ophites, for instance, agree with Cerinthus in distinguishing Christ from Jesus. Christ is brother to Sophia, of higher nature than his sister. He descends for her rescue and restoration, passing on his way through the seven heavens, and emptying their rulers of their power (see Vol. I. p. 424). Jesus is the son of the Virgin, divinely prepared beforehand as a pure vessel into which Christ might descend, purer, wiser, and more righteous than other men. At his baptism Christ united to Sophia descends into him, and enables him then first to work miracles. At the crucifixion Christ departs, leaving Jesus alone to die, but afterwards raises him up again, at least as far as his psychic and pneumatic parts, for the gross earthly body was left to be resolved into its elements. Jesus remains on earth for eighteen months instructing his disciples, and after that ascends to sit on the right hand of his father Ialdabaoth, unperceived by whom he unites to himself all holy souls, thus preparing the consummation of all things, which will arrive when Ialdabaoth is completely exhausted of his light, and all has been collected and united by Christ. The Valentinian theory, of which we shall speak in full afterwards, agrees with that just described in making the rescue of Sophia the primary object of the descent of Christus, and in the complexity which it attributes to the nature of the Redeemer. The system of Basilides, as described by Hippolytus, reduces redemption to a minimum, for it makes the progress of the world to its perfect state to be a natural process of evolution arising out of the properties which the seminal principles of things possessed from their first constitution. But yet it was the Saviour's necessary work to give the impulse needed for this development. This he did in the first place by the communication of knowledge. As the son of the great Archon caught the knowledge of supermundane things from the sonship above, and communicated it to his father, and likewise the son of the archon of the Hebdomad caught the like knowledge from the Ogdoad, and enlightened the Hebdomad with it, so the same light came down on Jesus, and enabled him to liberate the sonship entangled in the formlessness of this lower world, and to give it power to soar to that above. And in this system place is found for the work of the Saviour's Passion; for the most striking difference between the Basilides of Hippolytus and of Irenaeus is that the former acknowledges, the latter denies, the reality of the Passion. What was then accomplished is stated to have been the complete separation of the Saviour's component parts. His bodily frame, which belonged to the "formlessness" suffered, and there remained. His psychical part was resuscitated, and rose to the Hebdomad, whence it had come. So in like manner of that part of him which had been derived from the Ogdoad, and of that which had been derived from the liminary spirit, while the most subtle part of all passed into the supermundane regions. In this Jesus was the first fruits of creation, and it is by a separation such as this of the subtler from the grosser elements that the third sonship is enabled to ascend to its destined place.

Authorities.—The great work of Irenaeus against heresies is the chief storehouse whence writers, both ancient and modern, have drawn their accounts of the Gnostic sects. It was primarily directed against the then most popular form of the heresy of Valentinus; and it has thence not unnaturally happened that this form of Gnosticism has thrown all others into the shade; and that many modern writers when professing to describe Gnosticism really describe Valentinianism. Irenaeus was largely copied by Tertullian, who, however, on Marcionism ranks as an independent authority; by Hippolytus, who in his newly-recovered work against heresies adds to what he has taken from Irenaeus large extracts from his independent reading of Gnostic works, and by Epiphanius, who also gives a few valuable additions from other sources. The Stromateis of Clement of Alexandria, though provokingly desultory and unsystematic, furnish much valuable information about Gnosticism, which was still a living foe of the church when the work was written. The writings of Origen also yield much important information. The gleanings of matter not borrowed from Irenaeus to be had from later heresiologists are scanty, and of doubtful value.

We give the following list of modern works which have made valuable contributions to the knowledge of Gnosticism, omitting monographs on particular sects. Of the authors cited Neander, Baur, and Lipsius are those from whom we have learned most. The prolegomena to Massuet's Irenaeus (1710), Beausobre, Manichaeisme (1739); Mosheim, de Rebus Christ. ante Constantinum, 1753; Neander, Genetische Entwicklung, 1818; and Church History, vol. ii. 1825, and 2nd edition, 1843 (we refer to the latter work by the pages of the translation in Clarke's series); Matter, Histoire Critique du Gnosticisme, 1828, 2nd edition, 1843; Burton, Bampton Lectures, 1829; Baur, Christliche Gnosis, 1835; and Die christliche Kirche der drei ersten Jahrhunderte, 1853, 2nd edition, 1860; Möller, Kosmologie, 1860; Lipsius, the article "Gnosticismus" in Ersch und Gruber, 1860; Quellenkritik des Epiphanius, 1865, out of which arose some interesting discussion between him and Harnack, 1873 and 1875; Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 1875.

We do not think it necessary to give cross references to articles on the names of Gnostic teachers, as these are likely to be known to the reader, and the majority of them have already been mentioned in this article. On the relations between Gnosticism and Neo-Platonism see PLOTINUS.

GOALDUS. [EOALDUS.]

GOAR, Irish saint. [GUAIRE.]

GOAR, ST., a priest of Aquitaine, who settled on the Rhine, where the town now stands which bears his name, in the 6th century. His life, written, according to the common opinion, not long after his death, by an anonymous author, was first published by Mabillon (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. ii. 276-280, Paris, 1668-1701), and then by the Bollandists, with notes (Acta SS. Jul. ii. p. 333). Moved by the rudeness of the style and the command of his abbat, Wandelbert, a monk of Prüm (circ. A.D. 813-870), re-wrote and polished the old life, and added an account of the miracles performed by the relics of the saint under the first three abbats of Prüm down to the year 839, and an account of the consolidation by Pippin of St. Goar's cell with the monastery of Prüm. Wandelbert's work was first published at Mainz, in 1489, then by Surius (July vi.), and from another and fuller MS. by Mabillon. (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. ii. 281-299, Paris, 1668-1701.) The second book containing the miracles may also be found in Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 337. Kettberg is probably correct in his surmise that neither of these lives are earlier than the 9th century. His view is that the account is a mere legend written with a purpose, that of vindicating the pleasures of the table against ill-natured asceticism. (Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. 481-2.) However that may be, the narrative teems with fable and chronological difficulties, and is, historically, almost valueless. The story is, that in the days of Childebert, son of Clovis (511-558), there came from Aquitaine a man endowed with all the noblest qualities, named Goar, son of Georgius and Valeria, and took up his abode upon the Rhine, between Oberwesel and Boppard, with the sanction of Felicius, then bishop of Treves. (No bishop of this name is found in the records of the see.) Here he built a little church, and furnished it with relics of the Virgin and other saints. He passed his days in fasting, prayer and all good works, made converts among the surrounding heathen, and hospitably entertained passing strangers, his habit being, after celebrating religious service early in the morning, to eat with the traveller and the poor who came to him. But in the quaint language of his biographer, the devil, taking it hardly that a pearl of such price should be in a German town, stirred up the bishop of Treves, now Rusticus, to send messengers to spy out whether they could find any new or vain thing. Upon their slanderous report that he spent his days and nights in gluttony, they were sent back again to summon St. Goar to Treves. On his way, by a somewhat grotesque miracle, he delivers his enemies from death by hunger and thirst. Brought before the bishop, he is accused of eating and drinking in the early morning, and the bishop proposes to try him whether he is from God or the devil. The test proposed is that he should cause a foundling, three days old, to declare its parents. The child's mouth is opened, and it declares Rusticus to be its father. The bishop overwhelmed with shame falls at the saint's feet, and confesses his sin. Goar exhorts him to repentance, and imposes on himself seven years' vicarious penitence. Sigebert, king of the Franks, hearing of these things, summons him to his presence, and would put him in the place of Rusticus, but the saint refuses during the bishop's lifetime. With difficulty he obtains permission to return to his cell on the plea of reflection, where he remained for seven years. At the end of that time the king's messengers find him sick of a fever, and still firm in his refusal. He lived three years and three months longer, and was then carried off by fever at a good old age (according to Mabillon, circ. 649). He was buried where he died, and, as he had directed, by two priests named Agrippinus and Eusebius, together with a great company. He is commemorated July 6, on which day he is mentioned in the martyrologies of Wandalbert, Bede, Usuard, and Ado. The first notice of his cell occurs towards the close of the 8th century, when it was the subject of a contest between the abbat of Prüm and the archbishop of Treves, which was finally composed by Charles the Great. The present church was built 1444–1469, and restored in 1843. In addition to the authorities cited above, see the Observationes Praeviae in Boll. A. SS. Jul. 2, 327–332, the Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 501–2; v. 378; and Herzog sub nom. His life is included in Baillet's collection. (Vies des Saints, Juillet 6, tom. v. 88.)

GOBALDUS (GEROBOLDUS), twenty-eighth bishop of Soissons, succeeding Galconus, and followed by Hubertus or Gerabertus, probably a little before the middle of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 339; Gams, Series Episc. 633.)

GOBBAN (GOBAIN, GOBAN, GOBHAN), a common name among the ancient Irish, and a form evidently of the Irish Gobha, a smith, and of Goban, their Vulcan or smith-god (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 221, 4th ed.). Under this name there are eight commemorations in the Martyrology of Donegal, and another Gobban was the most famous architect belonging to that early period in which he lived.

(1) Son of Nasc, commemorated March 17. Colgan (Acta SS., March 17, p. 63) has compiled the acts of St. Gobban and his two brothers, mostly from the life of St. Carthach Mochuda (May 14). About or before the year 620, St. Carthach was for some time at Inispict (the name is now obsolete, but the place was near Sherky Island or Inisbercan, beside Cape Clear, off the coast of Cork); on departing to Rahen, he left in his monastery three brothers, Gobban, Graphan (or Straphan), and Laseran, under the charge of bishop Domaingen. Gobban afterwards became a bishop, but whether to succeed Domaingen at Inispict, or to serve elsewhere, is unknown. [DOMAINGEN.] (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 15.)

(2) Abbat of Airdne and Ard-Dairinnsi, commemorated, March 26 and May 30. On these days the Mart. Doneg. commemorates severally the abbat of Ard-Dairinnsi, and the abbat of Airdne, but they probably represent one and the same person. Colgan attempts a memoir at March 26, of the "Abbat of Airdne-Dairinnsi," but is in doubt as to whether he was (a) the disciple of St. Ailbhe, who became patron of the church of Kinsale, which after his death was founded to his honour, or (b) the friend of St. Laserian, the abbat of Killamery, and possibly the founder of the monastery at Lelghlin or Old Leighlin, before St. Laserian came to settle there, and establish the see [GOIBNENN]; he evidently leans to the latter, but probably without good reason, though we have as little authority for identifying him with the former. Kelly (Cal. Irish Saints, 105) places Airdne-Dairinnsi "near Wexford, close to Beggery." (Colgan, Acta SS. 92, n. °, 715, c. 7, 750; Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 29.)

(3) Finn, of Cill Lamhraidhe and Tigh-dagobha, commemorated Dec. 6. Gobban Finn was son of Luighdech, of the Ui Liathan, who were descended from Oilill Olum. He is called "the father of a thousand monks," and is said to rest at Clonenagh, a townland near Mountrath, in Queen's County, but in the ancient calendars his name is more frequently connected with Cill-lamruidhe (now Killamery, co. Kilkenny) and Tigh-da-gobha (now Seagoe, on the Bann, in the barony of Oneilland East, co. Armagh); on the latter Dr. Reeves says, Seagoe, "Seasio Gobhae," was anciently called "the house of Gobha" or "the house of the two Smiths." He died A.D. 639. He is by some identified with the Gobbans of Ard-Dairinnsi (March 26) and of Tascoffin (May 23) [GOBBAN (2), and GOIBNENN]. The people of the old tribe district of Ui Caithrenn, round Killamery, are said by Aengus the Culdee to have placed themselves, their families, and their fortunes under him, i.e. under his patronage and invocation. (4) Saer. The personal history and lineal descent of Gobban Saer, the builder, are hid in the deepest obscurity, and legend has used his name so freely that some authors entirely question his ever having really existed or been other than a fancied embodiment and impersonation of ecclesiastical architecture as an art. Yet O'Curry, Petrie, Reeves, and other Irish authorities, accept him as a real historical personage, and the architect of churches and round towers in the sixth and seventh centuries, the very legends being vouchers for a certain basis of truth. So famous did his name become, that when a building was afterwards found of more than ordinary beauty, extent, or delicacy of workmanship, it could be attributed to none but Gobban Saer, so that what was put into the form of prophecy is likely to become true in fact, that "his fame as a builder in wood and in stone will exist in Ireland to the end of time," or, at least, of Ireland as a nation. His father appears to have been called Tuirbhi Traghamhar, i.e. Tuirbhi of the Strand (a place now known as the Strand of Turvey, on the coast of Dublin), but it is not known whether Gobban was a native or come of foreign descent. O'Curry thinks he was descended from Teige or Tadg, son of Cian, son of Oilill Olum, but Petrie rather inclines to the opinion that, while he was born at Turvey, he did not belong to the Scotie race, but that the very curious account of him, in the Books of Lecan and Ballymote, had best be interpreted as shewing that he was either of foreign extraction, and thus the inheritor of a better skill and style of architecture, or belonged to the race of the Tuatha De Dananna, who preceded and were driven out by the Scoti, and were always referred to as superior to the Scoti in the knowledge and practice of the arts. The tradition is generally accepted that he built the round towers of Antrim, Killala, and Kilmacduach, and in the legendary lives of the saints, like those of St. Maedhog (Jan. 31), St. Moling (June 17), and St. Ailbhe (Sept. 12), he is often introduced as the church-builder: according to the Life of St. Maedhog (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 247, 570) he owed his eminence, as an architect, entirely to the blessing of St. Maedhog. According to the tradition in the country (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 404, n. ^b) he was interred at Derrynavlan, a townland in the parish of Graystown, barony of Slieveardagh, co. Tipperary, and we find his name at Gobbin's Heir Castle (literally Gobban Saer's Castle, a church ruin in the townland of Drumeeny, parish of Ramoan, and barony of Cary, co. Antrim), and probably at Kilgobbin, a parish in the barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin. (Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 348, 380 sq. 404 sq.; O'Curry, Lec. Man. and Cust. Anc. Ir. iii. 34-45; Brash, Eccl. Arch. Irel. 155 sq.; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 285; Battle of Magh Lena (Celt. Soc.), 96 n.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Ass. Ir. 4 ser. i. 571 sq.; Rees, *Cambro-Brit. (5) Friend of St. Fursey, commemorated June 20. Starting from Bede's statement (Eccl. Hist. iii. c. 19) that, when St. Fursey left Britain, he gave his monastery at Cnobbersburg, now Burgh Castle in Suffolk, to the care of his brother St. Foilan, and of two priests, Gobban and Dicull, later writers have compiled or imagined lives of St. Gobban and the rest. [FURSEY.] The Scotch authors say he was an Albanic Scot, but he is more likely to have been Irish. Soon after the departure of Fursey, Gobban also passed into France, was some time at Corbeny and Laon, and finally took up his abode in a forest near the Oise, and built his cell and stately church dedicated to St. Peter, between Le Frere and Premontré, where he was highly honoured by king Clothaire III., and at last was put to death by some barbarians in search of treasure. The place of his martyrdom was first called Le Mont d'Hermitage, and is now St. Gobain. He must have flourished in the third quarter of the 7th century. He is usually commemorated on June 20, but Camerarius places him at Nov. 3, and Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. 304, 305) ascribes to him Acta Fursaci, lib. i. Epistola ad eundem, lib. i. (Butler, Lives of the Saints, June 20; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, June 20, vi. 280; Colgan, Acta SS. 88, c. 3, 92, n. ^e, et al.; Lanigan, *Ch. Hist. rated Feb. 11. Though her fame is great in Munster, remarkably little is known of her history. Colgan (Acta SS. Feb. 11, p. 315) has been able to draw together but a few details from the ancient Irish authorities, and the Bollandists (Acta SS. 11 Feb. ii. 507) place her name among their praetermissi. In the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 47) she is entered at Feb. 11 as both Gobnat and Cognat. St. Gobnait was of the race of Conaire, son of Modh-Lamha, monarch of Ireland, of the race of Heremon; she was born at Boirenn (called also Burneach, Baile Mhuirne, and now Ballyvourney, in the barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork), and is said to have been made abbess of the monastery there by St. Abban (March 16): (for the remains there, see Proc. Roy. Irish Acad. viii. 283.) She also had dedications at Ernuidhe (unidentified) and at Moinmor, now perhaps Moanmore, co. Clare, or more probably Moinmore, near Mallow, as it is specially said (Mart. Doneg.); "At Móin-mor, in the south of Erin, is her church." She had also a dedication on Insheer, in Galway Bay, and seems to have flourished in the beginning of the 6th century, but her date is very uncertain. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 17, § 4; Colgan, Acta SS. 315, 714; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. pp. xv. 73; *Mart. GOBRIANUS, ST., eleventh bishop of Vannes, succeeding St. Mereadocus and followed by St. Bilus or St. Cadocus. He is said to have died in A.D. 725, on the 3rd Nov., the day of his commemoration. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 919; Gams, Series Episc. 649.) [S. B. A.]

GOD. The first struggle in which Christians were engaged when they entered on the work of preaching the gospel to "the Gentiles," was that of maintaining the unity and power of GOD. We have abundant evidence of the character of this struggle in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the letters which St. Paul addressed to Gentile churches. He rejoiced in reminding the Thessalonians (1 Thess. i. 9) "how they had turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God." At Lystra, he had urged those who would have done him sacrifice "to turn from these vanities unto the living God who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein;" and at Athens he spoke to his hearers of "God that made the world and all things that are therein," and described Him as "Lord of heaven and earth." This truth must, of necessity, have been grasped before the Greeks and Latins and the rest could enter into the mystery of the Incarnation, or have any appreciation of the work of the Son of God; and accordingly we find one great object of the Christian Apologists was to displace the current beliefs of the ordinary Greeks and Romans as to the members of their Pantheon, and lead them up to a belief in one God, the Creator and Governor of the world. It was this effort that met with the bitterest opposition, and brought on the Christians the worst of persecutions. Again and again do we read in the Acts of the Martyrs that this was the testing question: "Would they submit to serve the daemons as all the nations did?"

Again and again the reply was this: "There is one God who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things therein, and one Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God. I will not sacrifice to any man; I will not sacrifice to daemons." The anxiety of Tertullian to avail himself of the popular phrases, "Which God grant," "If God will," as proving that underlying the more open popular conceptions was the deeper belief that there is one God, to whom all power belongs, and to whose will all men look, is evinced both in his Apology (§§ 17, 18) and The Testimony of the Soul. But the faith of the Christians of course refused to attribute any power, any will, to the objects of their neighbours' reverence; and because of this refusal they were tortured and put to death.

But the Christians had to meet, in connexion with this same subject of the creation, a difficulty from another quarter—the Gnostic heresies, whose origin was in the East. All these sects^a held that the world was not created by the supreme God, but was framed by inferior or hostile powers [see DEMIURGUS, Vol. I. p. 804, where the subject is discussed]. It was, undoubtedly, with reference to these divergent lines of thought—the imperfections of the Western philosophies, the vulgar conceptions of the ordinary Western mind, and the Gnosticism of the East—that the article became embodied in the creeds of all the churches, East and West, that GOD IS THE MAKER OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

But even the Christians who had been converted from Greek and Roman conceptions of the Deity, had need to pass through much before their faith in God could be enlarged and purified from earlier mistakes. Thus we find Origen assuming that all Christians held that there is one God, who created and arranged all things, and called all things into existence; but yet he deemed it necessary to contend that God is immaterial and incorporeal. "Some attempted to say, even twisting the declaration of our own Scriptures" (such as our God is a consuming fire, and God is spirit), that "He is a body." It is still one of the most difficult of problems to conceive incorporeal existence; but it is strange to find that a passage, which to us seems most distinctly to affirm such existence, was used in the 3rd century to support the opposite opinion. Origen's argument in support of the incorporeal nature of the Deity may be seen in the first chapter of his work De Principiis. He proceeds to uphold two further truths in regard to God which, to us, seem incontrovertible, but to which it thus appears that Christians were brought by pain and labour, viz. the singleness or simplicity of the Divine nature (natura illa simplex), and the impossibility of our measuring it. Again, God is incomprehensibilis atque inestimabilis.^b

Additional light is thrown on the history of the reception of these truer conceptions of God from the great and systematic work which Lactantius addressed to Constantine after his conversion. Lactantius takes up and reviews the chief arguments of his predecessors, combining them in one view. Thus he asserts that it is necessary that God is incompactibilis, perfectus, impassibilis, nulli rei subjectus. Neither is He subject to any necessity, for He is Governor no less than Creator. A few years later and we come to the Creed of Nicaea, embodying here the article of the Creed of Caesarea: "We believe in one God, Father Almighty, the maker of all things, both visible and invisible."^c A few years later bring us down to another systematic treatise—the collection of lectures addressed by Cyril of Jerusalem to the candidates for baptism. The fourth lecture contains brief teachings on God, on Christ, on the Birth from the Virgin, on the cross, &c. On GOD, the catechumens were taught that "He is one, alone uncreate, without beginning, incapable of change or mutability; not begotten by another, nor having any successor; not having commencement of life in time, or ever a termination of life." Cyril speaks (to reject it) of the thought that the Author of our souls is different from the Creator of our bodies. He teaches that God is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (who is God of God); that He is not contained in any place; that He is in all things and out of all things. Thus we may say that, before the middle of the 4th century, everything was taught explicitly of God which the church has been permitted to attain to, viz. that He is uncreate, unmeasured, eternal, Almighty.

The relations between the three Persons in the Godhead will be treated in the article TRINITY. The remainder of this article will be devoted to a more special consideration of the teaching of the Church concerning GOD THE FATHER.

Instances are so numerous in the Scriptures of the New Testament in which the name GOD, taken absolutely, is used of the Father, that we ought not to be surprised at finding that the same Name is used in the same way in all ages of the church. "God so loved the world that He sent His only-begotten Son;" "God raised Him from the dead." "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God." Often, too, we find that this Name is supplemented by the addition "the Father"—i.e. as we find it in our Creeds. Thus, "Paul an apostle—through Jesus Christ, and God the Father who raised Him from the dead . . . grace be to you, and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ." It was recognised that before all worlds, and when time was not, the SON was begotten of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God; and thus the Christian writers scrupled not to designate the Father as the origin ἡ ἀρχή, the cause ἡ αἰτία, the root and fountain ἡ πηγή καὶ πηγὴ of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Thus, whilst they held most firmly the equality, or rather the unity, of substance, power, and eternity in the three Persons of the Trinity, they scrupled not to assert that this power, essence, and eternity was given by the Father to the Son and Holy Spirit. So they interpreted the words, "As the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself:" so they appealed to the words, "The living Father hath sent Me, and I live ἀπὸ τοῦ Πατρὸς by the Father." Indeed some of the early writers understood thus the words of our Saviour, "My Father is greater than I"—greater, not in magnitude nor in time, but because the Son had His generation from the Father. Holding most firmly the unity of will, and the unity of essence, they felt no difficulty about expressions such as this, "The Son can do nothing of Himself." They adopted in its full meaning language such as this, "Whatsoever things the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son (ὁμοίας) in like fashion." [See HOMOUSION, TRINITY, TRITHEISM, and the various heresies bearing on the subject.] [C. A. S.]

^a Bardesanes, however, did not separate between the supreme God and the Creator of the world. On this ground Dean Mansel held that he must be considered as only partially a Gnostic. (Gnostic Heresies, p. 140.)

^b These words of Rufinus's translation seem to have come from Tertullian's Apologia, cap. xvii.

^c The creed of Caesarea had τὸν τὸν ἀσώτῳ ἀσώτῳ καὶ ἀσώτῳ πνεύματι. I suppose that τὸν ἀσώτῳ was deemed to be too wide; that it might even be quoted as including the Son and the Holy Spirit. The Nicene creed read πάντες in lieu of τὸν τὸν ἀσώτῳ.

GODA, a deacon who attests the act of archbishop Wulfred dated at Canterbury, April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

GODALSADUS, thirty-eighth bishop of Chartres, succeeding Flavinus and followed by Bernoïnus, perhaps towards the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1102.) [S. A. B.]

GODARDUS, bishop of Rouen. [GILDARDUS.]

GODEARDUS of Mainz. [GOTHARDUS.]

GODEBERTA, virgin, of Noyon; commemorated April 11. Vita S. Godebertae Virg. auctore, ut videtur, Ratbodo Episcopo, ex MS. Cathedralis Noviomensis, in three chapters, with introductory notes and a short appendix of his translation, is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii. 31-6), and her dedication occurs in Molanus (Usuard. Auct. 11 Apr. Antw. 1567), Usuardus (Mart. Auct. Apr. 11 and 13 ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 926, 931, 932), Wion (Lignum Vitae, 11 et 27 Apr. l. iii. 132, 148, Venet. 1595), and Menard (Mart. 11 et 27 Apr. pp. 31, 35, Par. 1629).

The Life, which is really part of a sermon, was probably preached on the saint's feast in the church of St. Godeberta, and is printed by Surius (De Prob. Sanct. Hist. 145-6, Cologne, 1618); the Bollandists say that a number of relics were preserved in her church, and especially a bell said to have been her own.

Her Life is of the usual type. She was born of noble and Christian parents at Amiens, and carefully educated. Refusing marriage, she was given by her parents to bishop Eligius at Noyon in the presence of king Clotaire, who presented her with his own palace and the chapel of St. George. There she lived and died, and her body was placed in her own church, which was afterwards dedicated to her memory. If she was contemporary with St. Eligius (bishop c. A.D. 640-659) this must have taken place in the time of the Frankish king Clotaire III. (A.D. 656-670), and the Bollandists say she flourished about A.D. 700. [J. G.]

GODEBERTUS of Chartres. [GAUSEBERTUS.]

GODEBERTUS, king. [GODEPERTUS.]

GODEFRIDUS. [GUNTFRIDUS.]

GODEGISELUS, one of the four sons of Gundeuchus, the second king of the Burgundians who died about A.D. 470. If we may believe the unfriendly testimony of Gregory of Tours and other Catholic historians, two of his brothers, Chilperic and Godomar, fell victims to the third, Gundobald [GUNDOBALD]. However that may be, in 494 Godegiselus was reigning over a part of the Burgundian territory, with Geneva for his capital, while Gundobald governed the remaining, and apparently the larger portion, from Lyons (Ennodius, Vita S. Epiphani, c. 12; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 375). When Clovis declared war against Gundobald and invaded Burgundy, in 500, Godegiselus fought on his side at Dijon against his brother. As the reward for his treachery to the Burgundian cause he was to be made sole king of the nation under the supremacy of Clovis. But Gundobald, though defeated in that battle, soon recovered his strength, and turned his arms against Godegiselus, who had entered Vienne in triumph, and was supported there by 5000 Franks, whom Clovis had left on his departure northward. Though, like his brother, an Arian, he seems to have made an attempt at this time to conciliate the good-will of the Catholics by founding a nunnery at Lyons. See a subsequent charter of the twenty-sixth year of Guntram, in the Gallia Christiana (iv. instr. i.), in which his name is written Gaudisellus, and cf. Binding, Das Burgundisch-Romanische Königreich, i. 160. Gundobald's forces, however, succeeded in taking the city, and Godegiselus, who fled for shelter to an Arian church, was killed together with the bishop, as was said, by his brother's hand. The authorities for his life, besides those alluded to above, are Marius Avent. Chron. in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 795-8; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 28, 32, 33, iii. prologus; Hist. Franc. Epitomata, xvii. xxii. xxiii. xxiv.; and Hincmar, Vita S. Remigii, l. Patr. Lat. cxxv. 1166. Implicit trust, however, must not be placed in Gregory's details, cf. Richter, Annalen, pp. 37-8.

[S. A. B.]

GODELBERTUS, according to Trithemius, author of an elegant poem in heroics upon the histories and allegories of Scripture entitled Allegoriae Scripturarum, from the beginning of the world to the Incarnation. He flourished A.D. 500. But there is great doubt as to his nationality, time, and works. (Trithem. de Script. Eccles. ff. 34; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 13, Wks. v. 528, 529, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 500; Tanner, Bibl. 329; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 225; Balaeus, Ill. Maj. Brit. Scrip. f. 27.)

[J. G.]

GODEMAR (GODOMAR, French GONDEMAR), the younger son of Gundobald, and sixth and last king of the Burgundians. His elder brother, Sigismund, fell a victim to the hatred borne his race by Clotilda, who excited her son Chlodomer to invade Burgundy. Sigismund fell into his hands, and was soon afterwards murdered with his wife and children. Godemar escaped, and was crowned king of the whole nation. A second campaign resulted in the death of Chlodomer at the battle of Véserance between Vienne and Bellay. Accounts vary as to which army won the day, but whatever the issue of that battle may have been, Godemar soon possessed himself of the kingdom, and established himself on the Burgundian throne (A.D. 524). Nothing further is known of him till A.D. 532, in which year Clotaire and Childebert led an expedition against Burgundy. With the flight of Godemar the line of Burgundian kings came to a close. Two years later the kingdom was divided between Clotaire, Childebert, and Theudebert. Godemar's end is unknown. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 5, 6, 11; Fredegar, Hist. Franc. Epit. xxxiv.-xxxvii., Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 589; Marius Avent. Chron., Migne, Patr. [S. A. B.]

GODEPERTUS (GODEBERTUS, GONDEBERTUS), left in 661, on the death of his father king Aripert, to divide the Lombard kingdom with his brother, Perthari. He reigned at Milan, his brother at Pavia. A quarrel between them soon broke out, and Godepert sent Garipald, duke of Turin, to get help from Grimoald, the powerful duke of Benevento. Garipald intrigued with Grimoald, advised Godebert to kill Grimoald as a traitor at their first interview, told Grimoald to expect treachery, who, therefore, murdered Godepert with his own hand, c. 662. (Paulus Diaconus, iv. 51.) Godepert left a child, Raginpert, whose son, Aripert II., ultimately became king of the Lombards at the beginning of the 8th century.

[A. H. D. A.]

GODESCALCUS (1), 34th archbishop of Sens, succeeding Wilharius and followed by St. Guntbertus (about A.D. 780). His place in the series and the fact that he was buried in the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif are all we know of him. (Gall. Christ. xii. 14; Gams, Series Episc. 629.)

[S. A. B.]

GODESCALCUS (2), deacon of Liège, who wrote the Life of St. Lambert, a former bishop of that see, at the request of his bishop, Agilfridus, the materials for which he derived in great measure from St. Theodorus, one of St. Lambert's disciples (s. 4). He added a small treatise on his miracles, and another, of which a fragment only survives, on the translation of his remains. These were published first by Canisius, then by Chapeauville, and lastly by Mabillon. The date at which he wrote, as fixed by internal evidence, was probably A.D. 729 or 730. (Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 57; Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. iii. 59-74, Paris, 1733.)

[S. A. B.]

GODESCALCUS (3), bishop of Osona from cir. 657 to cir. 678. Represents Egila at the eighth council of Toledo, and appears as bishop at the eleventh council, A.D. 675. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448, and iv. 145; Esp. Sagr. vii. 290.)

[M. A. W.]

GODESCALCUS (4), duke of Benevento, 739-742. He followed Gregory, nephew of Luitprand in the duchy, and when Luitprand appeared in 742 with his young nephew, Gisulf, son of a former duke, Godescalc prepared to fly to Constantinople, the natural refuge of all the enemies of the Lombards. He was however anticipated by the Beneventans and slain. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 56-57, Catalogus Regum Langob. et Ducum Ben. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 494.) In February 742 he gave judgment in favour of Desiderius, abbat of St. John, of Alife. His gifts to the monastery of S. Vincenzo, on the Volturno, are mentioned in 766. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. nos. 548, 857, iv. 85, v. 364.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GODESCALCUS (5), nephew of Agilulf king of the Lombards (591-616). He was carried off from Parma with his wife by Callinicus, patrician and exarch, and taken prisoner to Constantinople. (Paulus Diaconus, iv. 20.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GODESCALCUS, "dux Campaniae," receives a letter from Gregory the Great, asking his protection for a monastery. (Epist. lib. x. indict. iii. ep. 11.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GODINUS, bishop of Lyons. [GODWINUS.]

GODISVINTHA, queen. [GOISVINTHA.]

GODLAN, Welsh bard. [GOLYDDAN.]

GODO (1), thirteenth bishop of Verdun, between Hermenfredus and St. Paulus. According to Flodoard, he was present at the council of Rheims, presided over by Sonnatius, about A.D. 625. (Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 5. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 102; Mansi, x. 593; Gall. Christ. xiii. 1169.)

[S. A. B.]

GODO (2), ST., thirty-first bishop of Metz, between St. Goericus and St. Clodulfus. The name appears in a charter of king Sigebert II. for the construction of the monasterium Casagonguidinense, though his see is not mentioned (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 319). The catalogues are said to assign ten years and two months as the duration of his episcopate, but another account limits it to eight years. He died about the year 650, and was buried in the church of St. Symphorian. He is commemorated in his diocese May 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 306, Jun. ii. 128, 129; Gall. Christ. xiii. 699.)

GODO (3), ST., founder and first abbat of the monastery of St. Peter at Oye (Augia), in later times called after him St. Godonis (St. Gaud), in the diocese of Troyes. A late and unsatisfactory life of him was published by the Bollandists from a MS. of Andrew du Chesne (Acta SS. Mai. vi. 444). A great part of it is occupied with the acts of St. Wandregisilus, and seems to have been compiled from the life of that saint written by a monk of Fontanelle (cf. the Vita S. Wandregisili, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. v. 276). Godo was a native of the district of Verdun, and a nephew of St. Wandregisilus, who was a cousin of king Pippin. In company with his uncle, he resolved to quit the world, and the two retired to a monastery. The elder by example and precept, and the younger by zealous imitation vied in a life of devotion to God's service, and the Divine favour was attested by a miraculous voice from heaven. Before long, St. Wandregisilus, yearning for a lonelier habitation, obtained from a prefect named Erchinoald the gift of a retired spot, on which they founded the famous monastery of Fontanelle, so called from its many streams. Close at hand they also built the four churches of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Laurence and St. Pancratius, and Godo was despatched to Rome to obtain relics of these martyrs. He arrived there while Vitalian was pope (856-871), from whom he obtained the desired relics and numerous sacred writings besides. St. Ouen (640-673) was induced to consecrate the churches and a company of three hundred monks collected in the monastery. But Godo's desire was for seclusion, and accordingly he left Fontanelle and his uncle, and came to Oye, then lonely and remote from the world. Having obtained a gift of land, he built there a church, as well as his skill would admit, and after a life of abstinence and devotion died on May 26. The church was afterwards destroyed by one Asthemius, or in the other life mentioned below, Astannus, a prince of the Gentiles, probably the Northmen, in the 9th century, but was restored by a countess named Eva or Emma. The Bollandists add a short account of his miracles from another source (p. 446). Another life is published by Martene and Durand (Vet. Script. &c. Ampliss. Coll. tom. vi. p. 794) from a MS. of Breyer, a canon of Troyes. It differs from that of the Bollandists in some few details, and in the addition of some miracles. [S. A. B.]

GODO (4), twenty-third bishop of Toul, between Garibaldus and St. Jacob. In his time the city of Toul was burnt, and with it the privileges of the city and the charters and muniments of the church, but the bishop obtained their renewal from king Pippin. In A.D. 753 he was present at the consecration of Magdalveus, bishop of Verdun, and his death is placed two years later. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 966; Vita S. Magdalvei, viii., Boll. Acta SS. Oct. i. 534.)

GODO (5), thirty-first bishop of Poitiers, succeeding Gausbertus and followed by Magnibertus. The signature of a bishop Godo or Audo, but without any see appended, is found to a charter of privileges in favour of the monks of Gorze (A.D. 757), who may perhaps, as Le Cointe suggests, be identical with him. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1155; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 757, n. xxvi. tom. v. p. 565; Gams, Series Episc. 601.)

GODOBERTUS (GAUBERT, RODOBERTUS), twenty-first bishop of Angers, succeeding Aglibertus or Niulphus and followed by Gariarius or, according to Gams's list, Agilbert (?). He is said to have been buried in the monastery of St. Serge, which recognised him as one of its patron saints. From his place in the list he may have lived cir. A.D. 700. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 551, 641; Gams, Series Episc. 488; Tresvaux, Hist. de l'Eglise et du Diocèse d'Angers, i. 73, 74.)

[S. A. B.]

GODOLSATIUS (GODALSACIUS), a deposed bishop, with two others, Aldebertus a Gaul, and Clemens a Scot, mentioned in a letter of pope Zacharias to Boniface archbishop of Mentz, and described as "sacrilegi et contumaces exepiscopi" (Zach. Pap. ep. 9, in Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 939 b). Boniface is recommended to bring their case before a synod he is about to hold, and if the offenders then persist in asserting their innocence they are to be sent for trial to Rome. In the pope's tenth epistle Aldebertus and Clemens are mentioned without Godolsatius, their offence being that they gave themselves apostolic airs among the people, slighting synodal authority and the writings of the fathers. If these epistles are placed in chronological order, the inference would be that when the second was written, Godolsatius had submitted or was dead. Baronius (A. E. ann. 744 xviii.) places Ep. 9 under the year 744. Boniface held a council in 745, and Zacharias another at Rome in Oct. 745, in both which Adalbertus and Clemens were condemned as heretics, and Godolsatius omitted (Mansi, xii. 371-380). The same inference therefore would follow again. But Pagi and Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 187, Monum. Mog. 181), date Epistle 9 in 747, in which case Godolsatius must have joined the offending parties after their condemnation in 745 instead of before it. (See also Ceill. xii. 31.) [C. H.]

GODOMAR, king of the Burgundians. [GODEMAR.]

GODWINUS (GUDINUS, GODINUS, GADINUS), forty-second bishop of Lyons, between Lebuinus and Fulcoaldus. A few facts only of his life have come down to us. In 693 he consecrated Brihtwald archbishop of Canterbury (Bede, H. E. v. 8; A. S. C. ann. 693; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 693), for there can be little doubt that he is intended by "Godwino metropolitano episcopo Galliarum." In 695 he is said to have confirmed by his subscription the charter for the monastery of St. Columba, granted some years before by Emmo of Sens. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1168.) He was probably the bishop of Lyons who in 701 entertained St. Bonitus, bishop of Clermont, on his way to Rome, and was reconciled by him with the duke of Burgundy, and who, upon the same bishop's return thence, kept him with him for four years, and on his death, buried him in the church of St. Peter. Six years later, he refused to give up his relics at the request of Nordobertus, the then bishop of Clermont. (Vita S. Boniti, ss. 20, 28, 31, Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pars i. pp. 95, 97, 98, Paris, 1668-1701.) The date of his death is not known. (Gall. Christ. iv. 50.) [S. A. B.]

GOERICUS ABBO, bishop of Metz between Arnulphus, to whom he was related, and Godo. He was sprung from a noble family in Aquitaine, and followed the profession of arms, when in the reign of Theodebert he was unexpectedly smitten with blindness. It is said that in a vision of the night he was bidden visit the church of St. Stephen of Metz, and he should recover his sight. He went, accompanied by his daughters Precie and Victorina, was received by Arnulphus, visited St. Stephen's, and was restored. In token of his gratitude he founded a church at Metz, afterwards known as St. Peter Major near the cathedral. In 626 he was chosen to succeed Arnulphus in the episcopate, and died in 642 on Sept. 19, on which day he was commemorated. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 697.) This story is critically examined by Cleus (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 42).

[C. H.]

GOERICUS (GIRICUS, GERICUS, GUERICUS), twenty-eighth archbishop of Sens, following St. Wulframnus, who resigned the see. He is said to have been born of noble parents at Tonnerre. In A.D. 696 he subscribed the charter which Agirardus, or Ageradus, bishop of Chartres, gave to the monastery of St. Mary on the Loire (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1228; Mabillon, de Re Dipl. 408). He was buried in the church of St. Pierre le Vif, and was succeeded by his nephew Ebba. (Gall. Christ. xii. 11.)

[S. A. B.]

GOFEN, Welsh saint. [GOFEN, GOVEN.]

GOGAUN (GORGAN) is cited by Giraldus Cambrensis (Itin. Kamb. ii. c. 1, wha. vi. 105) as one of the twenty-five bishops of St. David's from St. David to Sampson, both inclusive. He is also called Gorgan (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155).

[J. G.]

GOGERINUS, Bishop of Beauvais, between Ribertas or Rigobertus and Anselinus or Anselmus I. His date may be about the middle of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 695; Gams, Series Episc. 511)

[S. A. B.]

GOIBALCH, GOIBALDUS, GOWIBOLT, bishop of Ratibon. (Hell. Acta SS. 8 Jan. i. 540 a; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 623.)

[GAMBALDUS (3).]

GOIBHNENN (GOWMAN), of Tigh-Scuithin, commemorated May 23. In the Mart. Tullaght the entry at May 23 is "Gobani Mairgi o Tigh Scuithin" (Kelly, Cul. Ir. Saints, xiv.), thus identifying his locality with Teach Scuithin on Slieve Mairgi, now Tascoffin in the Slieve-mary range of hills in the north of Kilkenny. He is supposed to have been the Gobban who gave his church at Old Leighlin, co. Carlow, to St. Legerian, when that saint returned from Rome about A.D. 625. He then betook himself to deeper retirement, and may thus have sought the solitude he desired among the Johnswell hills. Some would regard him as one with Gobban Finn (Dec. 6) of Killmory, but they are probably distinct, though no definite conclusion can be arrived at (GOWMAN (2), (3)). (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 15, § 9; Journ. Kilken. Arch. Soc. iv. 253, 254.)

[J. G.]

GOIDIL, abbat of Clonard. [GANDIDUAL.]

GOIMDIBLA, abbat. [GANDIDIBLA.]

GOISVINTHA (GUTHSVENTHA), married first to Athanagild, king of the Visigoths (554-567), and secondly to his great successor, LEUVIGILD (569-586), the last Arian king of Gothic Spain. She was the mother of the notorious Brunichild (Greg. Tur. iv. 38), and of Gaiselvintha (q. v.), the unfortunate first wife of Chilperic I. of Soissons. Gregory of Tours' mention of her marriage with Leovigild comes after that of the death of Liuvigild (573). It is clear, however, from the contemporary Spanish source, Joannes Biclarensis, that it took place in 569, immediately after Leovigild was made joint regent by his brother Liuvigild (J. Bicl. Esp. Sagr. vi. 376). From Gregory of Tours' account (H. Fr. v. 39), she was a passionate Arian, and took a large share in

Leovigild's eldest son by his first wife (see also LEUVIGILD and LEUVIGILUS), she was received by her grandmother Gaisvintha with great rejoicing, "who, however, did not suffer her to remain long in the Catholic religion, but began to persuade her with soft words to be rebaptized into the Arian heresy." On the persistent refusal of the girl of twelve (Brunichild and Sigibert were married in 566, H. Fr. iv. 28) to give up her Catholic profession, Gaisvintha is reported by Gregory to have proceeded to the utmost length of personal violence: "Haec illa audens, iracundiae furore succensa adprehensam per eunam capitula puellam in terram coadit et dix calcibus verberatam, ac sanguine ormentatam, jussit expellari, et piscinas immergi" (H. Fr. i. c.). The "piscinas immergi" has been variously interpreted. Wachter (art. LEUVIGILUS, Eruch and Gruber) supposes that the whole story arose from an attempt on the part of Gaisvintha to impose forcible rebaptism on her grand-daughter. In any case, it must be taken as a popular exaggeration of the actual discords which may very well have arisen in the Gothic royal family, when it was discovered that the Catholic princess could not be induced to accept Arianism as Brunichild and Gaisvintha had accepted Catholicism, and that the marriage, instead of a source of strength to Leovigild's government, threatened to become—as through the conversion of Hermenigild it actually did become—a source of danger and weakness. (Görres, Kritische Untersuchungen über den Aufstand und das Martyrium des Westgothischen Königssohns Hermenigild, Zeitsch. für Hist. Theol. 1873, i. 8, has analysed the probable sources and foundations of the report. Vid. Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 137, and Helfferich, A. Entstehung und Geschichte des Westgoth. Reichs, p. 11.)

The only hint given us by the Spanish sources of this attitude of Gaisvintha is contained in the ambiguous words in which Joannes Biclarensis describes the outbreak of Hermenigild's rebellion, "Nam eodem anno—Hermenigildus, factione Gaisvinthae Regine tyrannidem assumens," &c. Factione Gaisvinthae, unless we suppose Gaisvintha an error for Jugastha, as Flores does but apparently without MS. authority, can only mean here, "owing to the factional conduct of queen Gaisvintha," and refer to her position of hostility towards the newly married pair. (On this use of factio, conf. collection of instances made by Görres, l. c. note 45; Dahn, v. 137 note, and art. factio in Dictionnaire.) We know nothing of Gaisvintha's farther share, if any, in the circumstances attending this memorable revolt (see art. HERMENIGILD). But that at Leovigild's death she was still a considerable power in the state is proved by Recared's conduct with regard to her at the beginning of his reign, "Recaredus rex foedus inijt (i. e. supp. polit. actus Verbindung, Dahn, v. 159) cum Gaisvintha relicta patris sui, cuiusque ut matrem concepit" (Tur. ix. 1). Her influence as the mother-in-law and grandmother of Childebert II. was especially important to the new king, who was anxious to make peace with the Franks, and by her advice that he sent legates both to Liuvigild and Childebert immediately after his accession (l. c.), as it was also, no doubt, by her that his betrothal with Chlothsventha, his sister, was proposed as a lasting union.

amity and reconciliation. The alliance thus med between step-mother and step-son was, never, soon dissolved. In 588 we find Goisvintha implicated in one of the various Arian conspiracies which marked the early years of the Merovingians: "Uldila episcopus cum Goisvintha Reccaredo insidiantes Reccaredo manifestantur, et dei Catholicae communionem quam sub specie Christiana quasi sumentes, projiciunt publicantur." Quod malum in cognitionem hominum ductum Uldila exilio condemnatur, Goisvintha a Catholicis semper infesta, vitae tunc terminum dedit." This doubtful passage was commonly taken by the older Spanish writers to mean that Uldila and Goisvintha, after a feigned conformity to Catholicism, had been detected in the illegal treatment of the Eucharist (Morales, Historia, v. 10 (1791); Mariana, lib. v. 14). It is ridiculous this interpretation (l. c. 164 note), but is probably right in explaining the passage in a more general sense. The "vitae tunc terminum dedit" almost certainly refers to a natural death (Joannes uses the same expression with regard to the death of Tiberius II. l. c. p. 382), and has sometimes been interpreted by suicide (Elferich, Entstehung und Geschichte des Westens Rechts, p. 33). In any case, the conspiracy and death of the fanatical Arian queen, two years after that of her husband, the last and greatest of the Arian kings, and a year before the conversion council was to set the seal to the new order of things, to which she had been for a time forced to yield an unwilling submission, makes a link close to the reign of Leovigild. On the Welsh imagination Goisvintha has left scarcely less sombre impression than her daughter Enid upon that of France.

Greg. of Tours and Joannes Biclarensis are cited. Venantius Fortunatus, Carm. Hist. vi. Gelesvintha, apud Bouquet, ii. For general literature on the time, see references given under LEUVIGILD, and list prefixed to Abth. v. of Dahn's Die Völkung der Germanen. [M. A. W.]

GOLEU, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, mother of St. Kedad, in Llanestyn (or Llaneskin), is mentioned in the Pedigrees of Welsh Saints and in the Account of Brychan of Brycheiniog, but is identified with Goleuddyd. Welsh Saints, 600, 604; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 148.) [J. G.]

Goleuddyd, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, was at Llanhesgin (Llaneskin, Llanysgin) in Gwent, in the 5th century, and may be the same as Goleu, Gwawr, Goleuddyd, and Nefydd. (Myv. Arch. ii. 43; Welsh Saints, 148, 149; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 608.) [J. G.]

Golgus, monk and disciple of St. Columba, is thought to have ruled a monastery among the Scots, A.D. 606, and to have written Miracula sancti Magistri, lib. i. according to Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 31; Tanner, Bibl. 331). Hieronymus (de Scot. Fort. 164, and Kal. July) calls him abbat. He is probably the Colga, Colga, or Colcius, son of Cellach, mentioned by Adamnan in Vita S. Columbae. [COLGA (3).] [J. G.]

or July 13 (Cal. Byzant.). She was a wife of one of the chief magi, and in her sleep had revealed to her the happy condition of the just, from which she found herself excluded for not being a Christian, and the lost state of idolaters. She at once received baptism, on account of which her husband and the king had her tortured and put to death (Basil. Menol. iii. 164). Her story is narrated by Theophylactus Simocatta (Hist. v. 12), who says that she was born at Babylon, her father being a magus and a satrap, and that after her marriage she resided at Hierapolis (which must be the Syrian city, five days from Antioch towards Mesopotamia). The vision occurred to her in a trance, which suddenly fell upon her while at table with her husband. Evagrius (H. E. vi. 20) briefly notices the story, and states that the life of Golinduch was written by the elder Stephanus, bishop of Hierapolis. Nicephorus Callistus, who likewise relates the story (H. E. xviii. 25), gives her father's name Asmodech, and her mother's Muzuch. [C. H.]

GOLVENEUS (GOLVENAEUS, GOLVENUS) is described by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 317) as a Scotch hermit who left his own country and devoted himself to a life of contemplation in Armorica. On the death of St. Paul, bishop of Leon, he was appointed to the see about A.D. 600, and his feast was on June 23. He is said to have written Rituale Ecclesiae, lib. i. and Laudes Multorum Sanctorum, lib. i. (Tanner, Bibl. 332). But in the Gallican Martyrology his feast is July 1, and he is said to have died at Rennes, and been buried in the monastery of St. Melanias (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xiv. 3). Like other ancient saints, he is said to have been endowed with miraculous power, and a curious story is told of his having changed into gold some earth which a pious farmer had given him, and made from the gold a chalice, three bells, and three crosses (Arch. Cambr. 4 ser. ii. 272). In the Menologium Scoticum, Dempster commemorates "Golueneus Leonensis episcopus," with the significant addition, "nonnulli Scotum putant, sed ego delibero" (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 203, 204). In Bollandists' Acta SS. 1 Jul. i. 111-114, there is given Vita S. Golveni episcopi Leonensis, with a commentarius praevious relating to his country, acts, age, and cultus, and with annotations and list of miracles. [J. G.]

GOLYDDAN (GODLAN, GOLYDHAN), called bard of Cadwaladr, and his date A.D. 560-630. The historical poem Arymes Prydein Vawr (Myv. Arch. i. 156; Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. 436, ii. 123) is usually attributed to him, yet without assured authority, and Turner (Vind. Anc. Brit. Poems, 269) refers it to the 8th century. It is the earliest Welsh composition which mentions miracles done by a saint. Another poem is given him by Dr. Owen Pughe (Welsh Dict.; Skene, ib. i. 490 sq. ii. 294 sq. 450), but on what authority does not appear. His death, according to the Welsh Triads, was caused by one of the "three atrocious axe-strokes of the island of Prydain." (Rees, Welsh Saints, 68, 72; Myv. Arch. ii. 16, 22, 25; Stephen, Lit. Kymry, 207 sq.; Tanner, Bibl. 332.) [J. G.]

found among those of the Decretum Gondeberti (A.D. 810?). [GUNTINIMAR.] (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 184. Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324.) [POTAMUS.] [M. A. W.]

GOMARELLUS. Among the subscriptions to the council of Egara, A.D. 814, is found the name of Fructuosus, a deacon who signed as the representative of a bishop Gomarellus. The subscriptions do not express the sees of the subscribers, and the see of Gomarellus is therefore uncertain. It is however conjectured that he was bishop of Lerida, as it is supposed that the deacon Fructuosus is the same person as the bishop of Lerida of that name, who subscribes the acts of the fourth council of Toledo in A.D. 633, and that he succeeded Gomarellus. (Esp. Sagr. xvi. 104, Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 702.) [F. D.]

GOMBERTUS of Sema. [GUNTBERTUS.]

GOMIDAS, patriarch of Armenia (817-825), between John (called by Le Quien John the Orthodox, and by Saint-Martin John III.) and Christopher III. He was born at Aghtaita, in the canton of Arakadzodn, and was bishop of the anarchy of the Mamigonians before his call to the patriarchate (Saint-Martin, Mém. sur l'Arménie, i. 438). The Armenian historian, John the Mamigonian, states that for eight years he administered the monastery of St. John the Precursor, and was sent by the patriarch Abraham (594-600) to the Georgians or Iberians with the object of promoting a union with them (Langlois, Histoire de l'Arm. i. 361). He composed some beautiful hymns to St. Rhipsema, which Langlois says have been translated into Italian by Luigi Carrer, Venice, 1842 (Langlois, Armenian Monast. of St. Lazaro, p. 78). Le Quien, Ornes Christ. i. 1386) writes the name Chomitas, and makes him succeed Abraham, but gives no dates. [ARMENIANS.] [C. H.]

GOMMARIUS. [GUMMARIUS.]

GONDEBALD. [GUNDORALD.]

GONDEBERTUS (GUNTBERTUS, GOMBERTUS), ST., and martyr in the latter half of the 7th century. The earliest account of him is from Flodoard, who wrote in the 10th century. He was a noble, reared at court, and brother of St. Nivardus, the twenty-fifth archbishop of Rheims, who lived in the reign of Childeric II. (660-673). He was married to St. Berta, as his second wife, who also suffered martyrdom, though upon another occasion. The most authentic testimony of him was a deed with his signature, still preserved in the archives at Rheims in Flodoard's time, which recited a dispute between Gondebert and Raoul (St. Rieul), the successor of Nivardus, as to some property left by the latter. The archbishop asserted that it had all been given to religious foundations, for the salvation of the donor's soul, while Gondebert claimed it by virtue of relationship. It was settled by arbitration, on the terms of Gondebert house for nuns, dedicated to St. Peter, at one of the gates of the city, and founding with his own and others' contributions, the neighbouring monastery of Avannacum. Not content, however, with these good works, he left his wife, and went on a mission to the parts beside the sea (loci maritima), and there is said to have built a monastery, and to have had his head cut off by the barbarians. His widow, Berta, built a convent at Avannacum, a fitting spot being pointed out to her by an angel. But by an unfortunate oversight there was no supply of water within a distance of two miles, which rendered a fresh miracle necessary. At length she suffered martyrdom at the hands of the children of Gondebert's former wife. The crime was miraculously discovered and punished, and the penance imposed upon a niece of Gondebert, called Montha, who had been privy to it, was the task of transporting his body from the scene of his martyrdom to the grave of his widow. (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. 4; ii. 10; iii. 27; iv. 46, 47; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 35, 111, 252, 320.) The Bollandists publish a life of Gondebert, which they describe as extracted "ex antiquis officiis proprii lectionibus" (Acta SS. Apr. iii. 690), but except that it defines the object of his mission as the people living round the "orne Altissimii" (Oldensel), Frisia, it adds nothing to Flodoard's account but verbiage. Gondebert's day of commemoration is April 29. [S. A. B.]

GONDEBERTUS, king of the Lombards. [GONDEBERT.]

GONDEMAR, king of the Burgundians. [GONEMAR.]

GONDICAIRE, king of the Burgundians. [GONDICARIUS.]

GONDIOC, king of the Burgundians. [GONDIOCHUS.]

GONDOALDUS, eighteenth bishop of Meaux, following Baudewaldus and succeeded by St. Faro, or, according to one account by Waldebert (Vita S. Faronis, lx.; Acta SS. Benedict. ii. 616). It was he who at the instance of St. Eustace, the abbot of Lazenil, conferred the veil upon St. Faro or Burgundofara, and established her in a convent (circ. A.D. 614). He was present at the council of Rheims (A.D. 625 or 630), and probably died shortly afterwards. (Vita S. Eustacii, 2; Vita S. Faronis, lviii.; Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 117, 615, Paris, 1668-1701; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. x. 504, Florence, 1759-1798; Gall. Christ. viii. 1500.) [S. A. B.]

GONDOALDUS (GUNDOLDUS, GUNDOROLDUS), thirteenth bishop of Strassburg, succeeding Labyolus, and followed by Aldus, or according to Wimpfeling, by Gando. (Gall. Christ. vi. 780; Wimpf. Cat. Episc. Argent. 16.) He seems to belong to the second half of the 8th century. [S. A. B.]

DULFUS, third bishop of Laon, between and Etlmandus I. about the middle of the 9th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 510.) [S. A. B.]

DULPHUS, twenty-third bishop of Laon, succeeding St. Menulphus and followed by Perpetuus (589-596), is said to have been of a noble family of the country afterwards known as Lorraine. He added several churches to the city. There is a fable that he attempted to rebuild the city of Tongres, but God remembered the wrongs of his servant, St. Servatius, and a multitude of wolves came and tore the workmen in his very sight, while lightning and earthquakes undid the work as soon as done. He was buried in the church of St. Servatius. (Aegidius in Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium, ed. Chapeville, tom. i. pp. 61-63, Liège, 1612; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iv. 159; Gall. Christ. iii. 819.) [S. A. B.]

GONNARIUS, a Sardinian bishop, c. A.D. 740. (Gams, Series Episc. p. 833.) [R. S. G.]

GONOTIGERNUS, bishop. [HODIERNUS.]

GONSALDUS, bishop of Padua, c. 708. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 477; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 428.) [A. H. D. A.]

GOPNAT, virgin, commemorated Feb. 11. (Kal. D.wn. in Bp. Forbes's Kal. Scott. Saints, 5.) [GONNAT.] [J. G.]

GORDAS, king of the Heruli. [GROD.]

GORDIANUS (1). The reigns of the three Roman emperors who bore this name have little or no bearing on the history of the Christian church, and it will not be necessary to discuss with any fulness the circumstances which led to their accession and their fall. The reigns of father, son, and grandson were all comprised within a brief period of six years (A.D. 238-244). The first of the three, M. Antonius Gordianus, had the imperial title thrust upon him at the age of eighty. He had inherited large wealth, he was a man of wide general culture, a statesman and a man of letters, who as quaestor and aedile had distinguished himself by munificent liberality. He attained the honours of the consulship first in A.D. 213, as the colleague of Caracalla, and afterwards of Alexander Severus. A few years later he was appointed proconsul of Africa, and gained the favour of the provincials by his generous and equitable administration. The popularity thus acquired was eventually his ruin. The brutal ferocity of Maximinus, who had been chosen emperor by the troops in Gaul, on the assassination of Alexander Severus in A.D. 235, was felt in Africa as throughout the empire. The people of Tisdrus, where Gordianus was residing with his son, rose against the extortionate rapacity of the emperor's procurator, and those who had been marked out as his victims conspired to assassinate him. When the deed was done, finding no hope of safety save in the protection of a new emperor, they rushed to the house of Gordianus, threw a purple robe over him and saluted him with the title of Augustus. They were backed by the whole population of the city, and Gordianus, yielding a reluctant assent, was escorted to Carthage, and there received the title of Africanus. Letters were despatched by him to the senate at Rome, submitting his election to their approval. Their assent was given readily. Gordianus and his son were proclaimed as Augusti, Maximinus was declared a public enemy, his statues were thrown down, and his name ordered to be erased from all public monuments. The hopes of a reign of equity and peace were soon dashed to the ground. Capellianus, the procurator of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the new emperors, and led his disciplined legions against the unwarlike crowd of their adherents at Carthage. The younger Gordianus perished in the field, his father, on hearing of his death, died by his own hands. The whole tragedy of their brief reign lies between January and April, of A.D. 238. The third emperor of the name, the son either of Gordianus II. or of a daughter of Gordianus I., was a boy of fifteen at the time of their death. The senate, on hearing of what had passed at Carthage, determined to persevere in their resistance to Maximinus, and appointed Decimus Coelius Balbinus, and Marcus Clodius Pupienus Maximus, both of whom had been consuls, as joint emperors. The people, however, clung to the Gordian family, and the boy, who was at Rome, was presented to them, and proclaimed as Caesar. After the defeat and death of Maximinus at Aquileia at the hands of Pupienus in May, the conqueror returned to Rome. The praetorians and the troops generally, however, submitted reluctantly to rulers who had been chosen by the senate. They attacked the palace and murdered the two emperors, and both troops and senate agreed in accepting the young Gordianus as Augustus.

The short reign, which so far opened brightly, was soon clouded by disaster. The power of Sapor was threatening the safety of the Roman provinces on the Gordian frontier, and the emperor, after marrying Sabrina Tranquillina, the daughter of Misitheus, went, accompanied by his father-in-law, as prefect of the praetorium, to command the troops in person. The temple of Janus was thrown open with the usual ceremonies, and Gordianus proceeded through Moesia and Thrace, and Asia Minor. Sapor was defeated in several engagements, and compelled to evacuate Mesopotamia. The death of Misitheus, however, deprived the emperor of his only trustworthy counsellor. Philip the Arabian, who succeeded him in the emperor's favour, fomented the jealousy and discontent of the troops by secret artifices. They broke out in open revolt. The last of the Gordian house was put to death, and Philip was proclaimed as emperor. The popularity of the murdered prince was shewn by the fact that the senate decreed divine honours to his memory, and that a tomb with a polyglot inscription, in Greek, Latin, Persian, and Egyptian, was erected over his grave at Circesium. GORDIANUS, bishop of Jerusalem. [GORDIUS (1).]

GORDIANUS (2)—Sept. 13. Martyr under Licinius, A.D. 314. He was a Paphlagonian by birth, and a personal attendant upon the emperor, by whom he was beloved. After Licinius became hostile to the church he was banished into Scythia, where he was put to death by burning. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GORDIANUS (3)—May 10. Martyr with Epimachus at Rome, on the Latin Way, in the time of Julian. He was a vicarius, or vice-prefect, to whose care an aged presbyter, Januarius, was entrusted, and by whom he was converted. Remaining steadfast in the faith, he was executed. His acts are given at length in Mart. Adon., but are very corrupt. For instance, they represent Julian as present at Rome when emperor and persecutor of the Christians, whereas he never was there after he had declared war against the church. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Adon., Usuard., Wandalbert.; Kal. Allat.; Kal. Front.; Sacramentar. Greg. Mag.; Till. Mém. vii. 722; Ceillier, III. 418.) [G. T. S.]

GORDIANUS (4), grandfather of Fulgentius bishop of Ruspæ. He was a senator of Carthage, and on the invasion of the Vandals under Genseric, A.D. 428, fled into Italy with his family and there died. (Vit. Fulgent. cap. i. § 1, in Patr. Lat. lxx. 119.) [C. H.]

GORDIANUS (5), presbyter, father of pope Agapetus (Anastas. Bibliothec. Vit. Rom. Pontif. num. liz. p. 94, Patr. Lat. cxxviii. 551.) [C. H.]

GORDIANUS (6), a Roman disciple of St. Benedict, afterwards a companion of St. Placidus, living under his rule at Maseana. In 539 Placidus was taken captive by Mammuca the general of Abdallah, king of the Saracens. Gordian ministered to him in prison, and buried him after his martyrdom. The next year Gordian escaped to Constantinople, where he long lived, and by order of the emperor Justinian composed a Greek account of the martyrdom of St. Placidus and his companions. He afterwards returned to Sicily and there died. There is extant under his name in Latin Vita et Passio S. Placidi Martyris (Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. i. 42; Surius, de Prob. Hist. SS. t. iv. 5 Oct. p. 65; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 114). Ceillier observes that this story is now universally rejected, and that the life of Placidus betrays itself as a fabrication of a later date by reckoning forty-nine popes after Vigilius, which makes the Pseudo-Gratian live in the pontificate of John VIII (ob. 882). Cave accepts the genuineness of the work as a whole, regarding it as largely interpolated. (Ceill. xi. 349; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 523.) [C. H.]

GORDIANUS (7), father of pope Gregory the Great, was a noble Roman of senatorial rank, and descended from a pope Felix. (Joann. Diacon. in Vit. S. Gregorii; Greg. Dialog. i. 4, c. 18.) John the Deacon says that Felix IV. (A.D. 530) was his ancestor; but this pope being after death, as were his wife Silvia, and his two sisters, Tarsilla and Aemiliana. John the Deacon (Vit. Gregor. i. 4, c. 83) describes two pictures of him and his wife Silvia remaining to the writer's time (9th century) in the Atrium of St. Andrew's monastery, where they had been placed by St. Gregory himself, the founder of the monastery. Gordianus is represented as standing before a seated figure of St. Peter, with his right hand in that of the apostle, clothed in a chestnut-coloured planeta over a dalmatic, and with caligæ on his feet. He is tall, has a long face, green eyes, a moderate beard, thick hair, and a grave countenance. The portrait of Silvia is still more minutely described. She is seated, has a round and fair face, wrinkled with age, but shewing the remains of great beauty, large blue eyes, comely lips, a cheerful countenance. She wears a white colamen, drawn from shoulder to shoulder, and beneath it a tunic of colour described as pseudolacteus, falling in folds to her feet. On her head is a matron's mitra; her left hand holds a psalter, her right is making the sign of the cross; a scroll, twisted over the shoulders from elbow to elbow, bears the inscription, "Gregorius Silvie metri fecit." Gordianus, in the description of his portrait, is designated "Regionarius," from which title, as well as from his dress, Baronius supposes him to have been one of the seven cardinal deacons of Rome, it having been not uncommon, he says, for married men, with the consent of their wives, to embrace clerical or monastic life. As to the dress, he adduces two of St. Gregory's epistles (Ep. 113, l. i. ind. 2, and Ep. 28, l. 7, ind. 1) to show that the dalmatic and caligæ were then part of the costume of Roman deacons. But the meaning of the title "regionarius" is uncertain. It occurs in St. Gregory's Ep. 5, l. 7, ind. 1, in Ep. 3 of pope Honorius I. (regionarius nostræ sedis); in Aimoinus, de Gestis Francorum, pt. 2, p. 247 (regionarius primas sedis); in Vit. Ludovici Pii, son. 835 (regionarius Romanæ urbis); and in Anastasius, On Constantinians (Theophanes regionarius). In two of these instances, those from Honorius and Aimoinus, the persons so designated are expressly said to be subdeacons. It seems to have denoted an office connected with the city of Rome and the apostolic see, but certainly not one confined to deacons. Nor does the dress worn by Gordianus prove anything, since the articles are known to have been originally ordinary lay costume, the planeta, rather than the casula, having been worn by persons of rank. It is observable that St. Gregory too, in the portrait of him described by John the Deacon, as preserved in the same monastery, wears precisely the same dress, even to the colour of the planeta, being distinguished from his father only by having the pallium over it, to mark his ecclesiastical rank. [J. B.—y.]

GORDIANUS (8). There exists a letter purporting to be written by pope Deusdedit to one of this name. The old reading of the end of this letter was "Gordiano, Hypoepiscopo," which caused its authenticity to be doubted, as Deusdedit was pope from 315 to A.D. 618, and St. Isidore was bishop of Seville from A.D. 599 to A.D. 636. However, is a various reading, "Hispaniarum archiepiscopo," guided by which Migne reads "Hispalensis ecclesiae coepiscopo," which removes this difficulty, but others remain. The letter purports to be an answer to an inquiry as to what should be done in the case of parents who had by accident held their children at the font at baptism and thereby contracted affinity to each other. Deusdedit declares that they must separate from one another, and at the end of a year may marry other persons. Cardinal Mai has published (Spicilegium Romanum, vi. 473) a fragment of a letter said to be addressed by Gordianus to Deusdedit. This fragment, with the exception of two lines, is word for word the same as part of the letter of Deusdedit. It may be further observed that the rule as to dissolution of marriage laid down in the letter of Deusdedit is quite contrary to the doctrine of the church, so that the authenticity of these letters, which are the only evidence of Gordianus's existence, cannot be considered wholly above suspicion. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 361; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 646.) [DEUSDEDIT (8).]

[F. D.]

GORDIANUS (9) (CORDIANUS)—Sept. 17. Martyr at Nividunum (Nyon) with Valerianus and Macrinus. (Mart. Ad., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

GORDIUS (1), the thirty-third bishop of Jerusalem at the close of the 2nd century; the successor of Germanio. During his episcopate Narcissus, the calumniated bishop of Jerusalem, whose innocence had been made clear, reappeared from the desert, to which he had retired, and resumed the government of this see, at the urgent request of all. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 10; Niceph. Call. H. E. v. 10; Clinton, F. R. ii. 535, 556.) [E. V.]

GORDIUS (2) of Carthage. [DONATUS.]

GORDIUS (3)—Jan. 3. A military martyr under Licinius, A.D. 314. He was born at Caesarea in Cappadocia, and was a centurion when Licinius removed all Christians from posts of command in his army. (Neander, H. E. iii. 24, ed. Bohn.) He resigned his commission rather than offer incense, and fled into a desert, where his mind seems to have lost its balance, through desire of the martyr's crown. On a feast day in honour of Mars, he came into the circus of the city, where his wild shaggy figure attracted every eye, and, proclaiming his faith, he cried to them, "I am found of them who sought me not, I am made known to those who sought not after me." He was at once seized, tortured, and executed. (Bas. Menol.; Basil. Caesar. Hom. 18, in Migne, Patr. Graec. xxxi.; Ruinart, Acta Sincera; Ceillier, iii. 78.) [G. T. S.]

GORFAN. [GWORFAN.]

GORFYW, Welsh saint. [GWRFYW.]

GORGAN, reputed bishop of St. David's in the 8th century (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155). [GOGAUN.] [J. G.]

GORGONIA, the sister of Gregory Nazianzen, probably born before him, c. 326 (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. Greg. Naz. note iii.). She was married early to one whom her writer speaks of as worthy of such a wife, but we are ignorant of his name or profession. Baronius identifies him with Vitalianus, to whom Gregory addressed a poem, which does not present him in a favourable light (Greg. Naz. Carm. 51, p. 121). This conjecture is refuted by Tillemont (note xv.). According to Elias Cretensis (notae, p. 610), Gorgonia and her husband resided at Jerusalem, and had two sons, who became bishops. This is very doubtful. It is, however, certain that Gorgonia was the mother of three daughters, Aypiana, Eugenia, and (after her maternal grandmother) Nonna. Gorgonia was not baptized till a short time before her death, but previous to her last illness (Greg. Naz. Orat. 11, p. 188) she had the happiness of seeing her husband and children and grandchildren also admitted to the church by the same sacrament (ibid. pp. 180, 188). Her daughter Aypiana was married to a distinguished military officer named Nicobulus, and became the mother of several children, in whom Gregory took great delight. [NICOBULUS.] Gorgonia died in middle life, not long after her brother Caesarius, previous to the year 372 (Greg. Naz. Carm. ii. pp. 33, 35), leaving her aged parents who, as well as the other members of her family, were present at her decease, inconsolable for their loss (Greg. Naz. Orat. p. 188; Orat. 19, p. 316). Her brother Gregory pronounced her funeral oration, in which he draws a very highly coloured portrait of her (Orat. 11). The Roman church has placed Gorgonia on the roll of saints, and commemorates her on Dec. 8.

GORGONIUS (1)—Sept. 9. A chamberlain in the court of Diocletian, who was hanged at Nicomedia, with Dorotheus, at the beginning of the persecution, when all the imperial household were called upon to sacrifice in order to clear themselves from suspicion about the burning of the palace. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard., Notker, Wandalbert.; Eusebia E. H. lib. viii. cap. 6; Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 317; Till. Mém. v. 180.) Wright's Syrian Martyrology (Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 425) gives a martyr of this name at Nicomedia under Mar. 11, and as Mar. 11, 303, was near the beginning of the persecution, the two martyrs may be identical. [G. T. S.]

GORGONIUS (2), martyr with Indes and Petrus in the reign of Maximinian; commemorated on Dec. 28. They were seized as they stood beyond the burning pile on which the alleged 20,000 martyrs were consumed, and were drowned in the sea with stones fastened round their necks (Basil. Menol. ii. 65.) [C. H.]

GORGONIUS of Cinna. [GREGORIUS (4).]

GORGONIUS (3), bishop of Apollonia (Lopadium), in Bithynia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 696; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 613.) [L. D.]

GORGONIUS (4), eleventh bishop of Nola. He succeeded St. Priscus c. A.D. 328, and in 360 was succeeded by Quodvultdeus. (Remondini, Nolana Eccles. Storia, i. 637.) [R. S. G.]

GORGONIUS (5), bishop of Liberalia in Numidia, deprived of his church by the Donatists, but present at Carth. Conf. 411, though not at its commencement. (Mon. Vet. Don. 133.)

[H. W. P.]

GORGONIUS (6), bishop of Germanicia in Commagene, a Confessor, who, according to some MSS. of Jerome's Chronicle, assisted Lucifer of Cagliari, together with Cymatius of Paltus, or perhaps of Gabala, in Syria Prima, in his ill-advised consecration of Paulinus to the bishopric of Antioch, A.D. 362. (Hieron. Chron. p. 256 in Patr. Lat. viii. 692.) [E. V.]

GORGONIUS (7), bishop of Vanda, in Lycania; his name is found subscribed to the document of the synod of Constantinople to the Patriarch John concerning the condemnation of pervers of Antioch, and his party, A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1050; La Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 1077.) [L. D.]

GORMAN, Celtic form of GERMANUS.

(1) Of Cill-Gorman, in the east of Leinster, commemorated Oct. 25 (Mart. Domag.), and found among the Bollandists' praetermissi (Acta SS. 25 Oct. xi. 388). He was founder and abbat of Killgorman, bar. Gorey, co. Wexford, and Kel. Drummond Oct. 25 (Sp. Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, 26), has the feast of "Sancti Gormani confessoris et peregrini et sanctissimi viri."

[J. G.]

(2) Coarb of St. Mochta at Louth, and father of Torbach, coarb of St. Patrick [at Armagh] (Four Mast. A.D. 758). It is added in Ann. Tig. A.D. 758 that he abode for a year at the entrance to St. Fingen's well at Clonmacnoise, died in his pilgrimage, and was buried there (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. ii. 254; Colgan, Acta SS. 736, c. 5; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 270).

[J. G.]

GORMGHAL appears to have been an intruding bishop or abbat at Armagh, as the Four Mast., A.D. 794, say he succeeded Faindelach, and we know that at that time there was a struggle for the primacy, Dubhdalath being the acknowledged successor (Stewart, Armagh, 94). The Ann. Inisf., A.D. 793, call him "mac Dindathaig."

[J. G.]

GOEMLAITH, daughter of Fleithlaith, abbess of Clonbroney, co. Longford, died A.D. 815 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 810, i. 423).

[J. G.]

GORNIAE, called also GORNAS and GUONIAS, and said to have baptized St. Patrick. He was a priest and blind, but received his sight by ablution in the baptismal water. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 11 c. 3, 16 n. 2, 21 c. 3, 65 c. 2, 118 c. 4; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, iii. 481.) [J. G.]

GORTHENI (Γορθένης), a sect mentioned by Hegesippus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 22); called Γορθένης by Epiphanius (Anacrat, 12), and likewise Γορθένης by Epiphanius (Panarion, i. 12), and Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 1). Epiphanius classes them among the Samaritans, and Theodoret derives them from Simon Magus. They were so called from their founder Gorthenus.

[T. W. D.]

GORTHEUS, heretic (Sophron. Ep. Syn. in

GOSACHUS of Granard. [GUARACHT.]

GOSBERTUS, thirty-second bishop of Geneva, between Lutherus and Walterus, or Gualterus. From a letter of pope Stephen III. written, A.D. 770, to Charles and Carloman, it appears that a bishop Gausibertus had headed an embassy to him from those princes. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 249.) This Gausibertus may be identical with Gosbertus of Geneva. He cannot at any rate be, as has been suggested, Gausbertus of Chartres, whose date is fixed by the charters he subscribed a century earlier [GAUSBERTUS]. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 384) quote the Feder San-Petrus to the effect that his episcopate lasted sixteen years. [S. A. B.]

GOSCELINUS. [GAUSCULANUS.]

GOSOLDUS of Padua. [GOSALDUS.]

GOSPELS APOCRYPHAL. Besides our four canonical Gospels a large number of other writings circulated in early times containing either complete narratives of our Lord's life on earth or particular sections of the history. The great majority of these literary products were either interpolated editions and re-castings of our canonical Gospels or additions and appendices to them. The former class subserved for the most part the party objects of various heretical sects which had separated from the Church, the latter were largely in use among Catholic Christians, though these also, in part at least, originated in heretical circles. Many of these writings reach as far back as the 2nd and 3rd century; and some of them, as for instance the Gospel of the Hebrews, are of no little importance for the investigation of the origin of our New Testament Canon. Alas! scarcely the tenth part of this once extensive literature has come down to us; we possess complete texts only of some Gospels of the Childhood, and of the so-called Acts of Pilate, and even these no longer in their original form.

The Catholic Church, while making most extensive use of the apocryphal Acts of Apostles, was much more reserved in relation to the apocryphal Gospels. Narratives of the deeds and sufferings of the apostles, after being purified so far as possible from heretical ingredients afforded welcome nourishment for pious curiosity; but apocryphal enlargements of the historical details contained in our gospels were long regarded with great distrust, and then adopted only so far as they referred to the Protevangelium, the histories of Joseph and Mary, our Lord's nativity, and the occurrences of His childhood. And in this case even narratives concerning the child Jesus, which early found acceptance in Gnostic circles, were, till after the 4th century, regarded with great suspicion by the church, and then found only a hesitating reception. More favourable judgments were passed, on the other hand, upon stories of the Passion, harmonized from our canonical gospels with various apocryphal additions, and narratives of miracles said to have been wrought after the resurrection. Of extracanonical narratives concerning the time of our Lord's public ministry only fragments, more or as numerous, have been preserved in patristic controversial writings or in occasional citations of the Fathers. These citations may here and there add to our knowledge of the words of Jesus, but by far the greater number of these extra-canonical utterances of the Lord are either later transformations of Sayings found in the canonical gospels or manifest inventions with a purpose which in almost all cases is not far to seek. Many a genuine Saying of our Lord, though once committed to writing, has been either entirely lost or no longer preserved in its original form. Yet may we safely assume that by far the greater part of genuine traditions which circulated among the oldest Christian communities have passed into our canonical gospels, though it may be, in many cases through a second or third hand. All reliable tradition must have ceased about the middle of the 2nd century. The earlier authorities employed by St. Luke had entirely disappeared except so far as portions of them had been taken up into our synoptical gospels, or else had been disfigured beyond power of recognition by changes made to suit the taste of various heretical parties. While the text of our canonical gospels became gradually fixed, these extra-canonical narratives continued to be subject to perpetual changes and recastings, by which the traces existing in them of older traditions were gradually effaced. The little that has come down to our own times is found in large citations from Jewish-Christian and Catholic writers of the 2nd century, who besides our canonical gospels made use of other sources now lost.

The remains of extra-canonical narratives of the time of Christ's public ministry are yet surlier than those of extra-canonical utterances attributed to Him. Almost all the fragments that have come down to us are borrowed from the Gospel of the Hebrews; but this work had already undergone, as early as the close of the 2nd century, very considerable alterations. The specimens of it, given us in later times by Jerome and Epiphanius prove only that the earlier tradition was as ruthlessly tampered with as Jewish-Christian as by the various Gnostic sects.

This notwithstanding, the loss of most of the gospels once used by heretical sects and the fact that the specimens of them preserved in Catholic writers is much to be regretted. The specimens given us by Catholic doctors do not enable us to form any complete notion of what these gospels originally were, but rather lead us to suspect that the pious zeal and prejudice of our authorities induced them to select such passages only as would prove offensive to Catholic ears. When we find a Jerome thinking that the Gospel of the Nazarenes, written in the Hebrew language, was, in fact, the Hebrew original of our Gospel of St. Matthew, and are told of writings like the Gospel of St. Peter or the Diatessaron of Tatian being publicly read in Catholic communities of the 4th century without objection or censure, we can only conclude that some, at least, of such writings must have been, with whatever peculiarities of their own, nearly assimilated to our canonical gospels. If we could follow the gradual development and alteration of the Gospel of the Hebrews from the time of its first appearance to the end of the 1st century, we should probably obtain much surprising information as to the history and developments of the whole literature. Still greater, doubtless, would have been the gain for our knowledge of the history of the Church and sects of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, if some of these gospels had been preserved entire. Those for instance used by the Gnostics served, not only like the numerous apocryphal Acts of Apostles, to satisfy the claims of a pious curiosity but also and specially to recommend certain doctrines and customs, traditionally handed down in Gnostic schools. The main purpose of these works was to represent the opinions peculiar to the Gnostics as derived from the original teaching of Christ and His Apostles. But inasmuch as from the middle of the 2nd century and onwards the Gnostics certainly made use of our canonical gospels, we must assume that those of their own invention were in part at least imitations of the former. All the fragments which remain to us of such Gnostic fictions are indeed evidently based on the canonical narratives; but our knowledge of the different sections of Gnosticism is at the same time so imperfect that we cannot but deplore the loss of these writings.

The few remains of this once extensive literature, which are still preserved in a more or less Catholic form, relate as already observed almost exclusively to the earliest portions of our Lord's life. We still possess a series of so-called Gospels of the Infancy which on closer inspection may be traced back to three or four distinct Writings of the 2nd century.

The narratives concerning Mary and the child Jesus, ending with the slaughter of the Innocents and the Flight into Egypt are contained in three works derived from kindred sources; those of our Lord's miracles from His fifth to His twelfth year, are preserved in a single Writing, of which however several recensions, differing considerably from one another, have come down to us. Besides these we possess various compilations containing narratives of the whole period of our Lord's childhood; among them one which fills up the interval between the flight into Egypt and the return to Galilee with an account of various Egyptian miracles; for this section an original authority, now lost, has been employed, while for all that precedes and all that follows it essentially the same sources appear to have been made use of as in the other Gospels of the Infancy. The Gospels of the Childhood still existing are as follows:

(1) The so-called Protevangelium of James, or according to its title in the manuscripts, The History of James concerning the Birth of Mary (ἡ ἱστορία Ἰακώβου περὶ τῆς γεννήσεως Μαρίας). It was first published in the Latin version of William Postellus by Theodore Bibliander (1552), then in Greek by Michael Neander (1564), and frequently since; and finally, after fresh collations of numerous MSS., by Thilo (Codex apocryphus Novi Testamenti, tom. i., 1832, pp. 159-273) and Tischendorf (Evangelia apocrypha, 1851, pp. 1-49; 2nd ed. 1876, pp. 1-50). There is also a separate edition of this gospel by Suckow (Breslau, 1840), which is critically of small value. The text, as handed down in all MSS. hitherto discovered, presents but few discrepancies. The best MS. is the Cod. Paris. 2014, of the 10th century (A ap.

Thilo, C. ap. Tischendorf), which Thilo followed in constructing his text. The fragment of a Syriac translation has been published with an English version by Prof. Wright (Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament; London, 1865, pp. 1-5). The Syriac MS., which in its present form begins with ch. 17, dates from the second half of the 6th century; the text, apart from a few abbreviations, agrees literally with that of the Greek original. The narrative contained in this Protevangelium extends from the birth of the Virgin Mary to the slaughter of the Innocents at Bethlehem and the martyrdom of Zacharias.

(2) The Gospel of (Pseudo) Matthew concerning the Childhood of Mary and of Christ our Saviour (Liber de Infantia Mariae et Christi Salvatoris).—This book exists in Latin only, and professes to be a translation made from the Hebrew by St. Jerome. In some MSS. James is named as the author. It is in fact derived from the same original source as the above-mentioned Historia Jacobi, going over the same ground but extending the account of our Lord's history to the flight into Egypt. The text was first edited by Thilo from a Paris MS. (Cod. apocryph. N. T. pp. 337-400), and more recently by Oscar Schade from a MS. at Stuttgart (Liber de Infantia Mariae et Christi Salvatoris, Halle, 1869); Tischendorf's edition (Evang. apocr. pp. 50-105, 2nd ed. pp. 51-112), which announces itself as the first complete one of the Pseudo-Matthew, is based on a text in which the apocryphal Gospel of Matthew is combined so as to form one whole with the hereafter to be mentioned Gospel of Thomas. A spurious correspondence between bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus on the one hand, and St. Jerome on the other, which is prefixed to the work, betrays the fact (against the will of the forger himself) that his alleged translation from a Hebrew original is nothing but a Catholic recast of an old Gnostic writing, which, in compliance with traditional custom, is ascribed to the "Manichaean" Leucius. This recast cannot be assigned an earlier date than the second half of the 5th century. It reappears in yet another form, in

(3) The Evangelium de Nativitate Mariae, first published among the works of St. Jerome, then reprinted by Fabricius, Jones, and Schmidt in their collections of New Testament Apocrypha, and finally by Thilo (l. c. pp. 317-336) and Tischendorf (l. c. pp. 106-114, 2nd ed. pp. 113-121). The narrative, from which has been carefully expunged everything that could give offence to the strictest Catholic orthodoxy, reaches only to the birth of Christ at Bethlehem. This recast, which must be considerably younger than its prototype—the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew—is found, however, in a MS. as early as the 10th century, in the Laurentian Library (cf. Schade, l. c. p. 3). To it belongs a second spurious epistle, attributed to St. Jerome, which, in the printed editions, follows the correspondence already referred to between that father and the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus. The author of this second epistle makes express reference to the former correspondence, which, however, he misunderstands, and is misled thereby to suppose the writing which actually lies before him (our Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew) to have been written by the oft-mentioned heretical author "Seleucus"

(Leucius). (Compare Tischendorf, l. c. Prolegg. p. xxxi. sq. 2nd ed. p. xxviii. sq.; Schade l. c.) This re-cast announces itself expressly as a paraphrase, which gives the sense but not the exact words of the original writer.

The first of these writings, the so-called Protevangelium is generally regarded as the oldest of the three. Hilgenfeld (Evangelien Justini, p. 153), whose proofs were adopted by Tischendorf (Evang. apocr. p. xxxviii. sq. 2nd ed. p. xxxvi. sq.; and the tract, Wann wurden unsere Ev. verfasst? 4th ed. p. 76 sq.), has collected a series of correspondences between the writings of Justin Martyr and the Protevangelium, and Tischendorf drew the conclusion that this apocryphal gospel must have existed in its present form even before the time of Justin, and consequently in the first half of the 2nd century.

Hilgenfeld, however, in reply called attention to the fact that the Protevangelium in its present form is not a homogeneous work, while Scholten has disputed the cogency of the proofs drawn from the alleged citations of the Protevangelium by Justin. (Die ältesten Zeugnisse betreffend die Schriften des N. T.; Bremen, 1867, p. 155 sqq.)

A closer inspection of the present text of our Protevangelium brings in fact to light numerous traces of the hand of an interpolator. These are most conspicuous in ch. 18. Whereas James of Jerusalem, i.e. the ἀδελφὸς κυρίου, names himself as the author of the whole work, we see St. Joseph suddenly coming forward in this chapter as the narrator, and that in a passage with an unmistakable Gnostic colouring. Joseph relates how at the birth of Christ all motion suddenly ceased in heaven and earth. To exclude the whole chapter as an interpolation (see Hofmann, Das Leben Jesu nach den Apocryphen, p. 110) is impossible, inasmuch as Joseph still continues the narration in the chapter following. We cannot therefore fail to recognize here an unsuccessful recast of some older document. Other observations lead to the same conclusion, e.g. the broken character of the narrative and frequent reference to things as previously related which are no longer found in the context, the abrupt conclusion of the whole, and the, at any rate, partially more original form of the narrations in the Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew. To which we may add that various citations in the early Fathers appear to be made from an essentially different text from that which now lies before us in our Protevangelium. Origen, for instance, while citing the Book of James (in Matt. tom. i. 17), relates quite differently from our present text the history of the martyrdom of Zacharias between temple and altar (in Matt. tract 25). There is, indeed, no clear warrant for the existence of our present text of the Protevangelium before the time of Peter of Alexandria († 311). None of the points of contact which have been pointed out between our Protevangelium and the writings of Justin Martyr can be regarded as decisive for our present form of it. The narrative of our Lord's birth in a cave (Dial. c. Tryph. 78), for instance, rests on a local tradition (cf. Orig. c. Cels. i. 51), which is probably older than the Protevangelium in its earliest form. It is not only found in all Gospels of the Infancy, even those which borrowed nothing else from the Protevangelium, but is constantly referred to the Fathers, and does not pretend to be a section, but only an addition to the narrative of Luke (ii. 7-12).

The combination, moreover, of the angel's salutation to Mary in St. Luke—καὶ καλέσεις τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦν (l. 31)—with those in St. Matthew (i. 21)—αὐτὸς γὰρ σώσει τὸν λαόν αὐτοῦ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν—which is found both in Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 33) and the Protevangelium, is simply explained by the fact that St. Matthew himself has already so combined them. The third and most probable "concordance" between Justin and the Protevangelium are the words καὶ χαρὰν λαβοῦσα Μαρία ἡ παρθένος (Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. 101) compared with καὶ δὲ λαβοῦσα Μαρία (Protev. c. 12). But the connexion of the words in Justin with angelic salutation is more natural than that of the Protevangelium with the address of the angel to Mary in the Temple. Justin is therefore probably quoting the original document, and not our present text of the Protevangelium. The same original document is probably referred to by Clemens Alex. (Strom. vii. p. 889 Potter), Origen (l. c.), and Gregory of Nazianzus (Oratio in d. natal. Christi, Opp. iii. 346, Paris.). Traces of a Gnostic writing concerning the Nativity of Mary are found as late as the 5th century (Epiph. Haer. xxxvi. 12; Justin, c. Faust. xxiii. 9; Gelasii Decretum vii. 9, 16). The Pseudo-Matthew has been derived directly from it. The narratives, for example, contained in the last chapters, which are wholly wanting in the Protevangelium, and especially the miracles wrought on the journey into Egypt have unquestionably a Gnostic character (cc. 18-24). This notwithstanding, it seems very unlikely that the Gnostic writing concerning the Nativity of Mary was ever used by Origen. The account of the birth of Zacharias which Epiphanius (l. c.) in the Gnostic book differs as much from that given by Origen as from that contained in the Protevangelium. It is quite possible that the account given by Epiphanius may be due to a later reviser of the Gnostic writing, but that the text in Origen has no Gnostic features whatever, but is evidently derived from some Jewish-Christian source. To which must be added that the Gnostic writing expressly named Pseudo-Matthew as its author, that used by Origen, like the Protevangelium, gave this position to St. Matthew.

On a closer inspection of the Protevangelium it is evident that its text must have undergone repeated revisions and recastings before it assumed its present form. Side by side with obvious traces of a Gnostic author (see especially ch. 18), there are also numerous features indicating a Jewish-Christian writer or at any rate a writer having an intimate acquaintance with Jewish customs. Take, for example, the forty days' mourning, the grief of parents who are denied the burial of children and their suffering contempt for this account, the vow of Anna like her Old Testament namesake to devote her child when presented to the Lord, the high priest's petal on the robe, the veil of the Temple, the water of cursing, the oracle of the staves, the registers of the twelve tribes, and the many Old Testament types. To give this twofold character of the book by the hypothesis of a "Gnostic-Ebionite" author is, however, inadmissible, if only because so much is found, notwithstanding, which is in direct antagonism with Jewish thought and custom, e.g. the refusal of Joachim and his sacrifice, the bringing up of Mary in the Temple, the application of the water of cursing to Joseph, and the legendary ornamental development of the oracle of the staves. This curious admixture of intimate knowledge and gross ignorance of Jewish thought and custom compels us to assume and distinguish between an original Jewish-Christian writing and a Gnostic recast of it. The former is to a great extent preserved in the Protevangelium Jacobi, but still more fully and faithfully in the Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew.

In both writings, moreover, we discern the employment and combination of various other original sources. This is evident, for instance, in the two accounts of Mary's Annunciation (Protevangel. 11; Pseudo-Matth. 8). In the Protevangelium the angel appears to her at the well, in the Pseudo-Matthew in her chamber as she is working the veil of the Temple. The second account is probably the only one found in the older writing.

We may then distinguish the following strata in the histories of St. Mary and the child Jesus down to the flight into Egypt as preserved to us in these documents: (a) The Jewish-Christian work attributed to James, and already extant in the time of Justin Martyr. (b) A Gnostic recension of the same work which usually bears the name of Joseph, though occasionally also that of James, and is perhaps sometimes attributed to Leucius Charinus (cf. the interpolated correspondence between St. Jerome and the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus prefixed to our Pseudo-Matthew). This work may date from about the middle of the 3rd century. (c) Various Catholic recensions produced by piecing together in different ways the two ancient texts. The oldest among these is our Protevangelium, which may have appeared in its present form as early as the latter part of the 3rd century; the Latin Pseudo-Matthaeus is a later work, but derived independently of the Protevangelium from the same sources; a still later recast of the Pseudo-Matthaeus is the Latin Evangelium de Nativitate Mariae, preserved among the works of St. Jerome.

The remaining Gospels of the Childhood which are still preserved are the Gospel of Thomas, the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, and the Arabic History of Joseph.

4. The Gospel of St. Thomas, or the Acts of the Lord's Boyhood (τὰ παιδικὰ τοῦ κυρίου). This was originally a Gnostic work, and seems to have been written about the second half of the 2nd century. It was made use of not only by Marcosians and Naassenes (comp. Pseudo-Origen, Philosophum. v. 7, p. 101, ed. Oxon., with Iren. Haer. i. 20), and in later times by Manicheans, but is frequently cited from Origen downwards (Hom. i. in Luc.), by fathers of the church. (Compare Thilo, l. c. p. lxxix. sqq. and Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxxviii. sqq. 2nd ed. p. xxxvi. sqq.). Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) reckons it among spurious writings (νόθα). Cyril of Jerusalem and later writers assign its authorship to a Thomas, disciple of Mani. But the Israelite Thomas who introduces himself in the beginning of the work as the author is evidently meant to be the apostle St. Thomas whose purpose is to announce "the child-deeds of the Lord" to the brethren among the Gentiles. The present text is a meagre abstract of the original from which the Catholic reviser has eliminated all the heretical portions. The narrative, which treats of the miracles performed by the child Jesus begins with His fifth year, and concludes with His appearance among the doctors in the temple when twelve years old. The Greek text has come down to us in two recensions, one of which (a) was published by Cotelier from a Paris fragment in his edition of the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 17), and after him by Fabricius; then in a more complete form from a Bonn MS. by Mingarelli (Nuova Raccolta d'Opuscoli Scientifici e Filologici, t. xii. Venet. 1764, p. 73-155); and, finally with the help of two other MSS. by Thilo (l. c. pp. 275-315), and Tischendorf (l. c. pp. 134-149, 2nd ed. pp. 140-157). The second yet more fragmentary recension (b) was published from a Sinaitic MS. by Tischendorf (Wiener Jahrbücher, 1846, Anzeigebblatt, p. 51, sqq., and Evang. apocr. pp. 150-155, ed. 2, pp. 158-163). Of Latin translations of this text, besides one not yet printed but known to exist in a Vienna palimpsest of the 5th century (Tischend. Præleg. p. xlv. 2nd ed. p. xlv. sqq.), two others made quite independently have been published; both by Tischendorf. The former of these in the Vatican MS. discovered by Tischendorf bears, like the Greek original, the name of Thomas (Tisch. l. c., pp. 156-170, 2nd ed. pp. 164-180); the latter, printed also by Tischendorf from a Vatican MS. (Cod. A), is improperly assigned by him to the Pseudo-Matthæus, and regarded as the second part of the History of the Infancy of Mary and the Saviour (l. c. pp. 87-105, 2nd ed. pp. 93-112). A mixed text formed from both these translations is found in a Paris MS. (Cod. 1652) of the 11th century (D ap. Tischend.) from which Thilo was the first to give some extracts (l. c. p. cviii. sqq.). This Paris MS. contains, in the first instance (like the Vatican Cod. A), the histories of the childhood as given by the Pseudo-Matthæus (cc. 1-24), and then the histories contained in the Gospel of St. Thomas, partly from the text of Tischendorf's Thomas Latinus (cc. 25-40, 42, 48); partly from the second Latin translation of Cod. A misattributed by Tischendorf to the Pseudo-Matthæus (cc. 43-47); and, finally, in part, (c. 41), from a third recension. The Laurentine or Ambrosian MS. moreover (Tischendorf's Cod. B), contains a mixed text of yet inferior value, exhibiting in those portions, which are peculiar to it, the character of a later recast. To all these helps and sources must now finally be added the Syriac translation published by Wright (l. c. with English version, pp. 6-11), and commencing with the second chapter of our Greek text. The text exhibited by this Syriac version occupies a mid-position between that of the Greek recension A and that of the two Latin versions. In both those versions the Gospel of Thomas is preceded by histories of our Lord's residence in Egypt and of miracles there performed. The text represented by what Tischendorf entitles Evangelium Thomas Latinum records the events of the period from the flight into

Egypt to the return of the Holy Family to Nazareth, but merely in the form of a somewhat abrupt introduction which occupies the three first chapters; but that this did not originally form part of the Evangelium Thomas is evident from the opening words of the 4th chapter "Gloriosum est enarrare Thomam Israelitam et Apostolum Domini et de operibus Jesu postquam egressus est de Aegypto in Nazareth. Intelligite omnes, fratres carissimi, quæ fecit Dominus Jesus quando fuit in civitate Nazareth; quod in primo capitulo."

The narratives contained in the Gospel of St. Thomas are given in the different texts in curiously varied forms, some of them recurring even in the same MSS. in different recensions. The history of the master who has to teach the child Jesus the letters of the alphabet, may serve as an example (Comp. Iren. Hær. i. 20). The story is twice related in the Greek text A, and in similar forms to this also in the Latin versions; while it occurs no less than three times in a different form in the Latin Codex D. This notwithstanding, it is quite certain that the original wording of the narrative is nowhere faithfully retained. The passage for instance in which the child Jesus instructs His master as to the mysterious significance of the characters before Him, although we possess it in five different forms, is so thoroughly corrupt, that its restoration must be despaired of. A series of these miracle-narratives are in the various texts located now in Egypt and now in Galilee. Such is the case with the story of the priest's son who is punished for his insolence, and according to one class of narratives is the son of Hannas, and to another, the son of an idol-priest in Egypt. The scene, moreover, of the Galilean boy-deeds of Jesus is not unanimously laid by all the texts in Nazareth. Some make the Holy Family remove at once from Egypt to Capernaum, and another who has to tell of various places of residence now at Nazareth, now at Capernaum, and now at Bethlehem, distributes the miracle-narratives among them. The arrangement and selection of the various narratives differ widely in the several texts. One series of sections is only found in one or other of the Latin versions, and others only in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, of which we shall have to speak further on. Still less agreement will be found between the various documents as to single features of the narratives, the persons named, and the words attributed to them, &c. A great part of the miracles assigned to the child Jesus is borrowed from New Testament narratives, or formed after them, and so likewise many sayings attributed to Him remind us of well-known utterances in the synoptical gospels; e.g. the answer given by Jesus to His master:—"Thou knowest not the nature of A and wilt thou teach others B? Thou hypocrite! teach me first what A is, and then will we believe thee in respect to B." As to the child-deeds of Jesus only a small portion of them are miracles of healing, the greater number are strokes of magic or miraculous inflictions of cruel punishment. Jesus makes sparrows out of clay and lets them fly away alive, brings to life a dried fish, dyes cloths, stretches out a bedstead, passes through the Jordan, carries water home in his tunic; but with special frequency

He revenges Himself on those who mock or insult Him, smiting them with blindness or striking to the earth, causing them to wither or slaying them outright. The boy Jesus is almost everywhere a terror to those about Him. He is even occasionally banished with his parents from the house or city, or rebuked by Joseph for his wanton cruelty, whereupon He immediately repairs the mischief by a fresh miracle.

The great acceptance of the book in various Gnostic circles is explained by its original Docetism, all traces of which the Catholic editors or revisers of the present text were unable to eradicate. The numerous miracles related of our Lord have all one tendency—to assign to the child Jesus as He was divine, omnipotence and omniscience, and reducing all human development to mere appearance. The child Jesus knows Himself already to have been Lord before all time; whatsoever He commands is done; whatever He says is infinite wisdom, which the children of men cannot comprehend; the birth-time and duration of life of every one are known to Him; if He take a book in hand He need not read therein in order to know its contents, but speaks from the Spirit; before his present appearance in bodily form on earth He has seen Abraham and talked with him. His words and works have nothing in common with those of earth-born men; He is of other race and kind than they; having existed before the Law He is not under the Law; He has no earthly father, and when exalted will retain no further remembrance of any human origin. (Compare, in addition to the passages collected by Tischendorf (Prolegg. p. xlviii, sq. 2nd ed. p. xlvii. sq.) from the Greek text, more especially the stories about Jesus and His teacher in both the Latin versions, Thom. Lat. cc. 6, 13; Pseudo-Matth. cc. 31, 35, Cod. D, c. 46, and in the Syriac version, c. 6.) In contradiction to all this it was maintained by the doctors of the church that, during the thirty years which preceded His baptism by St. John, our Lord manifested His human nature only, and that it was not till after His baptism that He exhibited His Godhead by the evidence of miracles. They denied therefore most emphatically that Jesus as child wrought any miracles at all. (Compare the passages from "Melito," Chrysostom, Euthymius Zigadenus in Thilo, loc. cit. p. lxxxiv. sqq.) At the same time it appeared quite possible to enlist the miraculous stories of the childhood on the Catholic side. So other Fathers, like Epiphanius (Haer. li. 20), were of a different opinion on this matter. The child Jesus, they maintained, must certainly have worked some miracles in order to rebuke the Gnostic error, which made the Christ to descend upon Him for the first time at His baptism. In this way is explained how, notwithstanding the opposition to which we have referred, these fables of the childhood should nevertheless find approval and acceptance among Catholic readers. The Gnostic book of St. Thomas was accordingly dressed up for the use and benefit of the Catholic people by careful excision of all manifestly heretical passages, and various extracts and abridgements were also put in circulation, in which the attractive miracle-legends were carefully preserved. Compared with the original compass of the work which, according to the stichometry of Nicephorus (see Credner, Geschichte des Kanons, p. 122 sq.), contained 1300 stichoi, the existing remains of the Gospel of St. Thomas must be regarded as mere fragments.

5. The Arabic Gospel of the Childhood (Evangelium Infantiae Arabicum) is a Catholic recension of all the stories of the childhood from the birth of Jesus till His twelfth year. It is a special favourite with the Nestorians of Syria. The Arabic text is a translation from the Syriac, and the existing MSS. of the Syriac text have not yet been edited. The book was first published in Arabic and Latin, with copious notes by Heinrich Sike (Utrecht, 1697). Sike's Latin version was reprinted by Fabricius (Cod. apocr. N. T. i. pp. 168–211), and after him by Jones and Schmidt. Thilo (l. c. pp. 63–158) republished the Arabic and Latin texts with corrections by Rödiger and Sike's notes; Tischendorf (l. c. pp. 171–202, 2nd ed. pp. 181–209) the Latin text only, with corrections here and there by Fleischer. The book announces itself as a composition derived from older sources (cc. 1, 25, 55) and is divided into two parts. The first part (c. 1–25) is a recension of the Evangelium Infantiae attributed to the high priest Joseph Caiaphas (I), which is probably the same as the Gnostic work made use of in the Protevangelium, and which bore the name of Joseph (not Caiaphas, of course, but the husband of Mary). The original work appears to have been nearly related, for the first three or four chapters, to the Protevangelium of St. James, and from thence to chapter twelve to the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew. It contained also the miracles attributed to the child Jesus during the residence in Egypt. The second part (cc. 26–55) is derived from a recension of the Gospel of St. Thomas, which seems to have differed in various particulars from the other texts which we possess, and, in some places, to have approached more to the original (Gnostic) work. Some of these narratives are given here (as is the case with the Greek and Latin MSS.) in a double form (comp. c. 36 with cc. 46, 47, and cc. 41, 42 with c. 43). The process of Catholicizing has, on the other hand, introduced serious modifications of form and in the connexion of parts. The miraculous narratives are, according to resemblances in their contents, arranged in pairs; several particulars appear to have been derived from oral tradition (comp. c. 5), and the compiler seems to have taken a special delight in references to transactions and persons mentioned in the canonical gospels. (Comp. c. 5, the vessel of spikenard with which Jesus was anointed by the Mary who was a sinner; c. 24, the two thieves crucified with Jesus; c. 29, Mary, the wife of Clopas; c. 35, Judas Iscariot; c. 42, Simon the Canaanite.) Most of the narratives of the Egyptian miracles are preserved only in this Arabic Evangelium Infantiae. Some are also found in the Latin history of Mary and Jesus in the Pseudo-Matthew; some others, as introductory to the Gospel of St. Thomas, in the Latin texts; and others again in the Mahometan tradition (comp. Thilo, l. c. p. 141 sqq). The Arabic gospel bears in various places the appearance of being an abstract of a more copious narrative (e.g. cc. 30, 31, and Hofmann's remarks, l. c. pp. 195, 197). In contrast with those of the Gospel of St. Thomas, these Egyptian miracles are chiefly characterized as works of healing wrought by water in which the child Jesus had been washed, or by articles of His clothing, from which we may infer that they were not originally connected with the former, but derived from some independent source. This must also have originated in Gnostic circles, though it is to be remarked that the Arabic gospel lays special emphasis on the true humanity of Jesus (c. 30). Its date of composition is comparatively late, but probably earlier than the Mahometan times. The statement (c. 7) that Zarathustra had foretold the coming of the Messiah seems to imply the continued maintenance of the Persian religion and worship (comp. Schade, l. c. p. 5). The reckoning of dates by the era of Alexander (c. 2) held its ground among the Syrians till late in the middle age, and cannot, therefore, be used here in determining the age of this gospel.

6. The Arabic History of Joseph the Carpenter (Historia Josephi fabri lignarii) published in Arabic and Latin by George Wallin (Leipsic, 1722), and with Rödiger's corrections by Thilo (l. c. p. 1-61); in Latin by Fabricius (Cod. pseudepigr. V. T. ii. pp. 309-336) and Tischendorf (l. c. p. 115-133, 2nd ed. pp. 122-139). The book bears the character of a festal lection for St. Joseph's day (cf. cc. 26, 30 and Thilo, p. xx sq.) and is a recast made from older sources. It narrates the history of Joseph, who appears at once as a priest and a descendant from David, till his death, which is said to have taken place in his 111th year. The narrative is placed in our Lord's mouth, who is represented as having imparted it to His disciples on the Mount of Olives. At the opening and conclusion of the whole work the disciples appear as narrators. The section which treats of Joseph's betrothal with Mary, the birth of Jesus, and the pursuit of the child by Herod (cc. 3-8) is nearly related to the Protogospelium, but appears not to have been derived from it. That the Gospel of Thomas was also used is evident from c. 17 where there is an allusion to the narrative in Ev. Thomae, 4, 5 (cf. 16). The histories of Joseph are also preserved in the Coptic language, and in both dialects, Sahidic and Memphitic. The extracts and fragments communicated by Zoega and Dulaurier from the yet unprinted MSS. (ap. Thilo, p. xxii. sq. Tischendorf's notes under the text) prove that the Arabic text was a recension of the Coptic. The latter exhibits traces of a Gnostic origin. The use made of the Gospel of Thomas is here still more evident: Joseph remembers with sorrow that he had once pulled the child Jesus by the ear; the Arabic history holding this for unseemly softens it down into a seizing of his hand. Of special interest is the description in the Coptic text of the departure of Joseph's soul, of which the Arabic gives only a meagre abstract (cc. 21-23). The Coptic here describes the approach of death, Orcus, and the devil, with innumerable aeons, to take possession of the departing soul, the driving away of these fearful beings by Jesus, the descent at His intercession of Michael and Gabriel with the choir of archangels, who receive the parting soul and conduct it safely through the seven aeons of darkness. This narrative appears to have formed the living nucleus of the original fiction: its Gnostic character cannot be doubted. Whether the narratives in the first chapters of our Arabic text, which conduct the history of Joseph down to his dying hour, existed in the original work, can only be determined after a complete publication of the Coptic manuscripts. According to Zoega's extracts, the Coptic text appears to begin at the fourteenth chapter, and exactly at this point the Arabic exhibits distinct traces of the manipulation of an older document. Although in preceding and following passages, Jesus is Himself introduced as the speaker, we read here suddenly: "et ita certe res Josephi justi disponere Christo placuit," and then follows the short chronological note of the circumstances of the lives of Joseph and Mary, found also in Zoega's first fragment, which partially repeats what has already been related in c. 2 sqq. The present text can hardly be older than the 6th century (cf. Thilo, p. xx sqq.); the original work goes possibly as far back as the 3rd century.

A quite peculiar position is assumed by

7. The Departure of Mary (κομνησις τῆς Μαρίας, Transitus Mariae) a work attributed to the apostle St. John and handed down in various forms—Greek, Latin, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic and Sahidic. The Greek text was first published by Tischendorf (Apocalypses apocryphae, pp. 95-112) from several manuscripts. Of the same work exist still in MS. two later recensions in Greek: one entitled Ἐγκόμιον εἰς τὴν κομνησιν τῆς παρὰ τὴν θείαν Θεοτόκον, by the patriarch Modestus of Jerusalem (beginning of 7th century; comp. Photius Biblioth. cod. 275); the other the Λόγος εἰς τὴν κομνησιν τῆς ὑπερᾶνδρας Θεωτόκης of archbishop John of Thessalonica (end of 7th century, comp. Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxxviii. sq.). This work of the later John bears, like the former, in several MSS. the name of the apostle, but is rightly distinguished from it by the monk Epiphanius of Jerusalem, who lived in the 12th century (Epiphanius Monach. ed. Dressel, p. 14). The narratives contained in the Greek Apocryphum and dressed up in various ways form the groundwork of the festive homilies of St. John Damascene, Germanus Constantinopolitanus, Andreas Cretensis, and others (Thilo, Prolegg. ad Acta Thomae, p. xxiii). Latin texts were known as early as the 5th century. Pope Gelasius in his Decretum de libris recipiendis, reckons the "liber qui appellatur Transitus Mariae apocryphus" among those which are rejected by the church. One of the Latin recensions which still exist bears on its front the name of bishop Melito of Sardis, the same who is also named as the alleged author of the apocryphal Acta Johannis. The preface, which takes the form of a letter addressed by Melito to the church of Laodicea, defines the object of the work to be to counteract by an orthodox narrative derived by oral tradition from the apostle St. John the influence of an heretical book bearing the same title, whose author Leucius claims also to be a disciple of the apostles. The text was published in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima Lugdunensis (ii. 2, pp. 212-216) and elsewhere, and finally by Tischendorf from a Venetian MS. (l. c. pp. 124-136, Transitus Mariae B) which however does not contain the epistle of the Pseudo-Melito

Another Latin recension widely differing from this was published also by Tischendorf (as Transitus Mariae A, pp. 113-123) from three MSS. The same object as that aimed at in the work of Pseudo-Melito is that also of the Sermo de Assumptione B. V. M. ad Paulam et Eustochium, attributed to St. Jerome (Hieron. Opp. ed. Martianay v. pp. 82-99). In Syriac professor Wright has published three different recensions of the Transitus Mariae. The oldest and simplest text (Syr. A) is preserved only in fragments (Wright's Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament, London, 1865, pp. 18-24 of the English translation). A much more copious narrative in six books (Syr. B) published by professor Wright from two MSS. of the British Museum (Journal of Sacred Literature, 1865, January and April) has for its principal object to recommend the observance of the three oriental festivals of the Virgin and contains numerous additions (especially bk. I. and IV.-VI.). A fragment of the second book of this work was published by Cureton in his Ancient Syriac Documents (p. 110 of the English translation). Related to this second recension, but also older and more original is the text (Syr. C) of the fragments also published by professor Wright in his Contributions (pp. 24-41). To these three recensions must finally be added the also fragmentary Obsequies of Mary (Wright, Contributions, pp. 42-51). The Arabic text published by Maximilian Enger (Joannis apostoli de Transitu Beatae Mariae Virginis liber, 1854) is nearly related to Syr. B and C. A Sahidic version moreover exists of a text which appears to differ widely from that of the other recensions. Of this Zoega has given some particulars in the Catal. Codd. Copt. Borgianorum, p. 223, num. cxi. (comp. Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxxvii.). There exists finally in Ethiopic a Visio Mariae Virginis (Dillmann, Catal. p. 22) which is nearly related to the sixth book of the second Syriac recension. This vision narrates how Mary, under the guidance of her divine son, visits the habitations of the blessed and of the lost. The same subject is also dealt with in several Greek MSS. of an Apocalypsis Mariae (Tischendorf, l. c. p. xxvii. sq.). The original text of the Transitus Mariae, which seems to have been preserved (approximately) in the Greek text and those of the two Syriac recensions B and C, treated of the last events in the life of Mary—her last visit to the Holy Sepulchre, the Jewish plots against her, her prayers to be taken away from earth, her return to Bethlehem, the miraculous assemblage of the apostles in her chamber, her transport to Jerusalem and fresh miracles wrought there, the appearance of Christ at her dying bed, her death and burial. Her soul, according to the promise of her divine son, is received up into Heaven while her body is taken to Paradise. The miraculous translation of the Virgin's body is found only in later texts, the assumption into heaven is related only in the Latin copies. A comparison of the various texts proves that the original narrative was a now enlarged or of foreign origin. Especially the Book of the stance, of a strife taking place among the apostles (when assembled in Mary's presence) concerning the true gospel and of its being decided by Christ Himself in favour of St. Paul. It relates also how after the transport of Mary into Paradise, not she but the apostles visited the lower world.

The Kolymēsis Marias in all the various forms in which we now possess it, is, as the spurious epistle of Melito betrays, a Catholicizing recast of an heretical work. Whether the alleged disciple of the apostles, Leucius Charinus, did, as "Melito" reports, compose the original work in his own name, or whether from the first it was entitled after the apostle St. John, can no longer be ascertained, but the latter supposition is the more probable. This heretical Apocryphum is probably the same as that mentioned by Pseudo-Jerome, and in the Decretum Gelasianum. Various traces lead to the conjecture that it probably proceeded from the same Gnostic circles as the gospels of the infancy and the Gnostic Acta apostolorum; in some, even of our present texts, we find references to the Protevangelium Jacobi, the Acta Matthaei, the Acta Thomae, &c. The peculiar doctrines of the Gnostics have been carefully eliminated from the texts before us, but various narratives, such as the aerial journey of the apostles, the miraculous fire issuing from the deathbed of Mary in Jerusalem, &c., are in taste and conception decidedly Gnostic. The original work can hardly be older than the close of the 3rd century, and must probably be assigned to the 4th. The Catholic recast plainly belongs to a time when the worship of the Virgin is already flourishing, i.e. at the earliest the close of the 4th, and most probably the beginning of the 5th century. The various recensions of this Catholic recast were produced in the course of the 5th century—some of them somewhat later. The strongly interpolated Syriac recension B has come down to us in a MS. of the 6th century. The Latin recension, in like manner, which circulated under the name of the Pseudo-Melito, was made use of in the second half of the 6th century by Gregory of Tours.

A second main group of apocryphal writings is constituted by a variety of spurious narratives of the passion and resurrection of our Lord. These are one and all of Catholic origin, and written with an apologetic intention. Their composition for the most part seems to have been suggested by the Roman custom to draw up official reports of important trials and executions, the so called Acta praesidialia. The conjecture was a natural one that such acts must have been drawn up by Pontius Pilate himself, or under his authority, in reference to the trial and crucifixion of our Lord. So, already Justin Martyr ventures to appeal to the acts that appeared under Pontius Pilate (τὰ ἐπὶ Ποντίου Πιλάτου γεγόμενα ἅκτα), and supposed to have been deposited by him in the imperial archives at Rome (Apol. i. 35, 48, cf. 38) as documents from which the emperors might inform themselves concerning Christ, and alleges various circumstances in the life and passion of our Lord, as recorded in the said Acta. As our own canonical gospels, especially those of St. Luke and St. John, record that Pontius Pilate was himself convinced of our Lord's innocence, and endeavoured to save Him, an opinion arose very early, as we find from Tertullian (Apol. 21), that the procurator himself became a convert to Christianity. It was consequently assumed that his report to the emperor must have contained a witness, not only to the innocence of Jesus, but to His divine mission also, His miracles, and resurrection. From such conjectures to the actual composition of such documents by Christian authors was a mere step. The oldest of these which has come down to us appears to be the Epistle of Pontius Pilate to the emperor Claudius, incorporated in the apocryphal Acts of St. Peter and St. Paul (Greek text in Tischendorf, Acta apoc. apoc. p. 16, sq.), and also found in a Latin version both in Pseudo-Marcellus (i.e. the Latin version of the so-called Acta Marcelli), and the spurious Evangelium at the end of the fifth book of Pseudo-Hegesippus de Excidio Hierusal., as well as in the so-called Evangelium Nicodemus (of which we shall have to speak hereafter), to which it is appended in several Latin MSS. (last reprint in Tischendorf, Evangel. apoc. p. 392, sq.; 2nd ed. p. 413, sqq.) The mistaken address to the emperor Claudius is explained by reference to the primeval Ebionitic Acts of Peter, which formed the basis of the later Acts of Peter and Paul, and represented the prince of the apostles as having come to Rome under the emperor Claudius for the purpose of opposing the machinations of Simon Magus. The epistle can, however, hardly have been preserved in its original form, and in the oldest text from which the Acts of Peter drew, was probably addressed to the emperor Tiberius.

Of much more recent origin is the Ἀποκρῶς Πιλάτου which has come down to us in two redactions (both reprinted in Tischendorf, Evangel. apoc. p. 413 sqq., 2nd ed. p. 433 sqq.). This work presupposes the existence of the Gesta Pilati, of which we shall have to speak presently, and cannot have been composed before the second half of the 5th century. In the MSS. which we possess, it forms one whole with the ῥαββίον Πιλάτου, which contains the oldest form of the Pilate-legend. It relates how Pilate was by the emperor summoned to Rome to answer for the part which he had taken in the crucifixion of our Lord, how he was thereupon tried and beheaded, but at the same time was received by Christ Himself among the blessed for the sake of his penitent and faithful confession (cp. Tischendorf, l. c. p. 430 sqq., 2nd ed. p. 448 sqq.). A forgery of later origin is the Latin Epistola Pilati ad Tiberium (Tischendorf l. c. p. 411 sq., 2nd ed. p. 433 sq.).

The most important and most widely disseminated writing of this class—the Gesta or Acta Pilati—is better known under a title which it probably first obtained in the course of the middle age, that of the Gospel of Nicodemus. Its correct designation is Ἐὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Νικοδήμου τοῦ ῥαββί

(2nd ed.) to the Greek text. The work is divided into two parts, of which the former narrates, with apologetic purpose, and on the basis of our four canonical gospels, but with numerous apocryphal additions, the history of our Lord's trial, condemnation, and crucifixion, while the latter seeks to establish the truth of His resurrection by the testimony of various eye-witnesses. In Tischendorf's opinion, wherein he has been followed by Rudolf Hofmann and others, these Acts of Pilate must have been already known to Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Eusebius. Further inquiry, however, leads to quite a different result. Even on the assumption that Justin Martyr did make use of a spurious document that announced itself as the official report of our Lord's trial, drawn up by or under the direction of Pilate, it certainly cannot have been identical with our Acts of Pilate, since the particulars which Justin is supposed to have derived therefrom are nowhere to be found in our Ἀποκρῶς. Neither do Tertullian's statements (Apol. 21, cf. 5) as to the contents of the report made by Pilate to the emperor Tiberius contain anything which specially belongs to our Acts of Pilate, while referring to several particulars that were not to be found in them at all. Even Hilgenfeld's and Volkmar's opinion, that our Acts may be a recast of an older work which Justin and Tertullian made use of, is improbable. For it is incredible that the statements found in Justin and Tertullian, had they really been derived from the original groundwork of our present Acts, could have afterwards been so completely eliminated from them; and fully irreconcilable with the character and composition of the work before us is the further view maintained by both critics that all particulars derived from the Gospel of St. John which it now contains are insertions of a more recent interpolator. Finally, both Justin Martyr and Tertullian imply the existence of a document drawn up in the form of official Acta promissoria; this is not applicable to our Acts of Pilate, which themselves indicate Nicodemus as their author. Supposing, then, these fathers really had the document they refer to in their hands, it must have borne a similar character to the already mentioned Epistola Pilati ad Claudium, though, doubtless, with a correct address indicating it as a report made to the emperor Tiberius. We know for certain that in Tertullian's time (and it is possible that also in Justin Martyr's) a document of this kind was really in circulation among the Christians. The church-historian (Eusebius), moreover (H. E. ii. 2), and a sermon attributed to Simon Cephas as preached in the city of Rome (cp. Carsten, Ancient Syrian Documents, p. 23 sqq. of the English translation) mention indeed an official report as made by Pilate to Tiberius, but exhibit no acquaintance with our Acts. Eusebius seems rather to have derived his information from Tar-therefore, composed between the years A.D. 307 and A.D. 313, and probably after the Toleration Act of Galerius (A.D. 311) which Maximinus had refused to accept. The first trace of any reference to our present Acts will be found in the Panarion of Epiphanius (A.D. 376) who states that the Quartodecimans appealed to a statement in the Acts of Pilate for the correctness of their determination of the day of the passion. The statement is actually found in our present Acts.

As to the composition of this work the first Greek recension (Gr. A.) comprises in our present MSS. sixteen chapters, of which cc. 1-11 treat of the passion, cc. 12-16 of the resurrection of Jesus. The book has two different introductions. The first designates Aeneas, a contemporary of the emperor Theodosius II. and of Valentinian III., as translator of the following treatise from the Hebrew. The second begins with fixing the date of our Lord's death, and adds the statement that Nicodemus had written an account in the Hebrew language of the events which followed the crucifixion and passion of our Lord. The second Greek recension (Gr. B),—under the title of Διήγησις περὶ τοῦ πάθους τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ τῆς ἁγίας αὐτοῦ ἀναστάσεως—treats of the same subject; but adds eleven more chapters (cc. 17-27) at the end. These chapters contain an account of our Lord's descent into hell, which is only outwardly appended to the Acts of Pilate, and announces itself as the production of two sons of Simeon who had been raised from the dead at the resurrection of Christ. The title of this recension names "the Jew Aeneas" as its author (not translator), while, on the other hand, it asserts that it was translated by "the Roman τετάρχος" Nicodemus from Hebrew into Latin. The first mentioned text (Gr. A) is undoubtedly the original one; and its date (that at least of the present redaction) is exactly fixed by the first Prologue as A.D. 425. He there mentioned Aeneas who designates himself πρωτόκτρω ἀπὸ ἐπαρχῶν, could not indeed have translated the book from the Hebrew, as it certainly was originally written neither in Hebrew nor in Latin, but in Greek; but he probably found it stated that Nicodemus had written such a book in the Hebrew language. A comparison of the two Latin recensions of which the one follows the text of Gr. A as far as c. 16, the other to c. 11, leads to the result that the Appendix, cc. 17-27, was not first added in Gr. B, but is part of the work of Aeneas himself. It is indeed wanting in our existing MSS. of Gr. A, but so also in most of them is the Prologue of Aeneas. This Appendix, which is printed by Tischendorf as a separate tractate, under the title of Descensus Christi ad Inferos, has been handed down to us, not only in the second Greek recension (Gr. B.) but also in two independent Latin versions—one of which (Lat. A) presents a text nearly related to that of Gr. B, while the other (Lat. B) differs widely from it in the order of the narrative, mode of representation, and phraseology, and presents several peculiarities which recur in cc. 1-16 of Gr. A (compare for instance c. 17, 6, the name of the Mount Malech—14, 1; 15, 1; 16, 3—whereas Gr. B and Lat. A speak everywhere of the Mount of Olives).

text of the Acts of Pilate

did not yet contain the Appendix, but the second Introduction is to be assigned to it. It begins with the words:—'Ἐν ἔτει πεντεκαδεκάτῳ ἢ ὀκτωκαδεκάτῳ τῆς ἡγεμονίας Τιβερίου Καίσαρος βασιλέως Ῥωμαίων καὶ Ἡρώδου βασιλέως τῆς Γαλιλαίας ἐν ἐννεακαδεκάτῳ ἔτει τῆς ἀρχῆς αὐτοῦ τῇ πρὸ ὀκτὼ καλανδῶν Ἀπριλλίων, ἥτις ἐστὶν εἰκὰς πέμπτη Μαρτίου, ἐν ὁκατεία Ῥούφου καὶ Ῥουβελλίου, ἐν τῷ τετάρτῳ ἔτει τῆς διακοσιοστῆς δευτέρας ὀλυμπιάδος ἐπὶ ἀρχιερέως τῶν Ἰουδαίων Ἰωσήπου τοῦ Καϊάφα. In the chronological notices here given, two different reckonings appear to have been followed. The fifteenth year of Tiberius and (if the reading be correct) the consulate of the two Gemini carry us back to the olden chronology which made A.D. 29 the year of the Crucifixion, while the other dates imply a reckoning which came not into vogue till after Eusebius, and assigned our Lord's death to the year A.D. 32. But we must probably read the eighteenth (instead of the fifteenth) year of Tiberius, and as to the consulate of the two Gemini, this was very variously dated by later authors (compare Epiphanius, Haer. li. 23; Chron. Paschale, pp. 389, 391, ed. Bonn; Acta Barsimaei, ap. Cureton, Ancient Syrian Documents, p. 72 of the English translation). The Gentile Acts of Pilate, on the other hand, know nothing as yet of the Eusebian chronology. This suffices to prove that our Christian Acts must, even as to their oldest text, be more recent than the Gentile ones, and that the latter could not have been written, as Tischendorf assumes, in order to supersede the former, but that the opposite assumption is the only one possible. The original text of our Acts must therefore have, in any case, appeared after the publication of Eusebius's Church History (A.D. 326) and perhaps some decenniums later still, in the time of the emperor Julian (A.D. 361-363). With this agree a whole series of linguistic and other peculiarities which all indicate a time subsequent to that of Constantine the Great. (Compare Lipsius, Die Pilatusacten, Kiel, 1871.)

The second part of the Acts of Pilate, the Descensus Christi ad Inferos, added since the year A.D. 425, must have been originally an independent work, and was probably of Gnostic origin. According to the text of Lat. B, the two resuscitated mortals who relate the deeds of Christ in the lower world bear the names of Leucius and Karinus. Behind these names lies hidden that of Leucius Charinus, the well-known author of numerous Gnostic apocryphal writings. There are moreover several traces in the work itself of a Gnostic origin, which may, perhaps, be referred as far back as to the former half of the 3rd century; whereas the present text cannot certainly be older than the latter half of the 4th.

Among apocryphal gospels now lost or existing only in fragments, must be first considered those which once possessed more or less authority even in Catholic circles. These are four in number, the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of the Egyptians, and the Diatessaron of Tatian.

(1.) The Gospel of the Hebrews (Εὐαγγέλιον κατ' Ἑβραίων, i.e. the Gospel used by the Hebrews or Jewish Christians of Palestine and Syria, to whom the Aramaic was their mother-tongue) was reckoned by many, according to Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) among the Homologumena of the New Testament, but was placed among the Antilegomena, by Eusebius himself and in the stichometry of Nicephorus. It owes the high honour in which it was once held to the fact that it was almost universally regarded in the first centuries as the Hebrew original of our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew (Hieronym. in Matth. xii. 13; contra Pelagian. iii. 1, cf. Catal. vir. illustr. 3). This opinion was transmitted by the Jewish Christians or Ebionites, among whom the gospel commonly went by the title of The Gospel of St. Matthew, to Catholic Christians, and was by these last in consequence interchangeably designated by both names. (Irenaeus, Haer. i. 26, 2; iii. 11, 7; Epiphanius, Haer. xxviii. 5; xxx. 3, 13, 14; Philaster, Haer. 36; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. ii. 1; comp. Eusebius, H. E. iii. 25, 27; Epiphanius, Haer. xxix. 9; xxx. 6, etc.) Papias is an early witness for St. Matthew having written in Hebrew (ap. Euseb. iii. 39) and the same tradition is repeated by Irenaeus (Haer. iii. 1, 1); Pantaenus (ap. Euseb. H. E. v. 10); Origen (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 25); Eusebius (H. E. iii. 24, and elsewhere); Jerome (in Matth. Praefat. et passim); Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xiv.). The existence of this Gospel of the Hebrews as a distinct work, differing from our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew, is first put on record by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. ii. 9; p. 453 Potter) and by Origen who makes several citations from it (in Joann. tom. ii. 6; in Jerem. xv. 4; in Matth. tom. xv. 14). Hegesippus is also reported to have borrowed some things from the Gospel of the Hebrews (Euseb. H. E. iv. 22). According to Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.) and Jerome (in Matth. praef.; c. Pelag. iii. 1) it also bore among the Ebionites the title of Gospel according to the Apostles. Jerome translated it into Greek and Latin from a copy found at Beroea (Vir. illustr. 2, 3; ad Mich. vii. 2; in Matth. xii. 13; contra Pelagian. iii. 1). The distinction which Hilgenfeld has proposed to make between a Hebrew Gospel of the Nazarenes and a Greek Gospel of the Ebionites (vid. Novum Testamentum extra Canonem, fasc. iv.) is inexact. Apart from its being an error to regard only the Essaeian Jewish Christians as Ebionites, and to designate all the rest as Nazarenes, it is evident that Jerome knew nothing as yet of any such Greek Gospel, while, on the other hand, he makes the remark that the Hebrew or Aramaic text which he translated was in use both among Nazarenes and Ebionites (in Matth. xii. 13). And yet of this text Greek versions must have existed at a very early date; for not Epiphanius only but Eusebius also makes all his quotations from such a version. It is moreover highly probable that Jewish Christians themselves, if not resident in Palestine or Syria, read the gospel in Greek.

With regard to the form and structure of this Gospel of the Hebrews it is somewhat difficult to arrive at any judgment by means of the scattered fragments which alone have been preserved. One thing is certain, that at various times and in different circles it took very different shapes. According to Epiphanius (Haer. xxx. 13, 14) the gospel commenced thus:—'Εγένετο ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἡρώδου τοῦ βασιλέως τῆς Ἰουδαίας, ἦλθεν τις Ἰωάννης ὀνόματι βαπτίζων βάπτισμα μεταβολὰς ἐν τῷ Ἰορδάνῳ ποταμῷ. From this it is evident that in the text which Epiphanius quotes from, and which was in use among Gnosticizing Jewish Christians, the chapters relating to our Lord's genealogy, His birth, and childhood, must have been wanting. Other accounts inform us, however, that in the texts used by Cerinthus and Carpocrates, while all reference was still wanting to our Lord's supernatural birth, the genealogy (Matt. i. 1-17) was given, concluding (we may conjecture) with the words, 'Ἰωσήφ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν (comp. Epiphanius, Haer. xxviii. 5; xxx. 3, 14, with Hilgenfeld's remarks, l. c. p. 17). The history of our Lord's baptism in the Jordan was also differently related in different texts (Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 13; cf. Hieron. c. Pelag. iii. 2; ad Jesai. xi. 1). These discrepancies prove the existence in early times, not indeed of different works bearing the same title, but of different redactions of one and the same original work. The fragments preserved in the Greek by Epiphanius betray very clearly their dependence on our canonical gospels, though it is impossible, on the other hand, to prove that the Hebrew text was a translation back into Aramaic from the Greek. The Aramaic fragments also contain much that can be explained and understood only on the hypothesis that it is a recasting of the canonical text. It is moreover manifest that the recension used by those Jewish Christians who are called by Epiphanius "Ebionites" (and whom we may designate as "Gnostic," or, more properly, "Essaeian" Judaizers) is the result of various alterations, all breathing more or less a sectarian Essaeian spirit, e.g. the saying, "I am come to put an end to sacrifices, and if ye cease not to offer them wrath will not depart from you" (Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 16). And again: "Have I then desired to keep this passover with you by eating flesh?" (Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 22). The working of the same spirit is manifested in the substitution of "oil-cakes" (ἐγκρίδες) for the "locusts" (ἀκριδες) of Matt. iii. 4. The narrative of our Lord's baptism (Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 13), with its threefold voice from heaven, is evidently a more recent combination of older texts, of which the first is found in the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke; the second in the text of the Cambridge Cod. Bezae at St. Luke iii. 22; in Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryphon. 88, 103), and Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedag. 1, 6, p. 113, Potter); the third in our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew. And this very narrative may suffice to prove that the so-called "Hebrew" text preserved by St. Jerome is by no means preferable to that of our canonical Gospel of St. Matthew, and even less original than the Greek text quoted by Epiphanius. Instead of the voice from heaven we have here an address made to Christ by the Holy Spirit, and in the place of the descent in dovelike form of the Holy Spirit upon Him a theological theory as to the Spirit's relation to the prophets and to Jesus. "It came to pass as the Lord ascended up out of the water, that the whole fountain of the Holy Spirit came down and rested upon Him, and said to Him: 'My son, in all the prophets I waited for Thee till Thou shouldst come, and I might rest upon Thee! For Thou art My rest, Thou art my first-born son, who reignest for evermore'" (Hieron. ad Jesai. xi. 1). With this should be compared the quotation in Origen (in Jerna. tom. ii. 6; Hom. in Jerem. xv. 4), which is repeated also by St. Jerome (in Mich. vii. 6; in Jesai. xl. 12): "Then laid hold of me my mother the Holy Spirit by one of my hairs and carried me up into the great mountain of Tabor." This passage also presupposes a theological theory as to the relation of the Holy Spirit (the Divine $\Pi\tau\tau$) to the Person of the Messiah. Yet more decidedly manifest is the reflex of a later time in the narrative of Jesus being driven by His mother, St. Mary, to baptism almost against His will. When His mother and brethren say to Him, "John the Baptist is baptizing for the forgiveness of sins," Christ says in reply, "What sin have I committed that I should go to be baptized of him,—unless it be that this very word is a sin of ignorance on my part?" This narrative discusses a problem as remote as possible from the simple sphere of thought in which the original gospel moves.

Other tokens may also be discovered that the Gospel of the Hebrews must have undergone numerous reconstructions of the original text. Such, for instance, must have been the case with the narrative concerning the vocation of the twelve apostles when Matthew is introduced, speaking in the first person, and Jesus Himself as addressing him (Epiph. Haer. xxx. 13); so also with the appeal made to Jesus by the man with the withered hand: "I was a stonemason, and sought to maintain myself by the work of my own hands. I pray thee, Jesus, heal me that that I may not shamefully have to beg (Hieron. ad Matt. xii. 13). The like may be said of the reading at Matt. xxiii. 35 (Zacharias filius Joadae), which is based upon an erroneous correction. To the same category belong such narratives as these:—That on the death of Jesus Christ the upper lintel of the Temple ("superliminare Templi infinitae magnitudinis") was broken in pieces (Hieron. ad Matth. xxvii. 51; Epist. 120 ad Hedib.), that the risen Jesus gave His linen grave-clothes to the servant of the high-priests, that James, the Lord's brother, bound himself by an oath at the last supper to eat not the smallest piece of bread henceforth till he had seen Jesus risen, and that the risen Lord had appeared to James the Just, His brother, and thus addressed him while offering him a portion of the broken bread: "My brother, eat thy bread, because the Son of Man is risen from among them that sleep" (Hieron. Vir. illustr. 2).

In all these cases, and the number might be increased by further instances, it is evident that an older narrative has received apocryphal additions.

But hereby it is by no means proved that the Gospel of the Hebrews has in no case preserved what was strictly speaking original. Apart from the numerous sayings which either literally, or almost literally, agree with those of our canonical St. Matthew (and the number of these was probably much greater than the fathers have reported), there are also various traces of very old traditions, among which must be reckoned that of the flame bursting forth over the Jordan at our Lord's baptism (Epiph. Haer. xxx. 13; cf. Justin M. c. Tryph. 88; Orac. Sibyll. vii. 81 sqq.; Praedic. Pauli ap. Pseudo-Cyprian. de Rebaptism.); the words of the second voice from heaven (comp. Psalm ii. 7), and a whole series of fragments, for most of which we have ancient testimonies, and which exhibit a remarkable agreement with our Gospel of St. Luke. Such are the sayings about being reconciled with the adversary, and the seven-fold forgiveness of the erring brother (Carpocrates, ap. Irenaeum, i. 25, 4; Epiph. Haer. xxvii. 5; Hieron. c. Pelag. iii. 2; comp. Luke xii. 58; xvii. 3, 4); the history of the woman accused of many sins (Papias ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 39; comp. Luke vii. 37 sq.); the discourse with the two rich men (Origen in Matt. tom. xv. 14), immediately followed by the saying about the children of Abraham dying of hunger (comp. Luke xviii. 22; x. 25 sqq.; xvi. 19 sqq.); the parable of the three servants who each receive a talent, and the description of the prodigal ($\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \delta\omicron\sigma\acute{\omicron}\tau\omega\varsigma\ \epsilon\zeta\eta\kappa\omicron\tau\omicron\varsigma$), comp. Luke xix. 12 with Luke xv. 13, 30 (Euseb. Theophan. in Nova Patr. Bibl. tom. iv. Rom. 1847, p. 155), to which may be added the appearance of the risen Jesus to St. Peter, the invitation to touch and handle the Lord's body, the eating and drinking (comp. Luke xxiv. 34, 39 sq.; Ignat. ad Smyrn. 3). The appearance of our Lord to James is, apart from the mention of it by St. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 7), recorded nowhere else but in the Gospel of the Hebrews. In the case of several of our Lord's sayings, such as those of agreeing with the adversary, and of forgiveness, it seems natural to conjecture a combination of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and anyhow the concluding words of the second of these sayings— $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \gamma\acute{\alpha}\rho\ \epsilon\upsilon\ \tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \pi\omicron\phi\eta\tau\alpha\iota\ \mu\epsilon\tau\grave{\alpha}\ \tau\omicron\ \chi\omicron\iota\sigma\theta\eta\eta\alpha\iota\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \epsilon\upsilon\ \pi\omicron\epsilon\upsilon\mu\alpha\tau\iota\ \acute{\alpha}\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \epsilon\upsilon\ \rho\iota\sigma\kappa\epsilon\tau\alpha\iota\ \epsilon\upsilon\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma\ \acute{\alpha}\mu\alpha\rho\tau\iota\alpha\varsigma$ —have the appearance of being a later addition. On the other hand, the parable of the three servants appears to point back to a source which may have preserved, at least in some respects, an older text than that of our synoptical gospels, and a like conjecture may perhaps be hazarded in reference to the history of the two rich men and some other sayings attributed to our Lord.

The various contradictory phenomena can only be explained by the supposition that our Gospel of the Hebrews in the form in which it was read by Epiphanius and Jerome, and even that in which Origen must have known it, was a re-cast of an older original that had passed through several hands. This original work was written in Hebrew, or, more correctly speaking, in Aramaic, and was nearly related on the one hand to the so-called $\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\upsilon\pi\lambda\omicron\upsilon$, which formed the basis of St. Matthew's Gospel, and on the other, to the Ebionitic writing made use of by St. Luke, which itself was only a later redaction of the $\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\alpha$. The formation of this third recast of the same original work occupying a mid-position between the other two, must be sought, like that of the Ebionitic edition of the $\lambda\omicron\gamma\iota\alpha$, which we suppose to have been used by St. Luke, in the Ebionite circles of Palestine. In the form assumed by this gospel in the time of Origen, it already bears the character of a partisan work subservient to the dogmatic interest of a sect already separated from the Catholic church. In the hands of the Christian Essenes it has undergone further alterations, some of which at least appear to indicate the existence of a Greek text at the time of their introduction.

Recent critics have been disposed to refer back to the Gospel of the Hebrews, a whole series of utterances attributed to our Lord, which either (like the oft-cited γίνεσθε δοκιμοὶ τραπεῖται) are not found in any one of our canonical gospels, or are perpetually and uniformly given by writers of the 2nd and 3rd centuries in a form different from that in which they are met with there. The former assumption is in many, if not in all, cases the most probable; to the latter may be opposed with equal right the possibility of different readings in the text of our gospels. Compare, for instance, the saying about swearing or oath-taking (Justin. Apol. i. 16; Clem. Hom. iii. 55; xix. 2; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 14, p. 707; vi. 11, p. 872, Potter); the injunction to the rich youth (Justin M. Dial. c. Tryph. 101; Marcosii ap. Iren. Haer. i. 20, 2; Naasseni ap. Pseudorig. Philos. v. 7, p. 102, Miller; Valentin. ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 20, p. 488; and again in another form Clem. Hom. iii. 57; xviii. 1, 3); and, finally, the saying, No man hath known the Father but the Son, &c. (Justin. Apol. i. 63; Marcosii ap. Iren. Haer. i. 20, 3; Clem. Hom. xvii. 4; xviii. 4, 11, 13, 20; Marcion, in Dial. de recta Fide, sect. 1, in opp. Origen, ed. Lomm. xvi. 283; Justin M. Dial. 100; Tertull. adv. Marcion. iv. 25, and elsewhere). That ecclesiastical writers down to the beginning of the 3rd century made use at times of uncanonical gospels is now generally acknowledged. Justin Martyr, for instance, and the Clementine homilies certainly made use of one or more such along with the gospels of our canon. But the attempt to prove that the two writers had one such extra-canonical authority common to them both, either in the Gospel of the Hebrews or in the Gospel of St. Peter (of which we shall speak presently) has altogether failed. It is only in the rarest cases that they literally agree in their deviations from the text of our gospels; they differ in their citations as much, for the most part, one from the other as they do from the text of the synoptical evangelists, even in such cases when one or the other repeatedly quotes the same passage, and each time in the same words. Only in very few cases is the derivation from the Gospel of the Hebrews probable, as in the saying concerning the new birth (Justin M. Apol. i. 61; Clem. Homilies, xi. 26; Recogn. vi. 9); in other cases where the text holds a mid-position between the Gospels of Matthew and Luke such derivation is at least possible; in most cases, however, it is quite enough to assume that the quotations were made from memory, and so account for the involuntary confusion of evangelistic texts.

(2) The Gospel of Peter (εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Πέτρον) is mentioned by Serapion, who was bishop of Antioch at the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd century (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 12) and Origen (in Matt. tom. xvii. 10). The former relates that he had found this work in ecclesiastical use at Rhossus in Cilicia; that at first he had not made any objection to it, but had afterwards, on better acquaintance with its contents, forbidden its use; because, though for the most part orthodox, it yet favoured in some places the heretical views of the Docetae, whom he supposed to be in fact the followers of Marcion. This account makes it probable that this Gospel of Peter was a Gnostic recast of a canonical gospel. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25; comp. iii. 3) and after him Jerome (Vir. Illust. 1) and the Decretum Gelasii (c. 6) speak of it as an heretical work which no early teacher of the church had made use of. The statement of Theodoret (Haer. Fab. ii. 2) that the Nazarenes had made use of this gospel rested probably on a misunderstanding. The passage moreover in Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. 106), in which some have thought to find mention of the Memorials of Peter, is very doubtful. Justin does indeed very frequently speak of the ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων but nowhere else of the ἀπομνημονεύματα Πέτρου, and it is quite contrary to his practice to give any names to the evangelistic writings of which he makes use. In the passage in question the right reading is most probably not ἀπομνημονεύματα αὐτοῦ (i.e. of Peter mentioned just before) but ἀπομν. αὐτῶν (i.e. τῶν ἀποστόλων as elsewhere). Herewith fall to the ground all those hypotheses which make the Gospel of Peter into an original work made use of by Justin Martyr, nigh related to the Gospel of the Hebrews, and either the Jewish-Christian basis of our canonical St. Mark, or, at any rate, the gospel of the Gnostifying Ebionites. Neither does Origen's statement that according to the Gospel of Peter the Lord's brethren were sons of Joseph by a former marriage well agree with the assumption of its Jewish-Christian character, inasmuch as that statement presupposes not only the Lord's supernatural birth (as actually received by some Ebionites in later times) but also the perpetual virginity of Mary. On this point the Gospel of Peter stood more probably in a near relation to the apocryphal gospels of the infancy.

(3) The Gospel of the Egyptians (Εὐαγγέλιον κατ' Αἰγυπτίους) was in special use in various heretical circles — e.g. among the Encratites (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9, p. 540 sq. Potter, 13 p. 553), the Naassenes (Pseud.-Orig. Philos. v. 7, p. 98, Miller) and the Sabellians (Epiphan. Haer. lxii. 2); but was also used without scruple in Catholic circles as authority for sayings attributed to our Lord, as for instance in the so-called second epistle of the Roman bishop Clement. It was already used, as we learn from Clemens Alex., by the Gnostic Julius Cassianus, the head of the sect of so-called Encratites, and is cited not only in the extracts from the writings of Theodotus found among the works of Clemens (c. 67, p. 985, Potter) but also in the Acts of Thomas (Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, p. 282 of the English translation) and by Pseudo-Linus de passione Petri et Pauli (Bibl. Patr. Max. ii. p. 70 b). Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.) and Jerome (in Matt. praef.) mention it as an heretical writing. The fragments which have been preserved confirm this judgment. This gospel was a product of that pantheistic gnosis which we find among the Naassenes of the Philaeophumena and some other kindred sects. According to this doctrine the soul is of pneumatic nature, but has sunk down into this lower world, the world of transient births, in which it undergoes the most manifold changes till finally redeemed and delivered by the gnosis. When a man has once obtained an insight into the unsubstantial character of all the distinctions which prevail among, and separate one from another, the things of this visible world, when he has learned to know that which is divided as one, and things separated as bound together, then has he become partaker of that gnosis which entitles him to enter into the kingdom of God or the upper spiritual world. In this sense must be understood the answer which Jesus makes in this gospel to the question as to when His kingdom will come: "When out of two has been made One, and the Outward has become as the Inward and the Male with the Female neither Male nor Female" (Clement, ad Corinth. ii. c. 12, comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. III. 13, p. 553; Naasseni apud Pseud.-Orig. Philos. v. 7, p. 99, Miller; Acta Thomæ, ap. Wright, l. c.). Similar to this is the saying preserved by Pseudo-Linus: "Unless ye make equal and alike the Right and the Left, the Left and the Right, Upper and Lower, Former and Hinder, ye cannot know the kingdom of God" (l. c. p. 70 b). Connected with this pantheistic mysticism is also that ascetic practice which this gospel recommends. If the distinctions of sex are one day to cease, and the true gnosis imparts an insight into the vanity of such distinctions, the Encratite prohibition of marriage follows as a natural practical consequence. And so Christ is made to declare that it is the object of His mission to destroy the works of the female (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9, p. 540). The words appear to have been taken from the discourse of Jesus with Salome, of which several other fragments have also been preserved. Salome asks: "How long shall Death reign?" and receives the answer: "So long as ye women give birth." She replies: "Then have I done well that I bare not," and receives the further admonition: "Eat of every herb, but the bitter one eat not" (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 6, p. 532; iii. 9, p. 539, p. 541, cxc. ex Script. Theod. 67). If death is to last as long as child-bearing, it follows that the satisfying of the sexual impulse must be what is meant by eating the bitter herb. Jesus therefore is made to reply to a further question of Salome's, the nature of which appears from the answer: "When ye tread under foot the covering of shame" (ὅταν τὸ τῆς αἰσχύνης ἔνδυμα πατήσῃτε), i.e. when all distinctions of sex are done away. Whereupon followed the words already quoted: "When out of Two is made One," &c. (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 13, p. 533).

There may be also other fragments of this Gospel of the Egyptians preserved in the second epistle of Clement and elsewhere. E.g. the saying: "Though ye be gathered in My Bosom, if ye keep not My commandments I will cast you away, and will say unto you, Depart from Me, I know not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity" (Clem. Ep. ii. c. 4), and the discourse with the disciples originally connected therewith (Clem. Ep. ii. c. 5), in which Jesus says, "Ye shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves." Whereupon Peter answers Him: "But if the wolves should scatter the lambs?" "Jesus saith to Peter: 'The lambs after death need not fear the wolves'" (comp. Luke xiii. 27, x. 3, and also Isai. xl. 11). By the lambs are meant (according to the mind of the Gnostic author) the Pneumatici, by the wolves, most probably, the Archontes (Rulers) of this present world.

The date at which this gospel was written cannot be fixed much later than about the middle of the 2nd century; the locality, as the name expresses, was most probably Egypt.

(4) The Gospel of Tatian, commonly called the Diatessaron (τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων) is mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 29), Epiphanius (Haer. xli. 1), and Theodoret (H. F. i. 20). The first two had not the book itself in their hands. Eusebius concluded, from the title Diatessaron (which in his time meant a harmony or synopsis of our four canonical gospels), that Tatian's work must have been similar to a synoptical work of the Alexandrine Ammonius, Origen's teacher, which Eusebius had himself re-edited. Although he knew nothing further of the structure of this work, Eusebius remarks that it was still in his own time made use of by "some." All that Epiphanius has to tell us is that τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων εὐαγγέλιον was said to have been the work of Tatian, and that it was called by some the Gospel of the Hebrews (καθ' Ἑβραίων). The first and at the same time the only writer to whom we are indebted for more exact information, is Theodoret. He likewise names Tatian as the author of the Diatessaron, and adds that he had omitted the genealogies and everything having reference to the human descent of Jesus from the house of David. The book in Theodoret's time was not only in the hands of heretics, but of some Catholics also, who, the historian informs us, had failed to discern the sinister purpose with which it had been put together, and used it in all simplicity as an abstract. Theodoret found over two hundred copies in his own diocese, which he took away, supplying their place with the four canonical gospels. A further testimony to the reception of the work in some parts of the Syrian church may be found in a statement of the Doctrina Adlaci (ed. Phillips, London, 1876, p. 34 of the English translation), according to which the Diatessaron was publicly read in the church of Edessa. But Tatian's name is not here mentioned, and it is quite possible that another synopsis of the four gospels may be thus referred to. If, finally, we could trust the statement of a Syrian writer of the latter half of the 12th century, Dionysius Bar-Salibi (Assemani Bibl. Orient. i. 57; ii. 159 sq.), we might add that Tatian's Diatessaron began with the first words of the prologue of St. John—"In the beginning was the Word"—Dionysius adds that St. Ephrem had illustrated this harmony of the four gospels by a commentary. But the learned Gregory Bar Hebraeus, bishop of Tagrit, relates precisely the same of the Diatessaron of Ammonius (Assemani B. O. i. 57 sq.), and Ebed Jesu († 1308) actually makes Ammonius and Tatian into one and the same person (Assemani iii. 12). On what work St. Ephrem wrote his commentary cannot be decided till the Armenian translation of it has been published. All that can be drawn with any certainty from the contradictory statements of these later Syrian writers is that they drew their conclusions from the simple fact of the title Diatessaron being applied to the work of which they were speaking.

A Harmony of the Gospels, which, after prefixing the prologue of St. Luke's Gospel, commences with "In the beginning was the Word," is still preserved both in the Latin and the Frankish languages. The Latin text has been several times reprinted, now under the name of Ammonius, now under that of Tatian; under the former name in the Editio princeps of Michael Memler, Mayence, 1524, under the latter, at first among the Orthodoxographi (Basil. 1569, tom. ii. pp. 659-661), and subsequently in the various Bibliothecae Patrum. The Frankish text, which dates from the 9th century, was published by Schmeller at Vienna in 1841. Victor of Capua (A.D. 546) supplied to this Gospel-Harmony the Ammonian sections as improved by Eusebius; the Latin text, which is that of the Vulgate, he found ready to his hand, but not assigned by name to any author. Victor hesitates whether to ascribe the work to Ammonius or to Tatian, but inclines towards the latter hypothesis, because, according to Eusebius (Ep. ad Carpian.), the synopsis of Ammonius followed exclusively the order of St. Matthew (comp. Victor's Preface ap. Ranke, Codex Fuldensis, Marburg, 1868, pp. 1-3). Of the genuineness of this Latin and German "Tatian" there can be no serious question; but the use of the names of Tatian and Ammonius in this connexion, is one among various proofs that those names have been applied to widely different gospel-harmonies.

The old dispute among critics whether Tatian really made use of our four canonical Gospels, and especially whether he used the Gospel of St. John, or whether, in the place at least of this last he used an uncanonical gospel, such as the Gospel according to the Hebrews, is, in the absence of more exact information, difficult to decide. The possibility that the Gospel of St. John was one of the four worked up by Tatian into a new whole cannot be disputed, since he certainly made frequent use of it in his Apology (Orat. ad Graec. c. 13, 19, comp. 4, 5), written about A.D. 170. That Tatian made use of the Gospel of the Hebrews along with the four canonical gospels, and perhaps regarded it even as his chief authority, has been inferred first from the statement of Epiphanius that some actually regarded his work as identical with the Gospel of the Hebrews, and secondly from that of Victor, that it sometimes bore the title of Diapente. But the former statement may rest on some confusion; the latter is too feebly supported by other evidence. We fall back, therefore, on the meagre notices of Theodoret. These prove so much as this: that Tatian's work was sufficiently like our four gospels to be regarded and used by many Catholics without scruple as an abstract of them. Its heretical character must therefore have consisted not so much in foreign additions as in omissions with a special purpose. The omission of the genealogies, and of all notices relating to our Lord's human descent, are indications of docetic opinions, and Tatian's way of working up the gospel narratives so as to make them suit his special objects, reminds one of similar proceedings of Marcion, with whom he has otherwise much in common.

The last group of apocryphal gospels consists of those which were exclusively employed by heretics. Of most of these we know the names only. Of some, more or less important fragments have been preserved.

Some of these heretical gospels are identified with works that are otherwise known to us. Such, for instance, is the case with the gospels of Cerinthus and Carpocrates (Epiph. Haer. li. 7 comp. xxviii. 5, xxx. 14). Neither of these men wrote a gospel of his own, but both (as is evident from the account given us) used the Gospel of the Hebrews in that older form which contained the genealogy (St. Matt. i. 1-17), but not the history of our Lord's childhood (Matt. i. 18-ii. 23). Jerome accordingly reckons Cerinthus, and his successor Ebion, as well as Carpocrates, among those who have mutilated the holy gospels (Adv. Lucifer. Opp. iv. 2, p. 304, ed. Martianay). Of the Gospel of Bartholomew, which was also identified by some with that of the Hebrews, and the Gospel of Basilides, we shall speak further on.

Another section of these apocryphal gospels consisted (like the Gospel of Peter and the Diatessaron) of Gnostic corruptions of one or another of our canonical gospels. Among those of most interest and importance are—

(1) The Gospel of Marcion.—The text of this work has been preserved with tolerable completeness in the notices contained in the fourth book of Tertullian against Marcion—and in Epiphanius (Haer. xlii.), to which may be added some accounts in Irenaeus, and in the Dial. de recta Fide. The first attempt to restore this text was made by Hahn (Königsberg, 1823, comp. Thilo, Cod. Apocr. pp. 401-486); but a sure and complete judgment on doubtful points respecting it has only been attained since special studies have led to a more correct appreciation of the purpose and objects of those champions of orthodoxy, and their peculiar methods of citation. The consequence is that few points in regard to Marcion's text are now considered obscure or disputable (comp. Volkmar, Evangelium Marcionis, Leipsic, 1852, p. 150 sqq.). His gospel was in fact a Gnosticizing recast of that of St. Luke, which, without any direct interpolation of his peculiar views, excluded everything which, as inconsistent with them, appeared to Marcion to militate against the truth of the gospel. In particular every reference to our Lord's human origin, to the authority of the Mosaic Law, and of the prophets, or to the historical connexion of Christianity with the religion of the Old Testament was carefully eradicated. The whole of the early history was omitted, together with that of John the Baptist, and those of our Lord's baptism and temptation in the wilderness.

The gospel began with Luke iii. 1, followed immediately by iv. 31, thus: 'Εν ἔτει τεττεκαίδεκάτῃ τῆς ἡγεμονίας Τιβερίου Καίσαρος, ἡγεμονεύοντος Ποντίου Πιλάτου τῆς Ἰουδαίας, κατήλθεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἰς Καφαρναούμ πόλιν τῆς Γαλιλαίας. Then followed Luke iv. 31-37, and after that the history of our Lord's appearance at Nazareth (Luke iv. 16 sqq.) with numerous omissions. Thus in verse 16 were omitted the words οὗ ἦν τεθραμμένος, and again, ἀνέστη ἀναγνῶναι τοὺς ἀποβιβάζοντες αὐτόν in 20. In verse 21, he left out ὅτι σήμερον—τοῖς ὡσὶν ὑμῶν; in verse 22, καὶ ἔλεγον—Ἰωσήφ; in verse 23, ἐν τῇ πατρίδι σου; the whole of verse 24, and, perhaps, also verse 27. Among other omissions and alterations the following are noteworthy:—The omission of Luke viii. 19; xi. 29 (from εἰ μὴ τὸ σημεῖον Ἰωάνη on to v. 32), again vv. 49-51, and xii. 6, 7; xiii. 1-10. The alteration of xiii. 28 (πάντας τοὺς δικαίους instead of Ἀβραάμ—προφῆτας), and the omission of vv. 29, 30. The following passages were also struck out: xiii. 31-35, xv. 11-32, xvii. 10 (from λέγετε ὅτι δούλοι ἀχρεῖοι onwards); xviii. 31-34, xix. 29-48, xx. 9-18 and 19, ἔγνωσαν—εἶπεν, xxi. 18, 21, 22; xxii. 16-18, 24-30, 35-38, 49-51; xxiii. 34, 43; xxiv. 27, 32 (from ὡς διήνογεν on); 44 (from ὅτι δεῖ πληρωθῆναι on); 45, 46 (to γέγραπται καὶ οὕτως), 52, 53. Sometimes single words only are omitted, e.g. iv. 34, Ναζαρηνέ; x. 21, Πάτερ; xii. 8, 9, τῶν ἀγγέλων, 32, ὑμῶν, after ὁ πατήρ; xviii. 37, ὁ Ναζωραῖος; xix. 9, καθότι καὶ αὐτὸς υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ ἐστίν; xxiv. 19, τοῦ Ναζωραίου, and probably also xxiv. 47, ἀρξάμενοι ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλήμ, and 49, ὑμεῖς δὲ καθίστατε . . . ἐξ ὅσων δύναμιν. Actual alterations of the text, and additions to it, are rare. Yet at x. 21, Marcion read ὅτι ἄτινα ἦν κρυπτά . . . ἀπεκάλυψας instead of ὅτι ἔκρυψας ταῦτα—καὶ ἀπεκάλυψας; xi. 42, κλησὶν instead of κρίσιν. xvi. 12, ὑμέτερον for ἐμόν; xvi. 17, τῶν λόγων μου for τοῦ νόμου; xvii. 14, ἀπέστειλεν αὐτοὺς λέγων δείξατε instead of ἰδὼν—ἐπιδείξατε. In xvii. 18, the words εἰ μὴ ὁ ἀλλογενὴς οὗτος were wanting, and others inserted in their place, viz. (for the second time?) Luke iv. 27, πολλοὶ λεπροὶ—ὁ Σῦρος. At xx. 35, Marcion read ἐπὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ αἰῶνος ἐκείνου; xxi. 32, ὁ σῶν καὶ ἡ γῆ instead of ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη; xxiv. 25, ἐλάλησεν ὑμῖν instead of ἐλάλησαν οἱ προφῆται.

Nevertheless, by no means all Marcion's departures from our present text of St. Luke are to be laid to his account. Several of them he certainly found in the MS. which lay before him, and among them are some (not without support from other witnesses) where he has used an older and better text. Thus at viii. 21, was inserted τίς μου ἡ μήτηρ καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοί; (comp. Mark x. 33, Matt. xii. 48): at x. 21, he read εὐχαριστῶ καὶ ἐξομολογοῦμαι σοι; 22, οὐδεὶς ἔγνω τίς ἐστὶν ὁ πατήρ εἰ μὴ ὁ υἱὸς καὶ τίς ἐστὶν ὁ υἱὸς εἰ μὴ ὁ πατήρ, κ.τ.λ.; xi. 2, τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα σου καθαρῶς ἡμᾶς; xii. 38, τῇ ἐσπερῇ φυλακῇ; xvii. 2, εἰ μὴ ἐγεννήθη and ἡ μάχος ὀνικός, κ.τ.λ.; xviii. 19, μή με λέγε ἀγαθόν εἰς ἐστὶν ἀγαθὸς [θεὸς] ὁ πατήρ. At xiii. 2 were omitted (as still in our good MSS.) καὶ καταλύοντα τὸν νόμον καὶ τοὺς προφῆτας and καὶ ἀποστρέφοντα τὰς γυναῖκας καὶ τὰ τέκνα. Finally the variations at v. 14, ἵνα τοῦτο ᾗ μαρτύριον ὑμῖν, and vi. 17, ἐν αὐτοῖς are perfectly indifferent. With regard to some of Marcion's deviations we are not sufficiently informed, but apparent contradictions between Tertullian and Epiphanius disappear for the most part on a closer inquiry. The title of Marcion's gospel was simply εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ κυρίου. The date of composition is most probably assigned to the first period of Marcion's residence at Rome, i.e. about the year A.D. 145. We find, indeed, a statement in Pseudo-Tertullian (adv. Omnes Haeres. 16) that Cerdon, Marcion's teacher, had already made use of an abbreviated Gospel of St. Luke. But this statement appears to rest on a mistake. The view once maintained by Baur and Ritschl that Marcion's gospel was the older work, and our Gospel of St. Luke a Catholic recast of it, has been amply refuted by Volkmar and Hilgenfeld. The theory was abandoned for the main part by Baur himself, and completely given up by Ritschl.

Probably identical with Marcion's gospel is—
(2) The Gospel of Apelles. Apelles was a disciple of Marcion. Origen's report of him (Epist. ad Amicos in Alex. in Rufini Apolog. pro Orig.), that he had subjected the Gospels and "the apostle" to a process of purification must probably be understood to mean that he made use of his teacher Marcion's canon (comp. also Epiph. Haer. xliv. 4). Epiphanius, however, relates further (Haer. xliv. 2), that Apelles had appealed to the saying, γίνεσθε δόκιμοι τραπεζίται, as being one to be found ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ. But as this saying was not found in Marcion's gospel it would seem that Apelles could not have confined himself to that document.

St. Jerome, finally, attributes a similar mutilation of our canonical gospels to Saturninus and the Ophites (adv. Lucifer. l. c.), as well as to Basilides (Comm. in Tit. praef.). Of a Gospel composed by Saturninus nothing further is known. The Ophites, certainly along with the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, made use of several uncanonical gospels (Epiphanius, Haer. xxvii. 7; Pseudo-Tertull. adv. Omnes Haer. 6; Pseudo-Origen, Philos. v. 6), of which, however, we cannot tell whether or how far they are to be placed in the category of re-casts of our canonical gospels.

(3) Of Basilides.—Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.) Jerome (praef. in Matth.) and St. Ambrose (praef. in Luc.) report that he wrote a gospel which he presumed to entitle after his own name. In another place, where Origen is speaking of facts of the gospel history of which our canonical books make no mention, he warns against a too hasty rejection of such narratives, adding the remark that much indeed of this kind is to be found in the fictitious compositions of heretics, such as the "Hypythians" (Sethians) and Basilidians made use of (in Matth. Comm. series 28). If in this passage Origen was thinking of the Gospel of Basilides, we might infer from his words that it must have been an entirely different work from our canonical gospels. We know moreover that the Basilidians made use of other apocryphal writings, such as the "Traditions of Matthias." And we also learn from the testimony of Agrippa Castor (cf. Eus. H. E. iv. 7) and Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. iv. 12, p. 599) that Basilides had composed a work in twenty-four books bearing the title ἐξηγητικὰ εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. A fragment from this work is still preserved in the Acta disputationis Archelai et Manetis, c. 55 (Galland, Bibl. Patr. iii. 569 sqq.). It is an exposition of the parable of Dives and Lazarus. Clemens Alex. has also preserved another fragment from the 23rd book, which speaks of suffering as a consequence of the inbred sinful corruption of every man, with special reference to a passage concerning martyrdom (Luke xxi. 12 sqq.?). In any case the work must have been an exposition of some gospel, by whose authority Basilides endeavoured to establish his Gnostic doctrine. And it is anyhow most unlikely that he would have written a commentary on a gospel of his own composition. Of our canonical gospels those of Matthew, Luke, and John were used in his school, and from the fragments just referred to we may reasonably conclude that it was the Gospel of St. Luke on which he wrote his commentary. It is indeed quite possible that, like Marcion, he may have subjected this gospel to revision and alterations favourable to his special dogmatic purposes; but no certain conclusions can be arrived at on this point.

Numerous other apocryphal gospels in use among the Gnostics carried, like the Gospel of Peter, and the Childhood-Gospels of James, Matthew and Thomas, on their front the names of Apostolic men. To such belong—

(4) The Gospel of Andrew mentioned in some texts of the Decretum Gelasii (vi. 12). The "apocryphal writings bearing the name of Andrew," mentioned by pope Innocent I. (Epist. 6, ad Exuper.) and St. Augustine (c. adversar. leg. et prophet. 20), are probably the Gnostic εὐαγγέλιον Ἀνδρέου.

(5) The Gospel of Barnabas mentioned likewise in the Decretum Gelasii (vi. 10) and in the catalogue of Anastasius Sinaita (ap. Credner, Geschichte des Kanons, p. 241). A later legend relates that at the discovery of the relics of St. Barnabas in the island of Cyprus, a copy of the Gospel of St. Matthew, written with his own hand, was found lying on the saint's breast. (Tischend. Acta Apost. Apocr. Prolegg. xxx. and Acta Barnabae, c. 22, ap. Tischendorf, l. c. p. 72.) Farther, we must distinguish between the old Gnostic Gospel of St. Barnabas and a Mahometan fiction bearing the same name, which is still preserved in an Italian translation of the 15th century (Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. N. T. iii. pp. 373-394).

(6) The Gospel of Bartholomew (Hieron. praef. in Matth.; Gelasii Decretum, vi. 12). According to some accounts this Gospel would be identical with the Gospel of the Hebrews. And indeed we read in Eusebius (H. E. v. 10, cf. Hieron. Vir. Illustr. 36) that St. Bartholomew carried with him into India the Gospel of St. Matthew written in Hebrew characters, and that there it was afterwards found by Pantaenus, the teacher of Clemens Alexandrinus, on his missionary visit to that country. But Eusebius knows nothing of a Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew bearing also the name of Bartholomew; and Jerome speaks (in terms like to those of the Gelasian Decree) of the Gospel of Bartholomew as of an independent work of heretical origin. They both (St. Jerome and Gelasius) make mention of it in the same series with a number of Gnostic productions.

(7) The Gospel of Judas Iscariot in use among the Cainites (Irenaeus, Haer. i. 31, 1; Epiphan. Haer. xxxviii. 1; Theodoret, H. F. i. 15). This work represented Judas's betrayal as a meritorious action, and the traitor himself as the perfect Gnostic who destroyed the dominion of the Demiurge by bringing about the crucifixion of our Lord.

(8) The Gospel of Matthias is mentioned by Origen (Hom. i. in Luc.), Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25), Jerome (praef. in Matth.), Ambrose (in Luc. praef.), Innocent I. (Epist. 6 ad Exuper.), the Decree of Gelasius (vi. 8), and the list in Anastasius Sinaita (Credner, p. 241).

The work was, we may conjecture, identical with the Παραδόσεις Ματθαίου, which were in high esteem in Gnostic circles, and specially among the Basilidians, being regarded by these latter as the chief source of their doctrine (Clemens Alex. Strom. vii. 17, p. 900 Potter, Pseudo-Orig. Philos. vii. 20, p. 230, Miller). According to Pseudo-Origen the writing was composed in the form of apocryphal discourses, received by Matthias in secret instruction from our Lord. Some fragments of it have been preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus. The first runs thus:—"Behold with wonder the things present, for that is the first step towards a knowledge of the things beyond" (Strom. ii. 9, p. 452). A second: "The flesh must be contended with, and evil-entreated, and its unbridled lust must in no wise be yielded to, but the soul must be made to grow through faith and knowledge" (Strom. iii. 4, p. 523). A third saying: "When the neighbour of an elect person falls into sin then the elect one sins himself; for had he so lived as the word enjoins, his neighbour out of reverence for his manner of life would not have sinned" (Strom. vii. 13, p. 882). The work commended itself by its severe ascetic principles to the school of Basilides; and from some indications in the Philosophumena, it would seem also to have favoured some of their Gnostic speculations.

(9) The Gospel of Philip was, according to Epiphanius (Haer. xxvi. 13) in use among the members of a Gnostic sect allied to the Ophites, and alleged by them in justification of indulgence in unnatural lusts. The fragment, however, preserved, and quoted from it by the zealous opponent of heresy, contradicts his statement—"The Lord revealed to me what the soul ought to say when she mounts to heaven, and what answer she should give to each of the higher powers: 'I have known myself, and gathered myself together, and begotten no children for the Archon of this world, but have torn up his roots, and gathered the scattered members, and I know Thee, and who thou art! for I also am descended from the upper world.'" This gospel therefore inculcated, like the Gospel of the Egyptians, and the "traditions of Matthias," a severe asceticism. The prayers of the departing soul as she passes through the various heavens constitute indeed a favourite theme of various Gnostic writings. The Gospel of Philip was also in use among the Manichaeans (comp. Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. i. 139-142).

(10) The Gospel of Thaddaeus is mentioned in some MSS. of the Decretum Gelasianum (comp. Credner, Zur Geschichte des Kanons, Halle, 1847, p. 215).

Most of these pseudo-apostolical gospels, like the apocryphal acts of Apostles, were attributed to the authorship of Leucius Charinus, whom Catholic tradition has stamped as typical representative of the whole class of pseudo-epigraphical writings. So when the Decretum Gelasii, after recounting a whole series of apocryphal gospels, concludes with these words: Evangelia quae falsavit Lucianus apocrypha, Evangelia quae falsavit Isicius apocrypha (Credner, l. c. p. 216 sqq.), we may conjecture that beneath the names Lucianus and Isicius (Ysicius, Eusicius, Lucius, Eitius, Hyrcius, Hesychius, Ysius, &c.) may lurk the otherwise oft corrupted name of this Leucius. Rudolf Hofmann conjectures indeed that these two names may indicate two men who in early times made themselves noteworthy by labours expended on our canonical gospels, viz. Lucian, the presbyter of Antioch, and the Egyptian bishop Hesychius. But in some texts of the Decretum Gelasii the added clause quae falsavit Lucianus is also found after the enumeration of other Gnostic gospels, such as those of Thaddaeus, Barnabas, Thomas, Bartholomew, Andrew, Peter, Matthew (Credner, l. c.). The name of Leucius was also borne by the Gnostic original of the book (already mentioned), De Infantia Mariae et Salvatoris (comp. the epistle of Pseudo-Jerome to Chromatius and Heliodorus, ap. Tischend. Evangel. Apocryph. ed. ii. p. 52 sq., and the note by Grabe to Iren. Haer. i. 17).

Beside these pseudo-apostolical gospels a number of other gospels are mentioned as used in various Gnostic schools.

(11) The Simonians are reported by a confessedly somewhat recent witness (Praef. Arab. in Concil. Nicaen. ap. Fabric. i. p. 377) to have had a gospel of their own, which bore title—Book of the Four Corners, and Hinges of the World—and was accordingly divided into four parts. But this title reminds one too strongly of the doctrinal proof alleged by Irenaeus for the fourfold character of the church's gospel (Iren. Haer. iii. 11, 8) not to awaken a suspicion of some confusion of thought or memory in the witness. To the arch-heretic Simon himself is ascribed by the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 16) the authorship of various apocryphal writings put forth in the names of Christ and His apostles. Of another work attributed to Simon, and entitled The Great Announcement (ἡ ἀπόφασις ἡ μεγάλη), numerous fragments have been preserved by Pseudo-Origen (Philosoph. vi. 11 sqq.), but this was not a gospel at all.

(12) An apocryphal gospel, in use among the Valentinians, is mentioned by Irenaeus (Haer. iii. 11, 9), and Pseudo-Tertullian (Haer. 12). According to Irenaeus, who probably knew it well, and declares it to be a pretty recent fiction, it bore the name of "The gospel of Truth" (Evangelium veritatis), and had nothing in common with our canonical gospels. It was probably rather a dogmatic exposition of the speculative tenets of Valentinus than an historical writing. But the Valentinians also used our canonical gospels, and in an unmutated form (Iren. l. c.; Tertullian, Praeser. 38). The Valentinian Heracleon (cir. A.D. 195) wrote a commentary of his own on the Gospel of St. John, of which numerous fragments have been preserved.

(13–16) The Gospel of Perfection (εὐαγγέλιον τελειώσεως), The Gospel of Eve, and the Great and Small Interrogations of Mary (ἐρωτήσεις Μαρίας μεγάλης and μικρᾶς) are mentioned by Epiphanius as in use among the "Gnostics" or "Borborites" (Haer. xxvi. 2 sqq.), i.e. a section of the Ophites, along with other apocryphal writings which (like the Gospel of Philip) were current under apostolic names, and used by these Ophite Gnostics (Epiph. Haer. xxvi. 8). According to the Gospel of Eve she partook of the Tree of Knowledge in consequence of a revelation made to her by the Serpent. Epiphanius gives us the following fragment (Haer. xxvi. 3): "I stood on a high hill and saw a tall and a short man, and heard a voice as of thunder, and I drew near to hearken; and it spoke to me: 'I am thou, and thou art I, and where thou art there am I also; and in all things am I sown. And from whencesoever thou gatherest me, in gathering me thou gatherest thyself.'" This fragment is enough to shew that the work was no gospel, but a Gnostic doctrinal treatise, though presented, it may be, in an historical form. This work, like the Gospel of Judas, appears to have been a favourite among the Ophites of the Cainite branch. Its pantheistic mysticism is declared by the severe Malleus Haereticorum to have an obscene meaning, and such, according to his statement (Epiph. Haer. xxvi. 8), seems really to have been the case with the other two works—The Interrogations of Mary.

(17 and 18) As Manichaean works are mentioned—The Gospel of Life and The Gospel of Adda, called also The Bushel (μύδιος). The former of these, which is mentioned by Timotheus Presbyter Constantinopolitanus (De iis qui ad Eccl. accedunt, ed. Meursius Varia divina, p. 117), by Photius (Bibl. cod. 85), and in the Anathematismi Manichaeorum (Cotelerius, Patr. Apost. i. p. 537), is said to have been written by the fabulous Scythianus, and to have described the Acts of Christ in an heretical spirit. To this same, beside the Gospel, are ascribed three other writings—the "Chapters" (or the "Vocation"), the "Mysteries," and the "Treasury of Life" (Epiph. Haer. lxvi. 2; Cyrill. Hieron. Catech. vi. 22, p. 100, ed. Paris, Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manich. ed. Gieseler, Göttingen, 1846, p. 15; Photius, contra Manich. i. 37 sq.; cf. Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. i. p. 141).

The Bushel is said to be the production of a disciple of Manes named Adda (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 85). Diodorus, who wrote twenty-five books against the Manichees, directed the first seven against the Gospel of Life, but herein, according to Photius, made a serious blunder, confounding the above-named gospel with that of Adda.

In some lists of Manichaean writings mention is made of a Gospel of Philip and of a Gospel of Thomas, of which Mani's disciple, bearing the same name, is said to have been the author. (Timotheus, presbyter, l. c.; Petrus Siculus, l. c. p. 22; Leontius, de Sectis, art. iii. p. 432; Anathemat. Manich. l. c. comp. Fabricius, i. p. 138, sq., 354 sq.) But by these Gospels are probably meant the Gnostic Apocrypha, of which we have already spoken, and which were also read by Manichaeans. [R. A. L.]

GOSSELINUS (GAUSOLINUS, AUSOLINUS), several other forms of the name are given by Potthast. He was bishop of Metz about A.D. 460. His very existence was at first doubted by J. B. Sollerius, who, however, afterwards found mention of him in a MS. Martyrology of the church of St. Peter at Metz. (Boll. Acta SS. 31 Jul. vii. 304.) [R. T. S.]

GOSVINTHA, queen. [GOISVINTHA.]

GOSWINUS—May 22. A boy martyr at Rome in A.D. 176, supposed to have been of Teuton birth, led to Rome either through business or slavery. There is, however, in reality nothing known of him. (Ferrarii Cat. SS.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. v. 130.) [G. T. S.]

GOTHARDUS (GODEARDUS, BOTHARDUS, BUDIBARDUS), an early bishop of Mentz. He ruled for fifteen years, and was a successful missionary preacher. He built a church, afterwards dedicated to St. Nicomedes. By his place in the list his period would seem to belong to about A.D. 200. (Gall. Christ. v. 433.) [R. T. S.]

GOTHOBERTA, virgin, of Noyon. (Bell. Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii. 31 a.) [GODEBERTA.] [J. G.]

GOTHS, CONVERSION OF THE. The early Christianity of the Goths is a matter on which no very full light can be thrown. 1. The first conversions appear to have been made through the prisoners whom the Goths carried off with them from their invasions of Asia Minor. Philostorgius, who is the authority for this, says (ii. 5) that among the prisoners made in the region of Cappadocia were some clerics and that not a few conversions were made. He also adds that the ancestors of Ulfilas were of the number of the captives. This is very improbable. There seems little doubt that the invasions referred to took place about the middle of the 3rd century, that they were made by the Goths who lay to the north of the Euxine, and that these early Catholic conversions were made not in the district north of the Danube, where Ulfilas afterwards laboured, but much more probably in the Crimean Chersonese. Basil the Great, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, bears testimony that Dionysius, who was bishop of Rome, 259-269, had sent persons with a view of redeeming the prisoners taken from the Cappadocians. There is also a letter from Basil to Ascholi, bishop of Thessalonica, which confirms the belief that the Goths first received Christianity from Cappadocia, and makes it probable that a certain Eutyches was one of the prisoners who made converts among the Goths. (Ep. 70, § 164; Migne, xxxii. 435, 635.)

The account of Sozomen (ii. 6) is clearly inaccurate and gives no further certain information. At the council of Nice, more than half a century later, we have evidence of the orthodox Gothic Christians of the Crimea in the signature of a Gothic metropolitan—Provinciae Gothiae: Theophilus Gothiae Metropolis—or according to another list—De Gothis Theophilus Bosporitanus (Mansi, ii. 696, 702). Athanasius, writing before the council of Nice, speaks strongly of the influence of Christianity upon the barbarians, and it seems probable from an allusion to them in an earlier passage that he is certainly including the Goths (Athan. de Incarn. Verb. § 51, § 52; Migne, xxv. 187-190; Neander, Church History, Eng. transl. iii. 179). Further, Chrysostom in his fourteenth epistle speaks of an embassy which has come to him from the Goths to ask for a bishop in the place of Unilas, whom Chrysostom had himself consecrated (Migne, lii. 618). Procopius also, speaking of the Goths of the Crimean region, says that in the twenty-first year of Justinian's reign, they applied to the emperor for another bishop to replace their own, who had lately died (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. iv. 4, ed. Bonn. vol. ii. p. 475). It seems clear, therefore, on the whole that from the middle of the 3rd century there was a continuous tradition of orthodox Christianity among the Goths who bordered on the Euxine.

2. We turn now to the, historically, more important branch of the Goths who were settled further west. Before the time of Ulfilas we have no knowledge of any conversions to Christianity among the Goths to the north of the Danube. Ulfilas (born 311, died 381), on suffering severe persecution for his labours as a Christian missionary among his own people, was allowed by Constantius to enter the Roman dominions with his Arian converts, c. 348. These Goths—the “Gothi minores”—settled in the region of Moesia and Thrace. For the whole consideration of the life and writings of Ulfilas, his work among the Goths, and the nature of their Christianity see ULFILAS.

3. There are indications of other preaching and of other conversions to Christianity among the Goths north of the Danube about the time of Ulfilas. We learn from Epiphanius, writing about the year 375, that a persecution had, some years before he wrote, broken out against the followers of Audius, who, after his banishment for heresy to Scythia, had laboured among the Goths and converted many. [AUDIUS, ANTHROPOMORPHITAE.]

Epiphanius speaks of Silvanus, a bishop, who had been ordained by Audius, and of others also who were dead when he wrote (Migne, xlii. 371). Of Catholic Goths also, and their persecution, probably about the same period, there is some evidence to be found in the Lives of the Saints [see NICETAS, SABA]. The leader of the persecution in these cases, as in that of Ulfilas, was probably Athanarich.

4. Nearly thirty years after the Goths of Ulfilas had entered the Roman provinces, the great mass of the Visigoths (A.D. 376) moved across the Danube. Of the manner of their conversion to Arian Christianity we know absolutely nothing, nor of any certain link between them and Ulfilas. For the later history of the Christianity of the Goths, see SEVERINUS, OSTROGOTHS, VISIGOTHS.

(The best condensed accounts of this subject will be found in Pallmann, Die Geschichte der Völkerwanderung, i. p. 62-85, and Bessell, art. GOTHEN, in Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. 75, pp. 140-145. GOTTESCHALK [GODESCALCUS].

GOTUMAR (GUTUMARUS), bishop of Tria Flavia (Santiago), from about 637 till after 646. He signed the sixth and seventh councils of Toledo under Kintila and Kindasvinth, A.D. 638, 646. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 413, 423; Esp. Sagr. xix. 57. [ORTIGIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GOVEIN (COFEN, COVEN, GAWEN, GOFEN, GOVEINWEN), wife of Tewdrig and mother of Meurig, kings of South Wales, an early Welsh saint [COFEN]. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, app. 14; Camb. Quart. Mag. v. 132; Notes and Queries, 1 ser. vi. 97, xii. 201.) [J. G.]

GOVOR, GOWER, Welsh saint, who founded Llanover in Monmouthshire. There are here nine springs close to each other called Fyanoa Over. He was commemorated May 9. (R. Williams, Encycion Cymru, 1852, p. 178; Notes and Queries, 2 ser. iii. 31, 77, 97; Williams, Idol MSS. 549, 558.) [C. W. B.]

GOWIBALDUS, GOWIBOLT, bishop of Ratishon. [GARIBALDUS (3).]

GRACCUS, a Roman patrician, who held the office of urban praetor towards the close of the 4th century. During his term of office he destroyed the cave of Mithra and other objects connected with the strange Oriental superstitions which had been introduced into Rome. This may have been done by the magistrate as a mere matter of police; but he afterwards received baptism. He was a neighbour of Toxotius and Laeta (qq. r.), and it is in a letter to Laeta that his name is mentioned by St. Jerome. (Ep. cvii. 2, ed. Vall.) Prudentius (Cont. Symm. lib. i. l. 562) mentions the family of Gracchi as one zealous for the Christian religion.

[W. H. F.]

GRACE, χάρις, in the sense first given to that word in the New Testament, viz., the favour or free gift of the Holy Ghost purchased for man by Christ, and poured out on man under the Gospel; inspiring individual souls with power from above to the regeneration and sanctification of their hearts and lives; and imparting vital efficacy to the sacraments and general work of the church. Grace, therefore, must in this sense be considered under a twofold aspect: (1) grace to the individual—in later times called "gratia gratum faciens"—and (2) grace to the church in general, "gratia gratis data." But the commoner name for it under this latter aspect is charisma (Rom. i. 1; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6), or charismata (1 Cor. xii. 9 and 31), under which term it has been treated elsewhere (Dict. of Chr. Ant. l. 349): but briefly, for all the controversies that have been raised about it on that head are purely modern.

It was the inward, invisible, superhuman, and life-giving action of the Holy Ghost upon the soul of man, which Pelagius denied, and St. Augustine brought out so triumphantly as to have procured for himself in after ages the honourable distinction of "doctor of grace." It was he, likewise, who first laid bare the correlative doctrine to it on the part of man, viz., that of original sin. His opus classicum on the subject is divided into two books; the title given to the first being De Gratia Christi: to the second, De Peccato Originali. It was written A.D. 418, after Pelagius had been condemned by pope Zosimus and a general council of the African church on May 1 of that year.

Pelagius had been brought to book at last, and all his subterfuges exposed. Denial of the grace of God, he had constantly said formed no part of his creed, yet now, in expounding what he held it to be, he struck at the roots of it in the same breath. "Nam gratiam Dei, et adiutorium quo adjuvamus ad non peccandum, aut in natura, et libero ponit arbitrio: aut in lege atque doctrina." (l. 3.) That is, he limited it to the natural gifts and powers with which every man is born, or the external help supplied to man in the books of the Old and New Testaments. The capabilities, therefore, with which every man finds himself endowed at his birth, constituted, according to Pelagius, all the inward assistance that men needed or received from God to enable them to do things acceptable to Him in this life, and be rewarded with heaven in the next. Neither their wills nor their actions wanted any renewing or strengthening from above to be what they ought. "Et ideo, non adjuvat (Deus) ut velimus, non adjuvat ut agamus: sed tantummodo adjuvat ut velle et agere valeamus" (ib. c. v.). From this point of view there was, of course, no taint of nature for baptism to wash away, no gift of the Holy Ghost imparted in the new birth at the font. Adam's sin, St. Augustine rejoined, was simply left out in this estimate. As he had urged in an earlier work: "Natura quippe hominis primitus inculcata, et sine ullo vitio creata est: natura vero ista hominis, quâ unusquisque ex Adam nascitur, jam medico indiget quia sana non est. . . . Ac per hoc natura poenalis ad vindictam justissimam pertinet. . . . Deus autem, qui dives est in misericordiâ, propter multam dilectionem, quâ dilexit nos, et cum essemus mortui delictis, convivificavit nos Christo, Cujus gratiâ sumus salvi facti. Haec autem Christi gratia, sine quâ nec infantes, nec aetate grandes salvi fieri possunt, non meritis redditur, sed gratis datur, propter quod et gratia nominatur. 'Justificati,' inquit, gratis per sanguinem Ejus." (De Nat. et Grat. c. Pel. c. iii.) When and in what way was this grace bestowed? First at the font, on the recipients of baptism, infants and adults alike, was the reply. "Unde ii qui non per illam liberantur, sive quia audire nondum potuerunt, sive quia obedire noluerunt: sive etiam, cum per aetatem audire non possent, lavacrum regenerationis quod accipere possent, per quod salvi fierent, non acceperunt, juste utique damnantur, quia sine peccato non sunt, vel quod originaliter traxerunt, vel quod malis moribus addiderunt. Omnes enim peccaverunt, sive in Adam, sive in se ipsis, et egent gloriâ Dei." (ib.) But was it merely the remission of sins in baptism, or something else, first bestowed then, over and above, that was denied by Pelagius? This was the crucial point which he could never face, "Quomodo igitur credi potest Pelagium Dei gratiam, quae neque natura est cum libero arbitrio: neque legis scientia, neque peccatorum remissio: sed quae in singulis nostris actibus est necessaria veraciter fuisse confessum," asks his opponent, in spite of all his admissions? that inward grace, which, first received at the font, becomes the operating and co-operating principle of a new life in every heart, where it is allowed free course, and not obstructed by the action of a perverse will. Faith, hope, and charity rank amongst its earliest creations, and most prized and lasting achievements. Absolute freedom from sin is not out of the question with such aid: which, however, is never irresistible, and might be withdrawn at any moment, on any wilful reaction from it in its recipient. Such grace was wholly gratuitous on the part of God, and undeserved by any preceding merit whatsoever on the part of man. At one time St. Augustine confesses he thought himself man could merit it by his faith. Afterwards, he became scripturally convinced that faith both originated with, and was increased by grace. "Fides ergo, et inchoata, et perfecta, donum Dei est," is the mature conclusion of his latest work. (De Praedest. c. vii.) "Our wills and our acts are our own," he says, "but our good wills and our good acts are God's, wrought in us by Him with our concurrence." (De Grat. Christi, c. xxv.) In rewarding them, therefore, God does but literally crown his own gifts. (Ep. cxciv. 19: ad Sixt. Presb.) Or as he puts it elsewhere, "Intelligendum est igitur etiam hominis bona merita esse Dei munera, quibus cum vita aeterna redditur, quid nisi gratia pro gra tiâ redditur" (Enchirid. c. vii.). Or as his faithful interpreter, Prosper, beautifully puts it, "Duce Deo, venit ad Deum" (de Vocat. i. 24).

Besides art. CHARISMA in the Dict. of Chr. Ant., and vol. x. of the Ben. ed. of the works of St. Augustine generally, the following articles of his work must be consulted for special branches of the subject to avoid repetition:—Original Sin, Faith, Hope, Charity, Baptism, Eucharist, Ordination, or Holy Orders. Estius, in Sentent. ii. Dist. 26, is a storehouse of all the subtle points mooted or left in abeyance by St. Augustine, and discussed by others. For instance, whether grace is a habit, an act, a motion, or something intermediate; how it should be defined: whether it is distinct from, or the same with charity: whether it should be divided into created and increate, operating and co-operating, gratia gratis data, gratia gratum faciens, and so forth. But it was in the West almost wholly that they received any special treatment. Mareschall's Concord. Pat., continued by Schramm, and Fessler's Inst. Patrol. give the views incidentally expressed of other Fathers. [E. S. Ff.]

GRACIANUS of Cagli. [GRATIANUS (3).]

GRACILIANUS, martyr with the virgin Felicissima in the city of Falaria, being stoned and afterwards decapitated; commemorated Aug. 12 (Usuard. Mart.). Baronius (Rom. Mart. Aug. 12) gives the name of the city Falaria in Tuscany. [C. H.]

GRADA, ST., the saint of a parish in the Lizard district in Cornwall. The parish feast is kept on the nearest Sunday to St. Luke's Day. [C. W. B.]

GRADESCUS, bishop of Sulmo (Sulmona), c. A.D. 701. He appears to have succeeded St. Pamphilus, who was elected c. A.D. 682. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. *252.) [R. S. G.]

GRADUS, bishop. [GRATUS (5).]

GRAECUS, bishop of Marseilles, succeeded Eustasius about 472. He is known to us only from Sidonius Apollinaris, who addresses him in laudatory terms (lib. vi. 3, vii. 2), but in vii. 7 complains bitterly that he had been instrumental in effecting a treaty, which was probably that between the emperor Nepos and Euric king of the Visigoths, the result of which was that while the Massilians were at peace the Arverni were surrendered to the Goths and suffered terrible extremities. Sidonius roundly informs Graecus that this act placed him last instead of first among the bishops of the province, whence the Sammarthani infer that he had sought, through the favour of Euric, to exercise the powers of metropolitan. He seems, however, afterwards to have been on good terms with Sidonius (Ep. vii. 11). (Gall. Christ. i. 635; Ceillier, Ant. ecc. x. 610.) [R. T. S.]

GRAETIS, king of the Heruli. [GREPES.]

GRAIFNIG, GRAIPHNIDH, abbat of Emlagh, near Kells, co. Meath, died A.D. 737 (Four Myst. A.D. 732; Ann. Ult. A.D. 736). [J. G.]

GRAMMATICUS, addressed along with Glorius, Felix, and Eleusius, by Augustine, on the shamelessness with which the Donatists, though so often sentenced, persisted in their schism (August. ep. 43 al. 162. Opp. vol. 38, p. 422, ed. Caillau). [C. H.]

GRAMMATIUS (1), bishop of Salernum (Salerno), probably c. A.D. 400, though some authorities place him much later. He is said to have succeeded Bonosius. (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Oct. v. 671; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 487.) [R. S. G.]

GRAMMATIUS (2), ST., twenty-first bishop of Metz, between St. Phronimius and Agatimber. He is said to have died in the fifteenth year of his episcopate (A.D. 512), on April 25, on which day he is commemorated at Metz. (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iiii. 369; Gall. Chr. xiii. 687.) [S. A. B.]

GRAMMATIUS (3), 4th bishop of Vindonissa (Windisch), from whence the see was soon afterwards transferred to Constance. He succeeded Bubulcus, and was followed by Maximus. He was present at three councils—that of Clermont in 535, the fourth of Orleans in 541, and the fifth in 549. (Mansi, viii. 863, ix. 120, 136; Gall. Christ. v. 892.) [S. A. B.]

GRANIANUS, SERENIUS or SERENIUS, proconsul of Asia in the reign of Hadrian. He wrote to the emperor in the year 125 for instructions as to how Christians were to be dealt with, but the answer arrived to his successor Minutius Fundanus (Justin. Mart. Apol. i. 69; Euseb. H. E. iv. 9). In his Chronicle (sub ann. 125) Eusebius calls him Serenus Granianus, and states that he called Hadrian's attention to the gross iniquity of sacrificing the blood of innocent men to the clamours of the mob when they could be charged with no crime but that of belonging to a name and a sect. [FUNDANUS.] [C. H.]

GRANISTA, a Gothic comes, one of the heads of the first Arian conspiracy against Recared king of Spain, which broke out in 587, immediately after the preliminary council held at Toledo in that year had made it plain that the formal conversion of the nation to Catholicism was fast approaching. The results of the council had been made known in Gallia Narbonensis by envoys from Recared, and the inhabitants of the province were invited to join those of Spain proper in returning "ad unitatem et pacem Christianae ecclesiae" (conf. Greg. Tur. ix. 15; Joh. Bicl. Esp. Sagr. vi. 385). Immediately upon the announcement followed an Arian rising headed by the Arian bishop Athalocus and the comites Granista and Wildigern "incliti licet opibus et nobiles genere, profani tamen mentibus et ignobiles moribus" (Paul. Emerit. Vit. Patr. Emerit. cap. 19, in Patr. Lat. lxxv. 158). The revolt was speedily put down. Our sources tell us nothing of the fate of his associates Granista and Wildigern, but in all probability they perished in the struggle. Their names do not appear among the viri illustres of the conversion council of 589, though it is of course possible that if still living and restored to favour they might have been included under the general description of "omnes seniores Gothorum," which follows the five individual signatures (C. Tol. iii. apud Tejada y Ramiro, Obsec. de Can. Soc. ii. p. 227). Granista and Wildigern are mentioned only in Paul. Emerit. & c. [M. A. W.]

GRAPHAN, companion of Gobban, son of Nasc, and disciple of Carthach Mochuda (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 358), but Colgan (Acta SS. 631) has Straphan, interpreted Stephanus. [J. G.]

GRAPTE, probably chief among the deaconesses of the Roman church in the early part of the 2nd century. HERMAS (Vis. ii. 4) mentions her in company with a Clement whose office it was to communicate on the part of the Church of Rome with foreign cities. In spite of difficulties raised by Harnack and others we have no hesitation in identifying this with CLEMENS ROMANUS, and inferring that Grapte must have been known as a real person contemporary with Clement, and that if not alive when the work of Hermas was published, she must have died so recently that hers was still a well-remembered name. The name Grapte is not common, but Harnack (l. c.) notes that it occurs in Josephus (B. J. IV. ix. 11) as the name of a lady of the royal family of Adiabene; and it is found four times in inscriptions, three in Asia Minor, Le Bas, 782, 962, 1567, and one in Italy, Mamercia Grapte, Gruter, 434. There is an odd coincidence between the relation to a Januarius indicated in the first and last of these.

Grapte is allegorically interpreted by Origen (De Prin. iv. 11; Philocal. i. 11). [G. S.]

GRASULFUS, duke of Friuli early in the 7th century. He succeeded to the duchy on the murder by the exarch Gregory of his nephews Taso and Cacco, the sons of Gisulf, the first duke (Paulus Diaconus, iv. 39). The duchy of Friuli was, after the duchies of Benevento and Spoleto, which were practically independent, the most important during early Lombard history. [A. H. D. A.]

GRATA (1)—June 2. [LYONS, MARTYRS OF.]

GRATA (2), companion of St. Ursula and martyr, A.D. 354; venerated Oct. 21 (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 316). [J. G.]

GRATA (3), second daughter of the emperor Valentinian I. and his empress Justina. She was the sister of Justa, Galla Placidia, and the emperor Valentinian II. She was unmarried. (Theoph. Chronogr. A.C. 360, p. 48 in Patr. Gr. viii. 175 B; Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 46.) [C. H.]

GRATIANUS, first bishop of Tours. [GRATIANUS.]

GRATIANUS (1) (GRATINIANUS), martyr of Perugia in Etruria. Commemorated on June 1. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 1 Jun. i. 23) have an article upon Gratianus and Felinus. Usuardus (Jun. 1, Auct.) has a simple commemoration; the Mart. Rom. records their martyrdom under Decius with various tortures, and Baronius (Annal. a. 254 xxix.) includes them among the martyrs whose names he has found in the ecclesiastical tables. Yet their names are not now found in any extant ancient list, and appear to be not older in legend than the 15th century; to all appearance their legend is based upon that of St. Florentius and his companions. The acts given by the Bollandists contain a highly coloured tale of ignorant fanaticism and persecution, admiration at the Christians' constancy and consequent conversion, baptism by bishop Florentius, open profession, trial, torture, and death. [J. G.]

GRATIANUS (2) (GATIANUS), martyr at Amiens, not mentioned in Ado and Usuardus; but from a MS. martyrology preserved at Corbey he found a place in the Auctaria to Usuardus. The date of the martyrdom is fixed between 283 and 287. The legend runs that in his last moments he fixed in the ground a hazel twig which he carried, and which immediately put forth leaves and fruit; a miracle which the MS. declares to be repeated annually though the festival occurs so late in the season as the end of October (Boll. AA. SS. 23 Oct. x. 18). [R. T. S.]

GRATIANUS (3) (GRECIANUS), the first known bishop of Callium (Cagli), present at the council held at Rimini, A.D. 359, protesting strongly against the Arian bishops and their doctrines. He is supposed to have also attended the council of Seleucia in the same year. (Hilar. Pictav. Fragm. vii. al. viii. p. 685 in Patr. Lat. x. 697 c.; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 891; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 236.) [R. S. G.]

GRATIANUS (4). Callidius Gratianus, the officer called Curator Reipublicae at Aptunga, at the time of the inquiry into the case of Felix bishop of Aptunga. [FELIX (26).] (Opt. i. 26.) [H. W. P.]

GRATIANUS (5) (FLAVIUS GRATIANUS AUGUSTUS), Christian emperor, eldest son of Valentinian I., born A.D. 359; named Augustus by his father, 367; succeeded to his father, Nov. 375; succeeded to his uncle Valens, 378; murdered, Aug. 25, 383.

1. Authorities. 2. Life. 3. Character. 4. Ecclesiastical Policy.

1. Authorities.—Of the secular writers who treat of this period, the principal is the contemporary Ammianus Marcellinus (q. v.), books 27–31. His work finishes with the death of Valens. Zosimus (book 4), who lived in the middle of the 5th century, is the next in importance. Two of the orations of the younger Symmachus refer to Gratian; one delivered on his appointment as Augustus, when he was eight years old, the other on his accession, after Valentinian's death and the execution of Maximinus (Oratio pro patre, p. 44, ed. Mai, 1815). Themistius, the rhetorician of Constantinople, pronounced a curious address on the same occasion in the senate at Rome, viz. ἐπετακὸς, ἡ περὶ κάλλους βασιλικῶν (Orat. 13). The works of his tutor Ausonius contain several references to his royal pupil; the most important for his reign is the gratiarum actio pro consulatu, an oration delivered at Treves in 379. Of the letters of Symmachus, one is addressed to Gratian (lib. x. ep. 2; cp. i. 13), thanking him for making him his mouthpiece in the senate soon after his accession; another, the well-known relatio to Valentinian II. and Theodosius (ibid. ep. 61), gives some account of the proceedings with regard to the altar of Victory. In reply to this we have two letters of St. Ambrose, Nos. 17, 18, and the poem of Prudentius; but these really belong to another reign. St. Ambrose is the most important of ecclesiastical tical writers for the life of Gratian, as he had great influence over him in his later years, and wrote his books de Fide and de Spiritu Sancto for his edification and at his request. A letter of the emperor's, written in 379, inviting St. Ambrose to assist him, is prefixed to the bishop's epistles, with his reply to it. For his death, we refer specially to Enarr. in Psalm. 61, and de obitu Valentiniani, ad finem.

The ordinary writers of church history and the law books must of course be consulted, especially the Theodosian code. Tillemont, here as elsewhere, is invaluable. The fifth and sixth volumes of De Broglie's L'Église et l'Empire au quatrième siècle, and H. Richter's Weströmische Reich, Berlin, 1865, contain the most satisfactory modern history of the period from different points of view. Richter brings out strongly the barbarian, especially the German element in the empire. His book is a remarkable one, but his conjectural conclusions are sometimes stated too much as ascertained facts; and the arrangement of the work is altogether not very lucid.

2. Life.—Gratian, son of Valentinian and his first wife Severa, was born at Sirmium, on April 18 (acc. to Idatius), or May 23 (acc. to Chron. Pasch.), in the year 359, while his father was still an ordinary officer in the army. He was no doubt named after his grandfather Gratianus Funarius (cp. Amm. xxx. 7, 2), a man of low origin. His mother Severa Marina was also of obscure birth, and apparently rather mean character. When Valentinian was unexpectedly chosen emperor by the soldiers on the death of Jovian, in Feb. 364, Gratian was not yet five years old, yet two years later he was named consul with Daglaiphus (Amm. xxvi. 9, 1). In the autumn of the next year, 367, Valentinian, who had been suffering from a serious illness, and had good reason to fear that in the case of his death his son would be passed over by the soldiers, determined to associate him with himself in the empire (Amm. xxvii. 6). On Aug. 24 he presented him to a great assembly of civil and military officials at Amiens, and declared him Augustus, a title which was immediately accepted by the bystanders. (Amm. xxvii. 6, 4, 16. De Broglie is inaccurate in saying that the title was not observed till the next day. Ammianus merely remarks that it was contrary to precedent that Valentinian named both his brother and his son Augusti. The day is given by Socr. H. E. 4, 11; Chron. Pasch. p. 301 D, &c.) This title came immediately into use in public documents. It may still be read, for example, in an inscription on the bridge of St. Bartholomew at Rome, connecting the island of the Tiber with the right bank of the stream, which records that the three Augusti ordered it to be erected and called by the name of Gratian—"pontem felicis nominis Gratiani in usum Senatus ac populi Rom[ani] constitui dedicarique iusserunt" (Corp. Inscr. Lat. vi. 1175; Wilmanns, Exempla Inscr. Lat. 1091). Victor tells us that Valentinian, in naming his son Augustus, acted under the influence of his mother-in-law and his wife. If this was so, the latter soon lost her power, for within less than two years she was repudiated by her husband, ostensibly on account of an act of meanness and injustice (Chron. Pasch. pp. 302, 303; Clinton, F. R. 2, p. 111, note e; for further details see VALENTINIANUS I.). The case was apparently not unlike that of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, and the repudiation of Severa was followed by a match with Justina, the widow of Magnentius—a beautiful and well-connected Sicilian lady, whose former marriage probably made her popular with many of the troops (Zos. iv. 19, 43; Amm. xxviii. 2, 10).

Hence it was not surprising that, when Valentinian died suddenly of apoplexy at Bregenz, on Lake Constance, in Nov. 375, the infant child of his second marriage (Valentinian II.) was proclaimed Augustus by his principal officers, headed by Merobaudes (Amm. xxx. 10). This bold act was done in reliance upon the youth and good nature of Gratian, who was at Treves at the time, and who recognised his young brother almost immediately. Richter interprets it as a scheme of Merobaudes to keep the crown in the family of Valentinian, as many of the soldiers were anxious to make the heathen general Sebastianus emperor (pp. 283–286 and note). Justina fixed her court at Sirmium; and the Western empire was perhaps nominally divided between the two brothers, Gratian having Gaul, Spain, and Britain, and Valentinian Italy, Illyricum, and Africa (Zos. iv. 19). But this division must have been simply nominal, as Gratian constantly acted in the latter provinces (see Tillemont, Emp. v. p. 140, and op. the laws quoted in § 4).

For the first years of his reign, till the death of Valens, Gratian resided chiefly at Treves, from whence most of his laws are dated. One of his first acts was to recall his mother, Severa; and by her advice he proceeded to punish some of the prominent instruments of the cruelties committed in the name of justice and discipline, which had disgraced his father's later years. He put to death the hated Maximinus, as well as his successors in power at Rome, Simplicius and Doryphorianus (Amm. xxviii. 1. 57); and he issued an edict which exempted senators from trial before inferior judges, and gave them assurance of being heard before a court composed of men of their own rank (Cod. Theod. ix. 1, 13). Tillemont concludes with great probability that this was the letter sent to Symmachus to read in the senate, of which he speaks in such grateful and flattering terms (Epist. x. 2, and i. 13; the latter is to Ausonius). Another and a more illustrious victim of the reaction was the Count Theodosius, who had suppressed the rebellion of Firmus in Africa with strenuous loyalty and great military skill, but with considerable harshness. He was executed at Carthage in A.D. 376, but whether the disgrace of this act should attach to Gratian or Valens is not quite certain. (Oros. vii. 33; cp. Socr. iv. 9, where the M.E.S. read, Θεοδοσίολος or Θεοδοσίος ἄλλος τις, ἀντὶ γενναῖος ἐκ τῶν εὐπατριδῶν τῆς Ἰωνίας. Socrates connects his death with the supposed conspiracy against Valens, and the execution of many whose names begun with the syllables THEOD.; cf. Amm. xxix. 1, 32.) Richter ascribes his death to the fear and jealousy of Merobaudes, but this is a pure conjecture (pp. 401, 402). This removal of unpopular ministers was followed by a general relaxation of severity in all branches of the public service, especially in that of the fiscus. Themistius, speaking in the Roman senate in praise of the young emperor, whom he had just visited, says: "Lamentations are banished from the courts, and the instruments of torture are left to rust. The baneful accountants and criminal exactors of old and forgotten arrears have so disappeared that their names are no more remembered, and fire has destroyed all that remained of them." (Orat. 13, p. 175 c, Paris, 1684. Cp. the similar passage in Ausonius pro consulari, towards the end.) This burning of the official records of public liabilities in the marketplace of each city was no doubt a great boon to the corporations, which had suffered much under Valentinian. But these popular concessions at starting did not ensure contentment on the part of the provinces or good government on that of the emperor.

Another act of Gratian's which it is natural to place at the beginning of his reign shewed his determination to break with paganism more effectually than his predecessors had done. This was his refusal of the robe of pontifex maximus, when it was brought to him according to custom by the pontifices; thinking (as the heathen historian tells us) that it was unlawful for a Christian (Zoa. iv. 36). The title appears indeed to some extent on coins and inscriptions, but it is not easy to fix the date of those monuments. One which is most frequently quoted, e.g. by Clinton, F. R. 2, p. 122 = Orell. 1118, at Emerita, is condemned by Hübner on other grounds. (Inscr. Hisp. C. I. L. ii. 452*. The inscription on the bridge of St. Bartholomew is of course not in point.) More remarkable is the language of his tutor Ausonius, who, in his gratiarum actio pro consulari addressed to Gratian in 379, seems to dwell upon this particular office with evident meaning and emphasis. In allusion to his different titles, he calls him, "Potestate imperator, virtute victor, Augustus sanctitate, pontifex religione, indulgentia pater," and suggests that the consular comitia be called Pontificalia, "Sic potius, sic vocentur, quae tu Pontifex Maximus Deo participas habuisti" (cp. "operto conclavis tui non sanctior ara Vestalis, non Pontificis cubile castum, nec pulvinar Flaminis tam pudicum"). Beugnot argues that Ausonius could not have used this language after Gratian's refusal of the office (Destruction du Paganisme en Occident, i. p. 341, where he erroneously puts the consulship of Ausonius in A.D. 382), but this seems doubtful. He might well, in this way, insinuate his wish that the emperor should not altogether break with the old religion to which previous Christian sovereigns had so far accommodated themselves. Such a feeling seems suitable to the character of a man like Ausonius, who was a Christian by profession, but was attached to the old way of thinking by many ties of literary sympathy and personal friendship.

The Eastern empire in the meanwhile was in great danger in the hands of the incompetent Valens. A large mass of Goths obtained leave to cross the Danube, being pressed southwards by the Huns, who now appear almost for the first time in history. The crossing and settlement of the new-comers was grossly mismanaged by the officers of Valens; and from suppliants the Goths soon became dangerous enemies. Gratian sent a certain number of troops under Richomeres to aid his uncle, but the greater part of them deserted, it was said, on the advice of Merobaudes, who feared, not without reason, to leave Gaul undefended (Amm. xxxi. 7, 4). In 378 the Alamanni Lentienses passed the Rhine in great force and threatened the Western empire, but were heavily defeated by Gratian at Argentaria, near Colmar (ibid. xxxi. 10). This set him free to move towards the East; and he had reached Sirmium on his way thither when he heard of the great defeat suffered by his uncle, and of his ignoble death after the battle of Adrianople, Aug. 7 (Amm. xxxi. 11, 6; 12, 10).

The situation was extremely critical, especially for an emperor not yet twenty years of age. The barbarians were in motion on all the frontiers. The internal condition of the West was insecure, from the tacit antagonism between the two courts, and the East was now suddenly thrown upon his hands, as Valens had left no children. In this emergency Gratian shewed his judgment by sending for the younger Theodosius, about thirteen years older than himself, who after his father's execution was living in retirement upon his estates in Spain (Victor, Epit. 72, 74, &c.; cp. Themist. Orat. 14, p. 183 A). Theodosius was loyal and fearless like his father, and was at once entrusted with the command of the troops as magister militum. His successes over the barbarians (probably Sarmatians) encouraged Gratian to a more decided step, and he was appointed emperor of the East with general applause. (Theodoret, v. 5, 6, is the only writer who describes these successes of Theodosius before he became emperor, but they are evidently referred to by Themistius, Or. xiv. p. 182 c, and Pacatus, Paneg. Theodosio, 10, 2; see Richter, p. 691, note 26.)

Gratian returned from Sirmium to the West by way of Aquileia and Milan, at which places he passed some parts of the months of July and August 379. Before his expedition he had been brought into contact with St. Ambrose, and had received from him the two first books of his treatise de Fide, intended specially to preserve him against Arianism. This teaching had its due effect; and on his way back he addressed a letter to the bishop of Milan, which is given below (§ 4). St. Ambrose sent him two more books of his treatise, and probably had some other direct personal intercourse with him. Gratian then went on to his usual residence at Treves, and received in the autumn from his old tutor Ausonius a turgid panegyric consisting of congratulations on his victories and thanks for the consulship bestowed while he was at Sirmium. During the following years, however, the emperor resided much more frequently at Milan and in the neighbourhood, especially during the winter. He wished, no doubt, to be nearer the Eastern empire, and not less, perhaps, to enjoy the society of St. Ambrose, whose strength of character and experience as a civil officer (before he became bishop) fitted him particularly to be the director of an amiable and well-principled but somewhat indolent prince. The results which flowed from this intercourse in the confirmation of Gratian in the Catholic faith will be noticed below. There was, however, another side to this practical neglect of the Gallic provinces. The Western provincials—never very contented—felt, no doubt, rather keenly the absence of the imperial court. If Gratian had continued to reside at Treves, the rebellion of Magnus Maximus would perhaps never have taken place, and certainly would not have grown to such formidable dimensions.

The influence of St. Ambrose is shewn by the ecclesiastical laws, of which we shall speak in § 4, and by an important blow struck at the old religion in its stronghold. This was the famous removal of the altar of Victory from the senate-house at Rome in the year 381 (S. Ambros. Epist. 17, 5; Symm. Epist. 61, ad init. et ad finem). The heathen senators, though the minority in number, were accustomed to offer incense on this altar, and to touch it in taking solemn oaths (Ambr. Ep. 17, 9). It had been removed or covered up during the visit of Constantius, but was again restored under Julian, and Valentinian's policy had been against interference with such matters (Symm. l. c.). Its removal now caused great distress to the heathen party, who met in the senate-house and despatched a petition to Gratian for its restoration. But the Christians, who had absented themselves from the curia on this occasion, met privately, and sent a counter-petition through pope Damasus to Ambrose, who of course presented it to the emperor. (S. Ambr. Ep. 17, 9: "Nam et ante biennium ferme cum hoc petere tentarent, misit ad me S. Damasus . . . libellum, quem Christiani Senatores dederunt, et quidem innumeri, postulantes nihil se tale mandasse, non congruere gentilium istiusmodi petitionibus," &c.) The weight of this document enabled the advisers of Gratian to prevent his giving the heathen party a hearing. (Symm. l. c.: "Divi principis denegata est ab improbis audientia"; and at the end, "Praestate etiam divo fratri vestro alieni consilii correctionem . . . Constat exclusam legationem ne ad eum iudicium publicum perveniret.") This blow was soon followed by another even more telling—the confiscation of the revenues of the temple of Victory, and the abolition of the privileges which belonged to the pontiffs and vestals, a measure which was extended to other heathen institutions. (S. Ambros. Ep. 17, 3–5, and 18, 11 foll.; Cod. Theod. xv. 10, 20, "omnia enim loca quae sacris error veterum deputavit, secundum divi Gratiani constituta nostrae rei iubemus sociari"—a law of Honorius in 415.)

These laws were followed by a famine in Italy and particularly in Rome, which the pagans naturally ascribed to sacrilege. (Symm. Ep. x. 61, "Secuta est fames publica et spem provinciarum omnium measis aegra decepit . . . Sacrilegio annus exaruit.") The very unpopular and harsh measure was adopted of expelling all foreigners from Rome. (Symm. Ep. ii. 7, "defectum timemus annonae pulsus omnibus quos exerto et pleno ubere Roma susceperat . . . Quanto nobis odio provinciarum constat illa securitas!") It has been conjectured that this is the famine of which St. Ambrose speaks, during which a (Christian) prefect of the city called together the nobility, and prevented the carrying out of the proposal to expel strangers by raising a public subscription. (Ambros. de Officiis Ministrorum, iii. 7. This is the opinion of De Broglie (vol. vi. p. 43), and is suggested by Tillemont, Emp. Gratien, art. 16, p. 173, "c'étoist peut-être dans celle de cette année.") But a careful comparison of the passages of Symmachus and St. Ambrose makes it probable that the action of the Christian prefect took place in a previous year, and that the order to expel strangers was actually carried out in 382. The city prefect in 382 was Anicius Auchenius Bassus (Cod. Theod. i. 6, 8). St. Ambrose in fact says that such a measure had recently been enforced at Rome. (L. c. § 49, "quanto hoc utilius quam illud quod proxime Roma factum est eiectos esse urbe amplissima," &c. This book was written probably about 390.)

A much more serious danger was the revolt of Magnus Maximus, a former comrade of Theodosius in Britain, who was probably jealous of his honours, and was now put forward as emperor by the soldiers [MAXIMUS]. This rising took place in the year 383 in Britain, whence the usurper passed over to the mouth of the Rhine, gathering large bodies of men as he went. Gratian set out to meet him, with his two generals Balio and Merobaudes, the latter a Frank by birth.

The two armies met near Paris, and Gratian was deserted by nearly all his troops (Zos. iv. 35; St. Ambros. in Ps. 61, 17). Only three hundred horse remained faithful. With these he fled at full speed, and succeeded in arriving at Lyons. The governor of the place, it would seem, received him with protestations of loyalty, and took a solemn oath on the Gospels not to hurt him. Gratian was deceived by his assurances, and took his place in his imperial robes at a feast, during or soon after which he was basely assassinated, on Aug. 25. The traitor even denied his body burial. (S. Ambros. in Psal. 61, §§ 17, 23 foll. Marcellinus sub anno: "Gratianus imp. Maximus tyranni dolo apud Lugdunum occisus est viii kal. Sep." Zosimus, iv. 35, puts the place of his death at Singidunum, Belgrade, in Moesia, ἐν τῇ Σιγγιδούνῃ; but he probably misread Λυγδούνα in one of his authorities: cp. Hieron. Epist. ad Heliodorum de morte Nepotiani, p. 24. Gratianus exercitu suo proditus et ab omnibus urbibus non receptus, ludibrio hosti fuit; cruentaeque manus vestigia parietes tui Lugduni testantur; see also Rufin. ii. 14.) Greek writers ascribe his death to the stratagem of Andragathius, the magister equitum of Maximus, whom he sent to pursue the emperor. Socrates relates that Andragathius concealed himself in a litter, in which he put it about that Gratian's newly married wife, Laeta, was being carried, and that the emperor, hurrying to open the litter, was thus surprised and slain (Socr. v. 11; cp. Zos. l. c.). St. Ambrose tells us that Gratian called upon him in his last moments—"Tu me inter tua pericula requirebas, tu in tuis extremis me appellabas, meum de te plus dolebas dolorem" (de obitu Valentiniani, 80).

His generals Balio and Merobaudes were pursued by the soldiers of Maximus, and perished miserably, perhaps by their own hands. (St. Ambr. Ep. 24, 11; Pacati, Paneg. Theodosio, 28, ed. Migne, Patrol. xiii. col. 503.)

Gratian thus perished miserably at the age of 24. He was twice married—first (at the age of 16) to Constantia, only and posthumous child of Constantius II., three years younger than himself, who died before him (Amm. Marc. xxi. 13, 6: xxix. 6, 7); secondly, to Laeta, shortly before his death (Soz. vii. 13; Zos. v. 39, says that she and her mother, Pissamene, were living in Rome in 403, during the siege by Alaric). He left no children

(Theodoret, v. 12), and any that he may have had by Constantia must have died in infancy. (S. Ambros. de Fide, i. 20, ad finem, "fidem etiam pignoribus suis praeferat." It is now agreed that the right reading in S. Aug. de Civ. Dei, v. 15, is "cum parvulum haberet fratrem," not "et fratrem.")

3. Character.—Gratian's character is known to us from a good many sources, which agree in their general result. (See Ammianus, xxxi. 10, with the following references.) He was in many respects the exact opposite of his father, Valentinian. He was amiable and modest, in fact too modest to be a good governor in these rough times ("plus verecundus quam reipublicae intererat," Rufin. ii. 13). He was generous and kind-hearted, of an attractive disposition and beautiful person. (For the latter, see Themistius, περὶ ἀλλοτρίας βασιλικῆς; traces of his beauty are, however, hardly to be found on his coins.) His education had been carefully conducted, and his tutor Ansonius had taken pains to inspire him with tastes for rhetoric and versification. He was chaste and temperate, and careful in religious conduct, as well as zealous for the faith. (Ambros. de Ob. Valent. 74, "fuit . . . fidelis in Domino, pius atque mansuetus, puro corde. Fuit etiam castus corpore, qui praeter coniugium nescierit feminae alterius consuetudinem." His murderers calumniated him on this point, id. in Psal. 61; so also the Arian Philostorgius, x. 5, compared him to Nero.) His great fault was a neglect of public business through an inordinate devotion to sport, especially to shooting wild beasts with bow and arrows in his parks and preserves (Amm. l. c.; Victor. Epist. 73). His skill in this exercise was comparable to that of Commodus; he once killed a lion with a single arrow (Aus. Epig. 6); and even St. Ambrose alludes to his prowess in the chase in the midst of his pathetic reminiscences, adopting the language of David's elegy over Jonathan—"Gratiani sagitta non est reversa retro" (de Obitu Valent. 73; cp. the old Latin of 2 Sam. i. 22).

The character given by Victor is worth quoting. "Fuit autem Gratianus litteris haud mediocriter institutus: carmen facere, ornate loqui, explicare controversias rhetorum more Parcus cibi somnique; et vini ac libidinis victor; cunctisque fuisset plenus bonis, si ad cognoscendam Reipublicae gerendae scientiam animum intendisset, a qua prope alienus, non modo voluntate sed etiam exercitio fuit." (Epit. 73.) This distaste for public business he seems to have carried even into military matters. He gained one great victory, but on other occasions he seemed rather to have shrunk from war. He is said to have alienated his army by the favours which he shewed to certain Alani, on whom he spent large sums, and in whose company he delighted so much as even to wear their dress, to the neglect of the Roman soldiery. (Victor, l. c.; Zoa. iv. 35. For the Alani, see the description in Amm. xxxi. 2, 12 foll.)

4. Ecclesiastical Policy.—The ecclesiastical policy of Gratian was more important than his civil or military government. His reign, coinciding with that of Theodosius, saw orthodox Christianity for the first time dominant throughout the empire. Constantine had been too uninstructed to understand the full meaning of theological questions; and he was in his latter years under strong Arian influences. Under Constantius a form of semi-Arianism had been established with all the power of the state. Then came the reaction under Julian, which, though unsuccessful, had materially altered the relations of church and state. His orthodox successor Jovian had reigned but a few months, and Valentinian, though a Catholic, had aimed at a rather strict impartiality; while Valens was a thorough and a persecuting Arian. The reign of Gratian is therefore a noteworthy epoch in church history.

We have already mentioned the most important measures taken by Gratian with respect to the old religion—his refusal of the robe of pontifex maximus; his removal of the altar of Victory from the senate-house, and his confiscation of the temple revenues in Rome. We may here take occasion to refer to an act which was possibly connected with the first of these exhibitions of feeling on the part of the emperor, the destruction of the sanctuary of Mithra by Gracchus, who was prefect of the city in the second year of his reign (S. Hieronym. Epist. ad Lactam, 7, tom. i. p. 51 E, ed. Paris, 1643; Beugnot, Destruction du Paganisme, i. p. 366). Yet this worship, it is needless to say, went on, especially among certain families, for a considerable period longer.

The laws relating to the stage, particularly to actresses and dancers, are rather numerous, viz. seven in the years 376, 380, and 381 (C. Theod. xv. 7, 3-9). They shew a desire to reform the public spectacles, and grant Christian women the privilege of retiring from the stage. But they betray an evident caution in dealing with so popular an institution, and grate upon our more refined taste by taking for granted that the life of an actress must of necessity be vicious. A Christian woman of this kind, who has relapsed, is condemned to infamy without further reprieve in the following ghastly terms: "retracta in pulpitu[m], sine spe absolutionis ullius ibi eo usque permaneat, donec anus ridicula, senectute deformis, nec tunc quidem absolutione potiatur, cum aliud quam casta esse non possit" (Cod. Theod. xv. 7, 8, May 8, 381, from Aquileia).

We now pass to a series of measures more directly affecting the church, and some of them of very great importance.

It is to be regretted that Gratian's measures in behalf of the church were often tainted with injustice (as it appears to us) towards the sects. But it is probable that the laws were very imperfectly carried out (see Richter, p. 327). His first general law against heretical sects is dated from Treves, May 1, 376, and speaks of a previous law of the same kind (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 4); the previous law may, however, be one of Valens (and Valentinian) and not, as Richter thinks, of Gratian.

In 377, shortly before the death of Valens, he condemned re-baptism, and ordered that the Donatist churches should be restored to the Catholics, and that their private meeting-houses should be confiscated ("Ad Flavianum Vicarium Africae," himself a Donatist, Cod. Theod. xvi. 6, 2. It is dated at Constantinople, but this can hardly be correct: see Tillemont, v. note 12, p. 714). The death of Valens was naturally the signal for the disciple of St. Ambrose to restore the Catholics of the East to their possessions. He recalled all those whom his uncle had banished, and further issued an edict of toleration for all Christian sects, except the Eunomians (extreme Arians, see Soz. vi. 26), Photinians, and Manichaeans. (Soc. v. 2; Soz. vii. 1.) Theodoret, v. 2, appears to confuse this with the later edict of Gratian and Theodosius. The condemnation of the Manichaeans was extended on the strong representations of Idacius of Merida to the Priscillianists, an enthusiastic sect of Gnostics, who had made much progress in Spain (Sulpicius Severus, Chron. ii. 47, 6). Some better terms were, however, afterwards procured from them through the interest of Macedonius, master of the offices, to whom they gave large bribes. This did not, however, amount to direct toleration (as Richter assumes, p. 524), but to the transference of their case to another court (Sulp. Sev. Chron. ii. 49). The date of this concession was probably quite late in the reign of Gratian.

On his return from Sirmium, Gratian wrote the following affectionate and interesting autograph (Ambr. Ep. 1, 3) letter to St. Ambrose, desiring him to come and meet him: "I desire much to enjoy the bodily presence of him whose recollection I carry with me, and with whom I am present in spirit. Therefore, hasten to me, religious priest of God, to teach me the doctrine of the true faith. Not that I am anxious for argument, or wish to know God in words rather than in spirit; but that my heart may be opened more fully to receive the abiding revelation of the divinity. For He will teach me, whom I do not deny, whom I confess to be my God and my Lord, not raising as an objection against His divinity that He took upon Himself a created nature like my own [non ei obiciens, quam in me video, creaturam]. I confess that I can add nothing to the glory of Christ; but I should wish to commend myself to the Father in glorifying the Son. I will not fear a grudging spirit on the part of God. I shall not suppose myself such an encomiast as to increase His divinity by my praises. In my weakness and frailty I utter what I can, not what is adequate to His divinity. I desire you to send me a copy of the same treatise, which you sent before [de Fide i. ii.], enlarging it by a faithful dissertation on the Holy Spirit: prove that He is God by arguments of scripture and reason. May the Deity keep you for many years, my father, and worshipper of the eternal God, Jesus Christ, whom we worship." (This letter is prefixed to St. Ambrose's Epistles.) St. Ambrose replies, excusing his non-attendance upon the emperor, praising the expressions of his faith, and sending two fresh books of his treatise. For the new book, de Spiritu Sancto, he asks time, knowing (as he says) what a critic will read them. The subject was, we may remark, being at this moment largely discussed in the Eastern church. [See COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE, in Dict. of Chr. Antiq. i. p. 437.]

It is assumed by De Broglie that the bishop and the emperor did not meet at this time, but St. Ambrose writes in the letter just quoted, § 7, "veniam plane et festinabo ut iubes," and two laws of Gratian's are dated from Milan in July and August 379 (Cod. Just. vi. 32, 4, July 29, and Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 5, August 3, to Hesperius Pf. Praet. de haereticis). The second of these is important, and may shew the influence of St. Ambrose. It forbids the heresies against which former imperial edicts had been directed, and especially that of re-baptism (the Donatists), and revokes the recent tolerant edict of Sirmium ("antiquato rescripto, quod apud Sirmium nuper emerit, ea tantum super catholica observatione permaneant quae perennis recordationis pater noster et nos," &c.).

In a law dated July 5, at Aquileia, he had exempted the clergy in Italy, Illyricum, and Gaul, whose incomes were below a certain sum, from payment of the chrysargyrum (Cod. Theod. xiii. 1, 11); and it is quite possible that St. Ambrose may have met him there, and travelled with him to Milan.

About this time must be dated the occurrences mentioned by St. Ambrose in his book De Spiritu Sancto, i. §§ 19-21. The empress Justina, who was an Arian, had obtained from Gratian a basilica for the worship of her sect, to the great distress of the Catholics. He restored it however, apparently of his own motion, to their equal surprise and delight, perhaps in the year 380 (cp. Richter, note 30, p. 692; De Spiritu Sancto, § 20, neque enim aliud possumus dicere, nisi sancti Spiritus hanc priore gratiam, quod ignorantibus omnibus subito Basilicam reddidisti). St. Ambrose also obtained another victory over the Arians in 380 in his journey to Sirmium, where Justina apparently also went. In spite of her vehement opposition, he succeeded in consecrating an orthodox bishop to the metropolitan see of Illyria, and thus laid the foundation for the suppression of heresy in that quarter of the empire. (Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii, 11.)

We cannot doubt then that Gratian agreed, not only in name but in feeling, with the important edict issued by his colleague Theodosius on Feb. 27, 380, from Thessalonica and addressed to the people of Constantinople. This remarkable document declared the desire of the emperors that all their subjects should profess the religion given by St. Peter to the Romans, and now held by the pontiff Damasus, and Peter, bishop of Alexandria—that is to say, should confess the one deity and equal majesty of the three persons of the Blessed Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

This decree further declares that they alone who hold this faith are to be called Catholics, and their places of meeting churches; while the rest are branded as heretics, and are threatened with an indefinite punishment (Cod. Theod. xvi. 1, 2; cp. the law of the next year, which mentions various Catholic bishops of the East, whose communion was to be the test of orthodoxy, including Nectarius of Constantinople—perhaps the reference to Damasus had given offence).

De Broglie says of these laws, "it was impossible to abjure more decidedly the pretension of dogmatizing from the elevation of the throne, which had been since Constantine the mania of all the emperors and the scourge of the empire" (vol. v. p. 365). But correct dogmatism is still dogmatism, and the definition of truth by good emperors kept up the delusion that the right of perpetual interference with religion was inherent in their office.

We have said that Gratian resided more frequently at Milan during his later years than he had previously done, especially during the winter months. From this place he issued two of the laws we have mentioned with respect to the stage. In July 381, he ordered that criminals should be set at liberty at Easter, with the exception of greater offenders (Cod. Theod. ix. 38, 6). In May 383, at Padua, he issued a penal law against apostates, and those who try to make others apostatize from Christianity. Whoever turns to heathenism, Judaism, or Manichaeism, is to be deprived of the right of making a will. Those who have drawn them over are equally punished, and even heavier penalties may be inflicted by the judges.

In citing these laws, we have anticipated a little the course of events. In 381 Gratian summoned the council of Aquileia (which met on Sept. 5) to decide the cases of the Illyrian bishops Palladius and Secundianus, who were accused of Arianism. Their condemnation put an end to the official life of Arianism in that important district (S. Ambros. Epist. 9). The records of this council are preserved in the works of St. Ambrose, who took the chief part in it, though he did not technically preside. (They follow his eighth epistle in the Benedictine edition.) The same council took up the case of pope Damasus and besought the emperor to interfere against the partisans of the antipope Ursinus (S. Ambr. Ep. 11). The relations of Gratian with the see of Rome are somewhat obscure, but it is pretty clear that some extension of its privileges and pretensions dates from this reign. According to the documents first published by Sirmond, a synod held in Rome soon after Gratian's accession made large demands for ecclesiastical jurisdiction and particularly asked that the bishop of Rome should only be judged by a council of bishops or by the emperor in person. Gratian in his rescript to Aquilinus the vicar (of Rome?) grants and confirms several privileges, but says nothing of the latter request. Some doubt hangs over the whole of these documents. (See Godefroy, Cod. Theod. vol. vi. appendix, pp. 17, 18; Baronius, Annals, sub anno 381, §§ 1, 2; Tillemont, Damasus, arts. 10 and 11; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, vol. i. pp. 239-242; Hefele, Councils, § 91, does not even hint at the existence of these documents.)

In consequence of the success of the council of Aquileia St. Ambrose was anxious to call together an oecumenical assembly at Rome to settle the dispute between Nectarius and Maximus, who both claimed the see of Constantinople, and pressed the emperor Theodosius on the point (Epist. 13 and 14). Theodosius, however, naturally viewed this interference with coldness (Theodoret, v. 8, 9). A council, nevertheless, met at Rome, but without doing much beyond condemning the Apollinarians.

On his return to Milan St. Ambrose took leave of the young emperor for the last time. Their intercourse had been always tender and affectionate, and was (as we have seen) the last thought of the emperor's before his death.

We may here mention an instance of St. Ambrose's conduct with respect to Gratian, which may have been at this or at any other period of their friendship (De Broglie, to make a point, puts it here, vol. vi. p. 45, but neither Paulinus, § 37, nor Sozomen, vii. 25, gives any hint of the date). A heathen of quality was condemned to death for abusing Gratian and calling him an unworthy son of Valentinian. As he was being led to execution, Ambrose hurried to the palace to intercede for him. One Macedonius, master of the offices, it would seem ordered the servants to refuse him admittance, as Gratian was engaged in his favourite sport. Ambrose went round to the park gates, and entered unperceived amongst the huntmen, and never left Gratian till he had overcome his arguments and those of his courtiers and obtained remission of the sentence. "The time will come," he said to Macedonius, "when you will fly for asylum to the church, but the church doors will be shut against you." (Paulinus, Vita S. Ambrosii, 37.) The anecdote of the criminal is told by Sozomen, l. c.; the words to Macedonius are given by Paulinus. [J. W.]

GRATIANUS (6), made emperor by the soldiers in Britain in 407, as successor to Marcus. He retained power for four months, when he was put to death and succeeded by Constantine. (Soz. H. E. ix. 11; Zosim. vi. 2; Oros. vii. 4; Bede, i. 11; Olympiodorus, ad init.)

[M. F. A.]

GRATIANUS (7), bishop of Meta in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 404, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

GRATIANUS (8) (CRATINUS), bishop of Panormum (Palermo), c. 451. He was at the council of Chalcedon in that year. He is said to have been succeeded by Mamilianus. (Pirri, Sicil. Sacr. i. 15.) [R. S. G.]

GRATIANUS (9), bishop of Toulon, said to have been martyred by Euric king of the Visigoths about the year 472 (Gall. Christ. i. 741). [R. T. S.]

GRATIANUS (10), eighth bishop of Orleans in the latter part of 5th century (Gall. Christ. viii. 1413). [R. T. S.]

GRATIANUS (11) I., second bishop of Dax, the first having been St. Vincent, though at what date is unknown. He was present at the council of Agde in A.D. 506. The authors of the Gallia Christiana quote from an old breviary of the church of Dax to the effect that when peace was at length restored to the church, and unbelievers banished or converted, he turned his whole attention to the restoration of the church of St. Vincent, which had been defiled by the superstition of the heathen, and restored it to the services of the true God. (Gall. Christ. i. 1038; Mansi, viii. 337.) [S. A. B.]

GRATIANUS (12), bishop of Novara, who signed the second epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Mansi, xi. 307; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRATIANUS (13), bishop of Velitæ (Velletri), c. A.D. 761, subscribed a decree of Paul I. (Mansi, xii. 645; Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 1194; Cap-pelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 460.) [R. S. G.]

GRATIDIANUS (marg. GRATIDIUS, GRATIANUS), bishop of Cerasus, in Pontus, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vi. 571 c). He signs the epistle of the Pontic bishops to the emperor Leo as Gratianus (Mansi, vii. 605; Le Quien, O. C. i. 513). [C. H.]

GRATILIANUS—Aug. 12. Martyr in the Diocletian persecution with the virgin Felicissima at Falarium (Faleone), a city of Picenum, or according to Baronius at Falerium (Civita Castellana). Ferrarius (Cat. SS.) tells us that their bodies were preserved at Civita Castellana, and honoured there. Their acts are very corrupt and worthless in a historical point of view. (Mart. Usuard. ; Acta SS. Boll. Aug. ii. 728.)

[G. T. S.]

GRATINIANUS (Boll. Acta SS. 1 Jun. i. 23 sq.), martyr. [GRATIANUS (1).] [J. G.]

GRATINUS, bishop of Egabro (Cabra), from A.D. 681 to 687, present at the thirteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 683. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287; Esp. Sagr. xii. 30.) [SINAGIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GRATIOSUS (1), thought to have been bishop of Numana or Humana (Umana), present at the council held at Rome by Gregory the Great, A.D. 595. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 743; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vii. 79, 191.) But Numentum is the reading of the see in Mansi, x. 488. Vid. following article. [R. S. G.]

GRATIOSUS (2) (GRATIANUS), bishop of Numentum (La Mentana). Gregory the Great writes to him to unite with his see that of St. Anthemiun "in Curium Sabinorum territorio," on account of the desolation of the church and deficiency of inhabitants. (Lib. iii. indict. xi. Ep. 20.) He was present at the Roman synod of 595, which dealt with the service of the pope, the goods of the church, &c. Also at the synod of 601, which tended to free monasteries from episcopal control. These are separate synods, according to Hefele, § 288, § 299. According to Jaffé, from a consideration of the signatures, there was only one synod in 595. (Mansi, ix. 1228, x. 488; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, i. 587, 598.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (3), according to the legendary history of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, was the fourth abbat of that house; succeeding Rufinianus in 626. He was, according to the same story, a Roman by birth, elected according to the command of Augustine from among the monks of the monastery, the licence having been previously obtained from King Eadbald, and received the benediction from archbishop Justus. He is said to have received Paulinus on his return from Northumbria with many honours, and to have died in 638. Elmham gives his epitaph. (Elmham, ed. Hardwick, pp. 3, 4, 155, 173, 174; Thorn, Chr. ap. Twysden, cc. 1768, 1769; Mon. Angl. i. 120.) [S.]

GIRATOSUS (4), bishop of Naples, succeeded Caesarius either A.D. 638 or 641, held the see for seven years, and was succeeded by Eusebius either A.D. 646 or 649. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vi. 84; Chioccarellus, Antist. Neapol. Eccles. p. 65.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATIOSUS (5), bishop of Nepi. Present at the Lateran synod under Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 867; Hefele, § 307.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (6), bishop of Parma, signed the second epistle of pope Agatho which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 315; Hefele, § 314.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (7) I., bishop of Sutrium. He subscribed the synodal letter addressed to the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, from Rome by Agatho. (Mansi, xi. 314; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 1273; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 225.)

GRATIOSUS II. [GAUDIOSUS (13).]

GRATIOSUS (8), bishop of Novara, c. 730. A petition by one Rodoald (Dec. 730), living "in vico Gausingo," to Gratosus, twenty-sixth bishop of Novara, for the consecration of an altar, is given in the Historiae Patriae Monumenta. Turin. (Chartarum, vol. i. 18, 19. See also Troya, Cod. Dipl. iii. p. 511.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (9), bishop of Velletri, subscribed to a letter of pope Paul I. in June, 761, to the abbat John about the privileges of the monastery of St. Stephen and St. Sylvester in Rome. (Mansi, xi. 649; Jaffé, Regesta Pont. 195.) He was also present at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 745 for the condemnation of the heretics, Adalbert and Clement, at the request of Boniface. (Mansi, xii. 380; Hefele, § 367.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GRATIOSUS (10), archbishop of Ravenna 785 or 786 to 788 or 789. Agnellus says that Charles the Great came to Ravenna in his time. If Charles came at all, it must have been on his return from Rome in 787, and this may account for his asking pope Hadrian for mosaics and marbles from the palace of Ravenna (Codex Carolinus, Jaffé, ep. 89, ann. 781-791). Gratosus had been abbat of the monastery of St. Apollinaris and archdeacon. He was buried in the church of St. Apollinaris in Classis. (Agnellus, Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Rav. 164-166 in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 383.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GRATISMUS, bishop of Tridentum (Trent), c. A.D. 499 to 538. (Pincio, Chron. di Trento, p. 61.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATISSIMUS, grand chamberlain under the emperor Leo I. He founded at Constantinople a church dedicated to St. Cyriacus, with a monastery attached to it, in which he himself became a monk (Theophan. Chronogr. sub ann. 462). He appears to have still retained his office of grand chamberlain (cf. Theod. Lect. H. E. lib. i. § 17, p. 567 in Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. pt. i. 174).

[M. F. A.]

GRATUS (1), bishop of Carthage, A.D. 343-353, in which see he succeeded Rufus, the successor of Caecilian. He was present at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, and was spoken of by Hosius, the president, in a manner which his subsequent conduct at the council of Carthage, A.D. 348 or 349, shews to have had a meaning beyond that of mere compliment. Tillemont suggests that he took advantage of his journey to Sardica to persuade the emperor Constans to send Paul and Macarius into Africa (vol. i. 883). The council of Carthage was summoned by Gratus, as primate of Africa, and was held to discuss chiefly the questions of Donatism in general, "tradition," and rebaptism, and as president he conducted the business with great judgment and prudence. He is styled saint by Ferrandus, and his name appears to have been commemorated in the African calendar on May 5, but not expressly under the title of saint. (Bruna, Conc. i. 95, 111-117; Tillemont, 45, 51, vol. vi. pp. 110, 124-128, 714; Bingham, vol. i. p. 201; Morcelli, Africa Christ. ii. 242-256; Ribbek, Don. und Aug. p. 146.)

GRATUS (2), deacon of Forum Livii (Forlì), under its bishop, St. Mercurialis, who probably lived c. A.D. 359. He is said to have miraculously restored the sight of a certain Marcellus. (Boll. Acta SS. 20 Mar. iii. 85; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 614.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATUS (3), bishop of Forum Popilii (Forlimpopoli). He is said to have succeeded the first bishop, St. Rufillus, c. A.D. 382. He was certainly living A.D. 409, about which time his church and people suffered greatly from the incursions of Alaric. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 642; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 440.)

[R. S. G.]

GRATUS (4), a presbyter who represented Eustasius, bishop of Aosta, in the council held under Eusebius of Milan in A.D. 451 (Leo. Mag. ep. 98, p. 1083, in Patr. Lat. liv. 948 b). He was probably the successor of this Eustasius in the see of Aosta, and is also probably identical with the St. Gratus or St. Gradus, bishop of Aosta (q. v.).

[C. G.]

GRATUS (5), ST. (GRADUS), bishop of Augusta Praetoria (Aosta), patron saint of the cathedral, where his relics are preserved, much venerated in that and neighbouring places. A decree of the bishop of Aosta in 1407 assigns special distinctions to the commemoration of his death on Sept. 7. For reputed miracles performed by his relics see Bolland Acta SS. Sept. 7, pp. 72 C, 73 B.C.

There exist Acta of this saint which make him contemporary with Charles the Great, but they are rejected on all hands as absolutely fabulous and unhistorical. Many authorities, however (recently Gams, Series Episc. p. 828), place him in the end of the 8th century. The Bollandists on the other hand (with Potthast and others) throw him back into the 5th century, and make him identical with Gratus presbyter (q. v.) whom they suppose to have succeeded Eustathius as bishop of Aosta. Some of the details in the fabulous Acta seem to tally with this view, as the mention of a council of Chalcedon, of a pope Leo (Leo III. the Acta say), and the finding of the head of John the Baptist (said to have occurred in 452). Moreover the Acta of SS. Mauritius and his comrades (the Thebaean Legion) record that a bishop Gratus of Aosta assisted at the translation of the relics of St. Innocent, one of that band, the discovery of which is put by the Bollandists at the end of the 8th century. (See Bolland. Acta Sanct. September, iii. pp. 73-6; Gall. Chr. xii. 806.)

GRATUS (6), a deacon of Provence, who composed a treatise (Scripturula) on the nature of Christ, in which the Nestorian heresy was apparent. He sent it to Faustus, abbat of Lérins, for his opinion, who, in the sixth of his letters addressed to Gratus, severely criticizes it, and its author (Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 853). The treatise itself has not come down to us, but the reply is mentioned by Gennadius, who speaks of Gratus as one who had separated from the

GRATUS (7), bishop of Oleron, attended the synod of Agde, an. 506 (Mansi, viii. 337 b), and is perhaps the same with St. Gratus commemorated as a martyr in the diocese of Rodez. (Gall. Christ. i. 1268; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 17 and Oct. 19.)

GRATUS (8), ST., thirteenth bishop of Châlon-sur-Saône, succeeding Gelionius or Gebderinus, and followed by Desideratus (Dido), was present at the council of Châlons, the date of which has been variously placed between 644 and 650. (Labbe, Sacr. Conc. x. 1194, Flor. 1759-98.) This is really the only fact we know of him, as his life, written after the close of the 10th century, is plainly in great part, if not altogether, fabulous. It was published by Perry and Cusset, from an old Legendarium of the church of Châlons, and is to be found in Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 286. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (iv. 871) made an attempt to separate the fact from the fable. It relates that upon the death of Gebderinus, Gratus, being a man of high rank, was unanimously elected to the see, and consecrated by the archbishop of Lyons and his suffragans. Like his predecessors, he was, according to this author, unable to live in the city from fear of the heathen, and had his abode at a place called Martyrmathon, now the suburb of St. Laurence, across the Saône, near which the church of St. Laurence had been lately constructed. But on the sabbath it was his wont to cross the stream and officiate in the great church of the city. On a certain Sunday it happened that he was much beset by worldly cares, and was crossing the bridge later than usual, and when in the middle of it he heard the words, "Ite, missa est" as it were spoken by an angel. Terrified at the omen, and imputing his delay to sin, he drew the ring from his finger, and throwing it into the river, vowed that until the waters gave it up again he could not be called a true shepherd of his flock. Returning to the church of St. Laurence, he built a cell by its walls in which he passed seven years in watching and supplication. A neighbouring hut was occupied by his mother Celsa. During all this time his prayers were so potent a safeguard of the city, that the Saône and its tributaries forbore to drown any one, none were devoured by wild beasts, and no criminal died without first repenting and receiving the viaticum. At the end of the seven years the ring was found in the belly of a fish by the clerk who tended him, and the people hearing of it assembled and dug out their bishop from his cell in spite of his reluctance. He did not, however, long survive his release, but died Oct. 8, on which day he is commemorated. He was buried in the church of St. Laurence, but at the close of the 10th or beginning of the 11th century, his remains were removed, with the consent of Hugo, the bishop, to a newly-built church at Paredum (Paray le Moineau) on May 13. Pope John VIII. canonized him.

GREGENTIUS, ST., bishop of Taphar in Arabia (of the Homeritae). He is chiefly known as the supposed author of (a) the Leges Homeritarum (see Patrol. Graeca, lxxxvi. 568), and (b) the Disputatio cum Herbaso Judaeo (ibid. 621-784). According to the Greek menaea, Gregentius was born at Milan on December 19, in the second half of the 5th century (Gal. land. Ref. in Vet. Patr. Bibl. xi. 599); he lived for many years as an anchorite, and was finally sent by Proterius of Alexander as bishop of the Homeritae. This account, which would date the episcopate of Gregentius from the middle of the 5th century, cannot naturally claim any strong historical weight. Little more can be said for the tradition which ascribes the two works above mentioned to him. Ceillier pointed out several points of internal evidence which tell against their genuineness, and, above all, the fact that the death and burial of Gregentius are narrated in the dialogue (Ceill. xi. 279, and cf. Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. 784). It is clear that great part must have been added by a later hand, if we reject Ceillier's conclusion that the whole is the work of an anonymous writer. In the dialogue Gregentius finally convinces his opponent by a vision of Christ which appears in the heavens, the result being the conversion and baptism of five millions of Jews. The Leges Homeritarum deal mainly with crimes of violence and fornication, and are supposed to have been composed by Gregentius at the request of Abraham, king of the Homeritae. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 663.) [J. de S.]

GREGORIA (1), 7th century, lady of the bedchamber to some Augusta who, from a comparison of dates (vid. Du Cange, Fam. Aug. 88), must have been the empress Constantina, otherwise Constantia, wife of the emperor Maurice. She had enumerated all her sins with great assiduity to her confessor, but was afraid that God had not pardoned them. So she wrote to pope Gregory, saying that she would never cease to importune him till he had a revelation that her sins were forgiven. Gregory, whose letter is dated by Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 121) June 597, consoled her with the narrative of the woman who was a sinner, whom he seems to identify with Mary the sister of Martha, saying that believing her devotion to be not less than the love of that woman, he might fairly apply to her the same words, "Thy sins, which are many," &c. What she asked, however, he considered difficult and useless; on the one hand he was unworthy of a revelation, and on the other, she ought to lament her sins to the end of her life, rather than feel assured about them; security was the mother of carelessness. (Greg. Mag. Epist. vii. 25. Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. p. 877, § 868; Ceillier, xi. 508.) [W. M. S.]

GREGORIA (2), companion of St. Ursula, "Scota Scotae," martyred A.D. 354, and venerated Oct. 21. (Dempster, Hist. Ecol. Gent. Scot. i. 316.) [J. G.]

GREGORIUS (1) I., bishop of Agrigentum. That there was a Gregory in this see earlier than the more celebrated writer is generally agreed, but his exact period is doubtful. One account places him in the time of Valerian and Gallienus, cir. 260, making him figure in the martyrdom of St. Agrippina at Rome and afterwards at Agrigentum in the course of her translation (Cajetan, Vit. Sic. SS. i. 87). Pirri adopts this view and places him as second bishop, between Libanius and Potamio (Sic. Soc. i. 692). Bolland in his notes upon Potamio discusses the question (Acta SS. 29 Jan. ii. 968). Another account makes him sent by Proterius bishop of Alexandria on a mission to Elesbaan king of Ethiopia, which would place him two centuries later. Perhaps this latter tradition is a confusion with that of Gregory II., who is known to have travelled in the East (see Patr. Gr. xcvi. 549, note 59). [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (2), early bishop of Calaris (Cagliari) in Sardinia, probably between A.D. 258 and 303. (Cossu, Città di Cagliari, p. 56; Martini, Storia Eccles. di Sardegna, iii. 316; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 48.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (3), surnamed THAUMATURGUS, bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus, cir. 233-270. He was born about 210 at Neocaesarea on the Lycus, the modern Niksar. He was the son of heathen parents who were both wealthy and noble. His early name was Theodorus, for which some explanation may be found in the fact that his father was scrupulously devoted to the worship of the Pagan divinities. His son calls him Θεωρίδης (Migne, ed. Patr. Gr. vol. x.; Greg. Thaum. Orat. de Origene, c. 5). Christianity had made little progress in the neighbourhood of Neocaesarea even in the year 240, for we have incidental evidence that at that date there were only seventeen Christians to be found in the whole region (Greg. Nyss. Vita Thaum. Migne, Patr. Gr. xvi. 954). It was an unpromising field for the episcopal labours of the young missionary. Yet the extraordinary success of those labours, and the romantic details with which they were embellished by later hands secured for him the well-known title of Thaumaturgus. This reputation cannot be set down as exclusively due to the credulousness of the age, for as Lardner (Cred. ii. 42, § 5) remarked, such writers as Basil, Jerome, and Theodoret, to say nothing of Gregory of Nyssa, distinguished this particular bishop from all others as "a man of apostolic signs and wonders" (cf. Dr. J. H. Newman, Essays on Miracles, p. 263). No light is thrown upon his thaumaturgic renown by his extant writings, which are conspicuous for their philosophic tone, humility, self-distrust, and practical sense. He must have been a man of singular force of character and weighty judgment, or he would not have been credited with so much spurious literature. Heretics endeavoured to foist the sanction of his name upon their own speculations, thus indirectly revealing the confidence in which he was held by all parties.

Theodorus (Gregory) stated that when he was in his fourteenth year his father died, and that about that time he passed through a remarkable spiritual crisis. He attributed the change of sentiment which supervened to "the Divine Logos, the Angel of the counsel of God, and the common Saviour of all." He left it, however, as doubtful whether the change consisted of a bias mysteriously given to him towards Christianity, or whether it merely issued in the circumstances which brought him into the society of his friend and teacher Origen. It happened that his mother suggested the pursuit of the science and art of rhetoric, and he rapidly gave promise of oratorical success. He was advised with this end in view to make a special study of Roman law, and with this object to become an alumnus of a celebrated school of jurisprudence then flourishing at Berytus in Syria. At this juncture it appears that his sister needed an escort to Palestine to join her husband, who was occupying a high position under the Roman governor at Caesarea. The young Theodorus (Gregory) and his brother Athenodorus took advantage of this opportunity to travel. They passed numerous cities on their way from Pontus, amongst others, Berytus. "My guardian angel" (says he) "on our arrival at Caesarea handed us over to the care and tuition of Origen." For a while, like birds in a net, they struggled to escape from his influence, to return to their home, or to fulfil their intention of visiting the schools of Berytus; but the converse of this saintly man and illustrious scholar, who was then providentially resident at Caesarea, enthralled them. The personal spell of the teacher was cast over Theodorus and his brother. During five years, he says, that he was submitted to the potent sway of this master; and the mental processes by which he was led to Christ, throw considerable light on the mind of Origen and on the methods of Christian education pursued in the 3rd century. These details are preserved in a panegyric on Origen, which before leaving Caesarea the young student pronounced to a great assembly in the presence of his master. They differ in several particulars from the statements of Gregory of Nyssa (Vita Thaum. Greg. Nyss.; Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. xlv. pp. 893-958). This father, in a florid narrative, represents Gregory as being a student of philosophy at Alexandria, and as being advised by Firmilianus, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who was then visiting Alexandria, to make the acquaintance of Origen. Gregory of Nyssa passes very lightly over his namesake's relations with Origen, and says nothing of his residence at Caesarea, but gives in considerable detail his life in Alexandria. Tillemont (Mémoires, iv. 320) admits that this is at variance with the express language of the "Panegyric," and suggests that Firmilianus may have visited Origen in Caesarea during his young friends' residence there, and may thus have introduced them to Origen. Baronius follows Gregory of Nyssa's lead (Ann. 233, viii.), and assumes that the instruction received by Theodorus (Gregory) from Origen took place in Alexandria, that he then returned to Neocaesarea, and that while there the remembrance of Origen and the advice of Firmilianus induced the young man to undertake a visit to Palestine in order to secure fresh direction from the great scholar (Ann. 233, xii.). All this is at variance with the express statements of the panegyric. This document has been preserved, and is an authentic and valuable memorial of the 3rd century.* According to Gregory's own statements (Orat. de Orig. c. vi.), Origen enticed his pupils first of all to the study of philosophy, which he recommended as a duty that we owe to the Lord of all, "since man alone of all creatures is deemed by his Creator as worthy to pursue it." "A thoughtful man, if pious, must philosophize," says he, so "at length, like some spark lighting on our soul, love was kindled and burst into flame within us, a love to the Holy Logos, the most lovely object of all, who attracts all to Himself by His unutterable beauty." "Only one object seemed worthy of pursuit, philosophy and the master of philosophy, this divine (θεῖος) man." His love to Origen was like the love of Jonathan to David, and without stint he poured forth at last in his presence his enthusiastic encomium. Gregory praises Origen for his Socratic discipline, and for the way in which this teacher probed his inmost soul with questions, and pruned away his native wildness, and repressed his exuberance. He was taught to interrogate his consciousness, and critically to investigate reasonings and the meanings of words. First of all, Origen accustomed the young men to the study of the dialectic method of inquiry, and then, in Aristotelian fashion, led them to contemplate the "magnitude, the wondrousness, the magnificent, and absolutely wise construction of the world." He seems to have followed (strangely enough) the order of the sciences in Comte's classification of the branches of human knowledge. Thus, he began with "the immutable foundation of all, geometry, and then" (says Gregory) "by astronomy he lifted us up to the things highest above us." He reduced things to their "pristine elements," "going over the nature of the whole and of each several section," "he filled our minds with a rational, instead of an irrational, wonder at the sacred oeconomy of the universe and the irreprovable constitution of all things." These words and much more that might be quoted from the "Panegyric" are a strange comment on the thaumaturgic actions which are freely attributed to Gregory. Morals followed physics, and emphasis is laid by Gregory on the practical experience by which Origen desired his pupils to verify all theories, "stimulating us by the deeds he did more than by the doctrines he taught." He urged upon them the study of Grecian philosophy for the direct culture of their moral nature. The end of the entire discipline was "nothing but this: By the pure mind make thyself like to God, that thou mayest draw near to Him and abide in Him." Origen advised Gregory to study all that was written by the philosophers and poets of old, with the exception of the Atheists, and gave reasons for a catholic and liberal eclecticism, and, with a modern spirit, disclaimed the force of prejudice and the misery of half-truths and of fixed ideas, and the advantage of "selecting all that was useful and true in all the various philosophers, and putting aside all that was false." Gregory then utters high praise of the way in which his master interpreted the clear and luminous oracles of God, and this remarkable sentence occurs (c. 15): "That leader of all (ἀρχηγὸς πάντων) who speaks in undertones (ὕψυχον) to God's dear prophets and suggests to them all their prophecy and their mystic and divine word, has so honoured this man Origen as a friend as to appoint him to be their interpreter." The idea seems to have been borne in upon Gregory that the gift of interpretation is as much a divine charisma as prophecy itself. So great were the joys thus placed within the reach of his pupil, that he adds with rapture, "He was truly a paradise to us, after the similitude of the paradise of God." He regrets his departure from Caesarea, as Adam might bewail his expulsion from Eden, having to eat of the soil and to contend with thorns and thistles, and to dwell in darkness, with weeping and mourning. He says, "I go away of my own will, and not by constraint, and by my own act I am dispossessed, when it is in my option to remain." This is clear enough, but Jerome (de Viris illustribus, c. 65) says that the two youths were sent off to their mother ("remittuntur ad matrem"), or as it may be taken, to their mother country.

* Pamphilus inserted the "Panegyric" in the Apology he prepared for Origen (Socrates, H. E. iv. 27). Some writers have conferred upon it extravagant praise, but it is undoubtedly one of the most elegant and interesting fragments of early Christian literature. It was published by Voss. 1604, and in the Paris ed. of Gregory's works, 1621. Haeschelius published it, in connexion with Origen's Libri c. Celsus, with Casaubon's notes. But the best edition of it is by Bengel. This has been carefully studied by Migne's editor. There is a translation of it by Salmond in the Ante-Nicene Library, vol. xx.

The influence of Origen's teaching upon Gregory and Athenodorus is confirmed by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 30), who says that the great scholar "seeing them excessively rapt in the prosecution of the studies of the Greeks and Romans, infused into them the love of philosophy, and induced them to exchange their former zeal for the study of divine things. But after being with him five years, they made such improvement that both, though very young, were honoured with the episcopate in the churches of Pontus."

Gregory of Nyssa describes Gregory of Neocaesarea as spending much time in Alexandria, and says, that before his baptism, while resident there, he displayed a high tone of moral propriety; that he was able to resist the advances of an impure woman, and frustrate her accusations. She was paid the sum of money which she demanded as the price of her intimacy with Gregory, but no sooner had she received it, than she was seized with all the signs of a demoniacal possession, from which Gregory's intercession alone delivered her, thus demonstrating his innocence. Gregory makes no reference to this circumstance, which bears a suspicious resemblance to other like charges brought in Alexandria against distinguished bishops. A residence in Alexandria may have occurred in the course of the five years during which Gregory and his brother were under the direction of Origen. These five years were in all probability interrupted by the persecution under Maximinus Thrax, who reigned from July 235 to May 238. The peculiarity of this persecution was, that it was aimed at the great men and leaders of the Church. Origen may then have gone into retirement and left his pupils at liberty to travel into Egypt. If the baptism of Gregory was deferred until Origen was at liberty to return to Caesarea, that ceremony must have been delayed until the close of his intercourse with the great scholar, as it could not have occurred until the death of Maximin and the accession of Gordian in 238. Reckoning backwards the five years, Gregory did not reach Caesarea before 233, and probably later; and did not leave the "Paradise" until 238 at the earliest, when he pronounced his Panegyric. This document is of interest from the testimony it bears to the doctrine of the Trinity, and the light it throws upon the faith of Gregory. Bishop Bull, in his Defence of the Nicene Creed, has laid great emphasis upon the passage (Orat. de Origine, cap. iv.) in which the pupil of Origen offers his praise to the Father, and then to "the Champion and Saviour of our souls, His first-born Word, the Creator and Governor of all things, . . . being the truth, the wisdom, the power of the Father Himself of all things, and besides being both in Him and absolutely united to Him (ἀνέχρως ἡνόμενος), the most perfect and living and animate word of the primal mind." Bishop Bull is right in calling attention to the pre-Nicene character of these phrases, and yet to their substantial agreement with the deliverance of the Nicene fathers (Def. Nic. Creed, vol. i. p. 331). They should be taken into account in estimating the authenticity and significance of other documents.

Gregory had scarcely reached Neocaesarea when he received a letter from Origen (Philocalia, c. 13), revealing on the part of the teacher a most extraordinary regard for his pupil, whom he describes as "my most excellent lord and venerable son." Gregory is exhorted to study all philosophies, as a preparation for Christianity and to aid the interpretation of Holy Scripture. He is thus to spoil the Egyptians of their fine gold, in order to make vessels for the sanctuary, and not idols of his own. He is then urged with some passion to study the Scriptures, and to seek from God by prayer the light he needs. (Cf. Ante-Nic. Library, Origen's works, vol. i. 388-390, for a translation of this letter.)

Shortly after the return of Gregory to his native place, we are told by Eusebius that he became bishop of that city, and one of the most celebrated (διαβόητος) bishops of the age (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 30, and vii. 14). The curious details of his ordination are referred to in Basil's Monologium Graecorum (17 Nov.), where it is stated that he was ordained by Phaedimus, bishop of Amasea, when the two were at a distance from each other. We are indebted to Gregory of Nyssa for the romance of this and many other events in his subsequent career. Indeed, we have no other guide than the narrative of that father for the subsequent details of his life. Some of his most extraordinary statements are in a measure vouched for by Basil the Great, the brother of Gregory of Nyssa, and by Rufinus in his expansion of the history of Eusebius. The great historian himself revealed either his ignorance of the supposed facts, or his own good sense, by taking no notice of the bizarre and incredible stories with which the career of Gregory is overlaid. As the later father tells the story, the young and saintly student, on reaching his home, was entreated by the entire population to remain among them as their magistrate and legislator. Like Moses, he took counsel of God, and retired into the wilderness, but he excelled the man of God in this, that, unlike Moses, he married no wife, and had virtue only for his spouse. Then we are told that Phaedimus, bishop of Amasea, sought to lay episcopal hands upon Gregory, and to consecrate him by guile, but failed, and adopted the expedient of electing and ordaining him by prayer when he was distant from him a journey of three days. We are not told how Gregory became acquainted with this act, but we are assured that it induced Gregory to yield to the summons, and to submit afterwards to the customary rites. At this time, about 240, there were, as we have said, not more than seventeen Christians in the city and in its circumjacent territory. Gregory only demanded time for meditation on the truths of the Christian faith before accepting the solemn commission. This meditation issued in the supposed divine revelation to him of one of the most explicit formularies of the creed of the Church of the 3rd century. Gregory of Nyssa admits that the revelation was made to the young bishop in the dead of the night, "after he had been deeply considering the reason of the faith, and sifting disputations of all sorts." He saw a vision of St. John and of the mother of the Lord, and we are gravely told that the latter commanded the former to lay before Gregory the true faith. Apart from this romance, the formulary which is attributed to Gregory, is undoubtedly of high antiquity, and Lardner (Credibility, vol. ii. p. 29) does not argue with his wonted candour in his endeavour to fasten upon it signs of later origin. It is singularly free from the peculiar phrases which acquired technical significance in the 4th century, and yet it maintains a most uncompromising antagonism to Sabellian and Unitarian heresy. Moreover, Gregory of Nyssa asserts one fact of considerable importance, that when he uttered his encomium, the autograph MS. of this creed was in possession of the church at Neocaesarea. He adds that the church had been continually initiated (μυσταγοῦνται) by means of this confession of Gregory's faith. Basil, moreover, confirmed this statement (Ep. 204, Bas. Opp. Paris ed. t. iii. p. 303), saying that in his tender age, when residing in Neocaesarea, he had been taught the words of Gregory by his sainted grandmother Macrina; and again (de Spir. Sancto, c. 29, ib. p. 62), he declared the tenacity with which the ways and words of Gregory had been preserved by that church, even to the mode of reciting the doxology. Moreover, Basil attributed to his influence the orthodoxy of a whole succession of bishops from Gregory to the Musonius of his own day (Ep. 204). In addressing the Neocaesareans (Ep. 207, ib. p. 311), he warns them against twisting the words of Gregory. The formulary must be distinguished from the ἡθεὶς τῆς κατὰ μέρος πίστεως, which is now found among the dubious writings of Gregory, but which no less a scholar than Labbe has confounded with it. Labbe says that Bellarmine and Petavius had doubted the authenticity of the ἡθεὶς τῆς πίστεως, but he is wrong, as their scepticism is entirely directed to the other later and very questionable production (see Bull, ibid.). It has been doubted by sundry critics, but the reasons are not convincing. Sandius says that Eusebius, Jerome, and Sophronius were silent about it. The silence, however, of Eusebius proves nothing; and the consequent silence of Jerome and Sophronius may be only regarded as one negative testimony, as Jerome followed Eusebius, and Sophronius was translator into Greek of sundry works of Jerome.^b Rufinus, moreover, introduces it into his translation of Eusebius. This ἡθεὶς is given at length in the Vita Thaum. of Gregory of Nyssa. It is found in the Latin psalter (written in golden letters), which Charlemagne gave to pope Adrian I., and it is cited as Gregory's by the fathers of the second oecumenical council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553, by St. Germanus patriarch of Constantinople, and by numerous later writers (Ceillier, Autours sacrés, St. Grég. le Thaum. vol. ii. pp. 441, 442). A very important sentence which has been variously attributed to the saint and his biographer, follows the formula as given in the life of the Thaumaturgus. Dr. Burton, the editor of Bull, referred it to Gregory of Nyssa. Modern editors call attention to the fact that Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 10) refers to the closing sentences as the substance of the formula itself. It runs as follows: "There is therefore nothing created or servile in the Trinity; nor anything superinduced, as though previously non-existing and introduced afterwards. Never therefore was the Son wanting to the Father, nor the Spirit to the Son; but there is ever the same Trinity, unchangeable and unalterable." (cf. Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. x. p. 988.)

Great difference of opinion has prevailed among earlier and later scholars as to the genuineness of this document; thus Bingham, Bull, Cave, Tillemont (iv. 327), Ceillier, Hahn (cf. Dorner's Person of Christ, A. ii. 482), Mohler (Athanas. i. 105), have defended it, and Lardner, Whiston, Münscher, Gieseler, Herzog (Abriß der Kirchengesch. i. 122), contest it. Neander divided it into two parts, the one genuine revealing its Origenistic source, and the other of later growth. Dr. Caspari has, in an appendix to his great work, Alte und neue Quellen zur Geschichte des Taufsymbols und der Glaubensregel, 1879, defended it with great erudition, and concludes that there is nothing in the formula incompatible with its being the production of a pupil of Origen. He shews, moreover, that it must have been produced between A.D. 260-265. Notwithstanding the remarkable testimonies made by Basil to the orthodoxy of Gregory, and his reference to this creed, which his brother of Nyssa has preserved, an incautious remark by Basil in one of his letters (Ep. 75) to the Neo-caesareans, seems to admit that some of Gregory's expressions had been twisted on the one hand into Sabellianism, and on the other into Arianism. Now Petavius altogether acquits Basil of bringing a charge of Sabellianism against Gregory, and we think Bull is perfectly correct in claiming for Gregory a complete exoneration from the existence of the slightest imputation to that effect in the words of Basil. Basil is not so successful in vindicating Gregory from the incautious use of phrases which Arians might boastfully claim. But Lardner (ibid.) goes too far when he speaks of Basil as vilifying Gregory. Moreover, if the ἔκθεσις πλόνων is genuine, we have a high testimony to the orthodoxy of Gregory. It is easy to cull from the most Athanasian writers terms used of the humanity of Christ, and to represent them as applied by a particular author to the divinity of the Word. This is Basil's excuse for Gregory. The doubtful phrases are said to have occurred in his discussions with Aelian, a heathen, and may be accounted for, because the bishop was not then weighing his words dogmatically, but speaking in the heat of another controversy. It is, however, remarkable, that no extant document, genuine or doubtful, contains the inculpated phrases. They are not found in the πλόνις κατὰ μέρος, which moreover is charged with unmistakable indications of its later date, and contains expressions which reveal the activity of the Nestorian and Apollinarian controversies. Another work, written we may suppose near the commencement of his episcopate, was the Metaphrase of Ecclesiastes. This running commentary on the old book is mentioned with approval by Rufinus (vii. 25), and Jerome (de Viris illis. c. 65, and Comm. in Eccl. c. 4), and may still be read with advantage for its sound ethical wisdom. It has been attributed by some to Gregory of Nazianzus, but the style is less ornate and more abrupt than the discourses of that father, while numerous turns of expression to be found in the Panegyric on Origen are to be met with in this singularly modest and sensible commentary. It is now without reserve inserted among the genuine remains of Gregory.

^b The Creed is as follows in Bull's translation:—"There is one God, Father of Him who is the living Word, subsisting Wisdom and Power and Eternal Impress (χαρκτηρὸς αἰδίου). Perfect Begetter of the Perfect, Father of the only begotten Son. There is one Lord, Alone of the alone, God of God, Impress and Image of the Godhead, the operative Word; Wisdom comprehensive of the system of the universe, and Power productive of the whole creation; true Son of true Father, Invisible of Invisible, and Incorruptible of Incorruptible, and Immortal of Immortal, and Eternal of Eternal. And there is one Holy Ghost, who hath his being of God, who hath appeared (that is to mankind, ἐπιδεικνύμενος τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, a clause which Greg. of Nyssa gives, but which is not found in some of the codices) through the Son, Image of the Son, Perfect of the Perfect; Life, the Cause of all them that live; Holy Fountain, Holiness, the Bestower of sanctification, in whom is manifested God the Father who is over all and in all, and God the Son, who is through all. A perfect Trinity, not divided nor alien in glory and eternity and dominion."

There can be little doubt that the missionary labour of Gregory was great and successful, and that his personal influence was extraordinary. The thaumaturgic dress in which that influence is arrayed a century later need not blind us to the force of character of which it is the symptom. A few of the marvellous occurrences detailed with ornate and extravagant eulogy by Gregory of Nyssa, are referred to by Basil, his brother and his contemporary, and they doubtless furnished Rufinus with the details which he introduced. Thus Basil tells us (de Spiritu Sancto, c. 29, Paris ed. p. 62: "that Gregory was a great and conspicuous lamp, illuminating the Church of God, and that he possessed, from the co-operation of the Spirit, a formidable power against the demons; that he turned the course of rivers by giving them orders in the name of Christ; that he dried up a lake, which was the cause of strife to two brothers; and that his predictions of the future made him the equal of the other prophets . . . that by friends and enemies of the truth he was regarded, in virtue of his signs and prodigies, as another Moses." But Gregory of Nyssa expands into voluminous legend the record of these deeds. It is to be noticed that, with the exception of the river Lycus, to which express reference is made, the panegyric of Gregory of Nyssa contains no verifying element. He does not favour his hearers with names, dates, or places for these astounding portents. They were, as Dr. Newman observes, wrought at such times and seasons as to lead to numerous conversions. They were described as well known facts in a hortatory address and in ecclesiastical style. But they contrast very forcibly with the philosophical bias of Gregory's mind, and they are not mentioned or referred to until a hundred years after their occurrence. Some of the more remarkable are as follows:—The bishop was driven by stress of weather into a heathen temple, and by spending the night in prayer he exorcised the place, so that the priests on the following morning were unable to obtain their customary responses. This so enraged them that Gregory was threatened by them with numerous calamities, unless he freed them from their spell. The bishop is then said to have written on a parchment, "Gregory to Satan, enter." Whereupon the evil powers were once more at liberty to do the will of the hierophanta. If some fact is covered by the story, it would simply answer to the spiritualistic illusions and fraud with which we are now familiar, and the unwillingness of "spirits" to make their manifestations in presence of hostile witnesses. Two things should be noticed; the narrative implies Gregory's belief in the heathen divinities as powers to be propitiated, as living entities, and it reveals considerable weakness of mind in setting free for work a spirit whom he hailed as Satan, after having for a time at least bound him in a spell. The "miracle" is said to have led to numerous conversions, and to have been followed by further manifestations, such as his power in moving stones at his bidding. This story is still further exaggerated by transmission, until the stone becomes a mountain in the Dialogues of Gregory the Great. The idolatrous priest became Gregory's deacon and, according to Rufinus, his successor. The astonishment of the people was augmented by the bishop's indifference to their applause. A great outburst of healing powers is said to have led to the conversion of multitudes, and to the consequent erection of a Christian church. This, during the reign of Philip, would not be remarkable, but according to Tillemont (Mém. vol. iv. 330), it was the first church of which we have express mention. It does not follow that it was the first ναός erected, although few definite references can be found of earlier date to a similar proceeding. The destruction of the church at Nicomedia, referred to by Lactantius (de Morte Persecutorum, c. 12), shews that at the commencement of the 4th century, some of the Christian churches must have been of considerable magnitude and importance (cf. art. CHURCH, Dict. Christ. Antiq. vol. i. p. 336). Gregory of Nyssa declares that this church was standing in his day, ὁ μέχρι τοῦ παρόντος δεικνύμενος, hence it must have been spared in the persecutions under Dioetian. It is also added that when every house in the city was damaged by earthquake, this building was uninjured. A similar preservation was accorded to it in the year 499 or 503, when a second earthquake produced wide-spread ruin. There is a passage in the bishop of Nyssa's glowing rhetoric which reflects so favourably on Gregory's missionary and pastoral zeal, that I venture to introduce it. "Early in the morning crowds gathered at his doors, men, women and children, with aged persons and those who suffered from the bodily affliction of demons, or any other chastisement. In their midst he himself, in exact accordance with the need of each of those who had assembled, preached, questioned, admonished, instructed, and healed. It was by means of this that he attracted the masses of men to the preaching of the gospel, namely that sight corresponded with hearing, and it was through both that the tokens of divine power shone forth upon him; for their hearing was overpowered by his discourse, and their sight by his miracles of healing the sick. The mourner was comforted, the young man was taught sobriety, and to the old, appropriate counsel was administered. Slaves were admonished to be dutiful to their masters; those who exercised authority to be kind to their inferiors. The poor were taught that virtue is the only wealth, and the rich that they were but stewards of property, and not its owners."

The celebrated story of the drying up of a lake is thus amplified by Gregory of Nyssa:—"Two young brothers who shared between them their patrimony each laid claim to the possession of a lake. Instead of dividing the property between them they referred the dispute to Gregory, who exhorted them to be reconciled to one another. The young men were, however, exasperated and kindled into passion as their hopes of gain grew stronger." Then this led at length to the resolve upon a murderous struggle for the right of possession, "when the man of God, remaining on the banks of the lake and continuing throughout the night in watchfulness, performed a miraculous feat upon the water like that of Moses . . . for, by the power of prayer, he completely transformed the whole of it into dry land . . . so that no drop of moisture was lingering even in the hollows! and having in this manner, by the power of God, decided the controversy, he returned home, while the quarrel between the young men was settled by the fiat of deeds." (Migne's ed. Greg. Nyss. Patr. Gr. xlv. pp. 921 and 926.)

Basil also refers to another story which his brother presents in discursive fashion, how Gregory altered the course of the Armenian Lycus by planting his staff in the bed of the torrent, which said staff became a tree, and effected a purpose of great beneficence to the neighbourhood. This "miracle" is claimed by Dr. Newman as possessing some of the characteristics of a true miracle, inasmuch as the name of the river, the site of the portent, and the memorial of its occurrence were all appealed to. (Essays on Miracles, p. 267.)

One of the most interesting facts introduced by his panegyrist has reference to Gregory's selection of an obscure person, Alexander the charcoal burner, for the office of bishop over the neighbouring city of Comana. He was preferred to men of eloquence and station by reason of his humble self-consecration to God, and he was ordained with customary solemnities. This Alexander justified the choice thus made by reason of his excellent discourse, his holy living, and a martyr's death. He is honoured in the Roman calendar on August 11.*

Gregory is also credited with miracles of destruction. A Jew once asked alms to bury his dead comrade, who lay on the ground feigning lifelessness. Gregory is said to have thrown his cloak over the prostrate man as his dole. When the saint had departed, the Jew, intending to make off with his prize, attempted to rouse his companion with cries and kicks, but he was found to be really dead. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 27) cites a similar miracle as wrought by Epiphanius, and in doing so refers to this ghastly narrative. The great missionary success of Gregory and the rapid growth of the Church must have preceded the outbreak of persecution under Decius, in the years 250 and 251. The edict of Decius was ferocious, and where it was in the hands of sympathetic governors, it was cruelly carried out. [DECIVS.] Gregory of Nyssa gives a withering account of the persecution and its effects. Our Gregory advised those who could do so to save themselves and their faith by flight and concealment. His enemies pursued him into his retreat, but his thaumaturgic force was now used by him to assist his retirement, and they found in place of Gregory and his deacon two trees. This "prodigy" differs so profoundly (as do others we have mentioned) from miracles narrated in the New Testament, both in character and motive, that they form an instructive hint as to the ethnic and imaginative source of the whole cycle.

In 257 he returned to Neocaesarea, and when, in 258, peace was restored to the Church, Gregory ordered annual feasts in commemoration of the martyrs who had been faithful unto death. He is credited by his biographer with the doubtful wisdom of hoping to secure the allegiance of those who had been in the habit of worshipping idols, by arranging ceremonials in honour of the martyrs resembling that to which they had been accustomed. This time-serving is an unfavourable indication of character, and does something to explain the melancholy defection from moral uprightness and honour of many of his supposed converts. The conversion of the heathen is said to have been greatly quickened by the occurrence of a fearful plague which was partly, at least, due to Gregory's miraculous potency; the story as given by his panegyrist is sufficiently tragic, and though the narrative closes the panegyric, yet the event is said to have occurred early in his ministerial career. It is as follows:—

"I shall revert to and narrate the event that took place in the early part of his priestly career, which my discourse has omitted while it has hurried on to deal with the rest of his miraculous deeds. There was a public festival in the city, celebrated with certain ancestral rites, in honour of one of the local divinities.

* Gregory of Nyssa speaks of him as the first bishop of Comana. This is doubtful, as Eusebius (H. E. v. 16) speaks of one Zoticus of Comana as concerned in the Montanistic controversy.

To this nearly the whole tribe flocked, while all the country kept festival as well as the city. The theatre was crowded with the concourse, and the mass of people streaming in everywhere surged over the seats. All were eagerly straining their gaze for every sight and sound, and the building was filled with uproar. The performers were unable to exhibit their marvels, while the confusion among the crowded sight-seers not only interfered with the enjoyment of the music, but did not give the conjurors a chance of exhibiting their feats. Then from every one in the mob broke forth a cry calling upon the god in whose honour they celebrated the festival, and imploring that he would create ample room for them. And as every man shouted this with his neighbour the cry was borne aloft, and the exclamations which conveyed this prayer to the divinity seemed to come from the whole city as from a single throat. And the prayer was—you could hear its very words—‘Zeus, make room for us!’ And when the great Gregory heard the shout of those who cried out to the name of the god from whom they desired a wide space to be created in the city, he sent to them one of those who stood by him and said, ‘There shall be granted you larger room than you pray for or have ever known.’ “And when these words, like some grim utterance, were conveyed away to the crowd, a pestilence succeeded to that sacred public festival. At once lamentation was mingled with the dances, so that they found their mirth changed to sufferings and calamity. Instead of the music of the pipes, and the clashing of the cymbals, wailing dirges pervaded the city. When the disease had once attacked the population it passed through them faster than they anticipated, devouring their homes like fire. The temples were filled with those who were struck down by the plague, and had fled thither in hope of being healed. The springs, watercourses, and wells, were choked up with the bodies of men consumed with thirst in the agony of the disease.” The disease, which produced a multitude of other calamities, yielded to the prayers of Gregory. This led to numerous conversions. The ravages of pestilence were not, however, confined to Pontus. Similar disasters affected Upper Egypt, as may be gathered from the letters of Dionysius of Alexandria. (Eusebius, H. E. vii. 17; cf. Baron. Ann. 256. xi.)

We are not surprised to hear that at the death of Gregory of Neocaesarea, the number of heathen who now remained in his diocese had dwindled to seventeen, a number which exactly corresponded with the number of Christians to be found there, when Phaedimus consecrated him to the episcopal office. (Vit. Thaum. l.c. p. 954.) But the Christianity of the Neocaesareans must have been in many cases of a very imperfect kind, if we may judge from one of the most authentic documents which is referred to his pen, and entitled Epistola Canonica S. Gregorii . . . de iis qui in barbarorum incursione idolothyta comederant, et alia quaedam peccata commiserant. Jerome and other writers speak of the “letters” of Gregory, and by the council in Trullo, A.D. 680, the document in question is cited by the above name. Theodore Balsamon has appended scholia to each of the eleven canons into which it was divided. Numerous authorities, Dodwell (Dissertationes in Cyprianum), Ceillier (l. c. p. 444), question the genuineness of the last, the eleventh, of these canons, but the conviction widely prevails that the previous ten are genuine. They refer to the circumstances which followed the ravages of the Goths and Heruli, who ravaged Pontus and Asia Minor generally during the reign of Gallienus, and who committed gross indecorum, and carried away Christian captives. Nicephorus (viii. c. 33; cf. Baron. Ann. 263, xxiii.) enlarges on the diffusion of the gospel consequent upon this raid, and the holy conduct and discourse of the captives; be that as it may, the disorder which prevailed tempted numerous Christians in Pontus to flagrant acts of impiety and disloyalty. They took possession of the goods of those who had been dragged into bondage, and for selfish purposes actually restored to their captors those who had escaped their hands. Others identified themselves with the barbarians, making common cause with them, actually helping the heathen in their uttermost cruelty towards their brethren.

These facts are gathered from the “canons” in which Gregory denounced strenuously the commission of such crimes, and assigned to them their ecclesiastical penalty. The bishop shews his common sense and Christian charity in not lingering over the mere ceremonial uncleanness that might follow from enforced consumption of meat that had been offered to idols, and by exonerating from blame or any ecclesiastical anathema women who had, against their will, lost their chastity. He lays, however, great emphasis on the vices and greed of those who had violated Christian morality for the sake of gain and personal advantage. Different degrees of penalty and exclusion from church privilege were assigned, and those were argued on ground of Scripture alone. The epistle containing these canons was addressed to an anonymous bishop of Pontus, who had asked his advice on the subject, about the year 258. It must have been written, therefore, towards the end of his episcopate. It reveals the imperfect character of the wholesale conversions that had followed his remarkable ministry. The eleventh canon is not found in the edition of Zonaras, though Balsamon has commented upon it. The canon contains reference to four classes of penitents, with a technical detail, which, in the opinion of Catholic theologians, belongs to a later date.

Other works have been attributed to Gregory, but they have failed to make good their claim. Such, e.g., as Ἐκθεσις τῆς κατὰ μέγας πίστεως, which Vossius published in Latin in 1662, among the works of Gregory, and which Cardinal Mai (Scrip. Vet. vii. p. 170) has presented in Greek from the Codex Vaticanus. It is given by Migne (l. c. pp. 1103–1123). The best interpretation of the title is, “a creed not of all the dogmas of the Church, but only of some, in opposition to the heretics who deny them” (Ancient-Nicene Library, vol. xx. p. 81). It differs from the former confession in its obvious and technical repudiation of Arianism, and its distinct references to the later Nestorian, and Eutychian heresies. Dr. Caspari (ib. cit. pp. 65–146) has called for the first time attention to verbally accurate quotations from this document found in Theodoret’s Eraniastes [Ἐρανιστὴς ἑκ τῶν Πλατωνισμῶν], three dialogues between Eraniastes and Orthodoxus, entitled severally ἄρπεντος, ἀετὺχουτος, and ἀπαθῆς (Theod. Opp. tom. iv. p. 70, pp. 170–174 ed. Schulz), and in his Demonstrationes per Syllogismos. These quotations, however, were referred by Theodoret not to Gregory but to a "little book concerning the faith," περὶ πίστεως λογίδιον, directly attributed by him to Apollinaris the younger. Various corroborations of these quotations arise. Thus the emperor Marcian (450–457) accuses the Eutychians and late Apollinarists of circulating the words of their founder under the pseudonym of the Fathers of the Church. Evagrius (H. E. iii. 31) mentions the same fact, distinctly specifying the names of Gregory of Neocaesarea, Athanasius, and Julius of Rome, as being thus made use of. Caspari quotes several other testimonies to similar effect; and proves that the κατὰ μέγρος πίστεως must have been written about the end of the fourth century, before the greatest Monophysite and Nestorian conflicts arose, when the strain of theological interest centred still around the doctrine of the Trinity. The recovery of the document as a genuine exhibition of the thought of Apollinaris deserves attention. Caspari discusses the reason of Apollinaris in writing his "confession," the proofs of its unity, the grounds of its false attribution to Gregory. Other treatises and fragments given in the editions of his works, and also translated in the Anto-Nicene Library, are as follows:—Capitula duodecim de Fide, with interpretation, attributed by Gretser to Gregory, ed. Ratisbon, 1741. Ad Tatianum Disputatio de Animâ, which must have been written by a mediaeval philosopher at a time when the philosophy of Aristotle was beginning to exert a new influence (Ceillier). Four Homiliae, preserved by Vossius, on "the Annunciation to the Holy Virgin Mary," and on "Christ's Baptism," are totally unlike the genuine writing of Gregory, they are surcharged with the peculiar reverence paid to the Mother of our Lord after the controversy between Nestorius and Cyril, and they adopt the test-words of orthodoxy current in the Arian disputes. Two brief fragments remain to be added, one a comment on Matt. vi. 22–23, from a Catena, Cod. MS. and published by Galland, Vet. Patr. Bibl. xiv. 119, and a discourse, in Omnes Sanctos, preserved with a long Epistola praevia by Mingarelli.

The bishop of Neocaesarea was present at the first council held at Antioch in A.D. 264 to consider the improprieties and errors of Paul of Samosata. His brother Athenodorus is also spoken of as accompanying him, and they are named among the most eminent members of the council. (Eusebius, H. E. vii. 28.) In consequence of the dissimulation of Paul, no sentence of deprivation was then passed. At the close of 269 a second council was held on the subject at Antioch, at which a Theodorus was present. If this name is used for Gregory, he may not have died before 270. There is nothing known positively about the date of his departure, but his panegyrist tells us that his closing words expressed his regret that seventeen heathen should still be remaining in his diocese, a deep anxiety for their conversion, and a solemn injunction that no land should be purchased as his place of sepulture. He wished to carry the law of poverty out to the extreme letter. He was, however, buried in the church which he had built in Neocaesarea. He was commemorated on Nov. 17 (Cal. Ethiop.) and Nov. 23 (Cal. A.m.).

Editions of his Works.—The most noted have been those of Gerard Vossius, 1640, in 4to, and in 1622, in folio. They had been published in Bibl. Patr. Cologne, in 1618. The Panegyric on Origen by Sirmond 1605, 4to. De la Rue included it in his edition of Origenis Opera, vol. iv. The various fragments attributed to Gregory are all published by Migne. (Patr. Gr. vol. x.)

GREGORIUS (4) (GORGONIUS), bishop of Cinna, in the province of Galatia Prima. His signature appears in the Acts of the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314 (Labbe and Cossart, i. 1488), and in those of the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Labbe and Cossart, ii. 51; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 484.)

GREGORIUS (6), bishop of Berytus. He was the successor of Eusebius of Nicomedia in that see, and is named by Arius in his letter to this prelate among the bishops who had been condemned by Alexander of Alexandria (Theod. H. E. i. 5). He attended the council of Nicaea in 325 (Labbe, Concil. ii. 51).

GREGORIUS (7), ST., THE ILLUMINATOR (GREGOR LUSAVORITCH), "the sun of Armenia," the apostle and first patriarch of Armenia, cir. 302–331.

Of the life and times of the founder and patron saint of the Armenian church the best if not the only authorities are Agathangelos, who was secretary to Tiridates king of Armenia the persecutor and afterwards the convert of Gregory, and Simeon Metaphrastes. A French translation of the former was printed in the first volume of the Historiens de l'Arménie, 1867, by Victor Langlois, who has shewn that the work in its present form is a second and later edition of the original history of the reign of Tiridates and of the preaching of St. Gregory. This is evident not only from the incredibility of some of the events recorded, but also from the mention of people, such as the emperor Marcian, who lived after the time of Agathangelos. This improved edition is nevertheless of very early date, as it alone was known to Moses of Khorene, the Herodotus of Armenia, who flourished in the 5th century. The life of St. Gregory by Metaphrastes (Migne, Patrol. Graec. cxv. 941–996) is evidently drawn from Agathangelos. The silence of all Greek writers about Gregory is remarkable, though perhaps it can be accounted for by the position of Armenia in a far-off corner of the civilized world. Sozomen (H. E. ii. c. 8) incidentally mentions the conversion of Tiridates, ascribing it to a miraculous occurrence, but he says nothing concerning the human agent. The Rev. S. C. Malan has presented the subject to English readers by publishing, along with two other monographs of interest on Armenia and Armenian Christianity, a translation of the life and times of St. Gregory the Illuminator from the Armenian work of the Vartabed Matthew, which is the main source of the following sketch of the saint's life.

Gregory was born in or about 257 in the city of Valarshabad, the capital of the province of Ararat in Armenia. His father Anak, or Anag, was a Parthian Arsacid, of the province of Balikh, who, cir. 258, at the instigation of the Sassanid Ardashir (as Agathangelos and Moses of Khorene say, but it must have been his son Sapor I. as stated in Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. art. TIRIDATES III.) murdered Chosroes I. of Armenia. The dying king commanded the whole family of Anak to be slain, but an infant was saved, and being carried to the Cappadocian Caesarea was there brought up in the Christian faith, and received at baptism the name of Gregorius. Gregory, after a training in the fear of God, was married by his foster-mother to Mary, a lady of high rank, rich, modest, and pious, who bore him two sons, Vartanes and Aristages (or Rostaces), the latter of whom succeeded him as patriarch of Armenia. After three years Gregory and Mary separated by consent that they might give themselves more fully to the service of God.

Meanwhile Tiridates III., cir. 284, or a little later, had recovered the kingdom of his father Chosroes, by the help of the emperor Diocletian, whose favour he had gained, and whose hatred of Christianity he had imbibed. Gregory attached himself to him as a servant, and soon so endeared himself that he was raised to the rank of a noble. In the first year of his reign Tiridates went to the town of Erez (Erzenga) in Higher Armenia, to make offerings to Anahid the patron-goddess of Armenia; but Gregory refused to take any part in this idolatry, endeavoured to turn the king from his idols and spoke to him of Christ as the judge of quick and dead. The king was enraged, and determined to compel Gregory to join in the idol feast. Then followed what are known as "the twelve tortures of St. Gregory," which, in the exaggerated accounts handed down to us, are equally remarkable for refinement of cruelty on the one hand, and for unsurpassed fortitude, humility, and patience on the other. After two years Tiridates, who, it is said, had previously been ignorant of Gregory's parentage, ordered the saint to be thrown into a muddy pit infested with creeping creatures, into which malefactors were wont to be hurled, in the city of Ardashat, and there he lived for fourteen years, being fed by a Christian woman named Anna. In the story of St. Gregory there are a few traces like this of Christianity having existed in Armenia at a period earlier than his episcopate.

It is related that a community of religious women having in or about the year A.D. 300 fled from the neighbourhood of Rome in order to save one of their number, Rhipsime, from the designs of Diocletian, took refuge within the domains of Tiridates, and built a convent outside the city of Valarshabad. Tiridates being struck by the ravishing beauty of Rhipsime, had her brought to the palace. She managed to escape, but was overtaken and murdered, along with three-and-thirty of her companions. St. Gaiane, the head of the community, suffered the same fate. By the judgment of God Tiridates, as the story goes, was transformed into the appearance of a wild boar, and his people were plagued. At length it was revealed to the king's sister that as a condition of relief Gregory must be fetched from the pit. This was done, and afterwards the king and his subjects recovered. Gregory then preached publicly for sixty days to instruct the people, and to prepare them for holy baptism. After sixty-five days he narrated to them "his great vision" of the descent of One from heaven, grave and majestic, whose presence was of Light, and of three pedestals surmounted by three crosses of light. Whereupon at his order the people built three churches, one at the place where Rhipsime was murdered, the others where Gaiane and the sisters fell, and he called the place Etchmiadzin (the descent of the Only Begotten). The churches have given to the spot the Turkish name of Ütch-Kilise (Three Churches). Some time about 302 Gregory was consecrated bishop for Armenia by Leontius the bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia [ARMENIANS]. His cathedral was in the city of Valarshabad on the spot which he had named Etchmiadzin. He destroyed the idol temples, conquering the devils who inhabited them, i.e. the priests and supporters of the old religion, and baptized the king and his court in the river Euphrates. This national conversion occurred several years before Constantine had established the Church in the Roman empire, and Armenia was thus the first kingdom in which Christianity was adopted as the religion of the state. Gregory practised himself and urged on others the reading of the Holy Scriptures, both of the Old and the New Testaments. He also wrote letters to St. James of Nisibis, requesting him to compose homilies on faith, love, and other virtues. After filling the country with churches and ministers, schools and convents, Gregory in 331 retired to lead a solitary life among the caves of Manyen in the province of Taran, having previously consecrated his son Arisdages bishop in his stead. Gregory died in the wilderness, A.D. 332, and the shepherds, finding his dead body without knowing whose it was, erected over it a cairn of stones. In 325 Gregory is said to have been summoned to the council of Nicaea, but being himself unable to go sent his son, who brought back the decrees for the Armenian church. The venerable patriarch at Valarshabad greatly rejoiced on reading them, and exclaimed, "Now let us praise Him who was before the worlds, worshipping the most Holy Trinity and the Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now and ever, world without end, Amen," which words are added to the Nicene Creed when said in the Armenian church (Malan, p. 327, note). He is also said to have visited Constantine along with his sovereign (Nicoph. Callist. H. E. viii. 35 in Migne, P. G. cxlvi. 609; Baron. 311, xxii.-vii.), a tradition which is magnified in the popular version to a splendid journey to Rome, and reception by Constantine and pope Silvester (Moses of Khorene, cap. 89 in Langlois, H. de l'Arménie, ii. 128). In the last paragraph of the work of Agathangelos the writer asserts that he was an eye-witness of the things that he narrates, but if it is admitted that the existing work is a later recension, this sentence must have been taken directly from the original. The Bollandists have printed Agathangelos, and other lives of Gregory. (Acta SS. viii. Sept. pp. 295-413; Basil. Mœn. Sept. 30, in Migne, Patr. Græc. cxvii.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1355, 1371.) In honour of her founder the Armenian church afterwards bore the name of Armeno-Gregorian. Saint-Martin gives 276 for the date of his consecration (Mém. sur l'Arménie, i. 436), and Langlois the same (Historiens, ii. 387). Saint-Martin also places the death of Chosroes by Anak in 198 (Mém. i. 412), a date which must be far wrong. His festivals are—in the Ethiopian Calendar Sept. 16; in the Byzantine, Sept. 30; in the Armeno-Gregorian, Mar. 23, June 8, June 22.

GREGORIUS (8), THE CAPPADOCIAN, appointed by Arianizing bishops at Antioch in the beginning of 340 (not, apparently, of 339, as the Festal Index says), to supersede Athanasius in the see of Alexandria, on the ground that Athanasius had uncanonically resumed his see without any sentence of a council cancelling the sentence pronounced by the council of Tyre in 335. The appointment of Gregory is wrongly assigned by Socrates (ii. 20) to the Dedication Council, which did not meet until 341. He had been a student in the schools of Alexandria, and had there received kindness from Athanasius (Greg. Naz. Orat. xxi. 15). He was now to be installed by military power, under orders from the emperor Constantius. The announcement being made by his countryman the prefect Philagrius, the Alexandrian church people protested to the other magistrates and to all their fellow citizens: Philagrius replied by encouraging a pagan rabble, in combination with Jews and with countrymen carrying clubs, to attack the church of St. Quirinus, and to perpetrate various profane outrages, four days before Gregory's arrival, which took place on March 23 (cf. Fest. Ind.), Athanasius having retired to a place of concealment. Socrates wrongly connects with Gregory's intrusion the night attack described in Athanas. de Fugâ 24, which took place after the appointment of George, in 356. That Gregory was an Arian might be inferred from the circumstances of his appointment; and although it could not be said of him, as of Pistus, who had at first been thought of for the post, that he had been deposed for overt Arianism, yet, as Athanasius says in an encyclical letter written at this time, his sympathy with the heresy was proved by the fact that only its supporters had demanded him, and that he employed as secretary one Ammon, who had been long before excommunicated by bishop Alexander for his impiety (Encycl. c. 7). Athanasius tells us that on Good Friday, Gregory having entered a church, the people shewed their abhorrence, whereupon he caused Philagrius publicly to scourge thirty-four virgins and married women, and men of rank, and to imprison them. Others were imprisoned on Easter-day itself; Gregory employed Philagrius to use violence to captains of vessels, by way of compelling them to convey his letters of communion: he accused Catholics before the governor for praying apart in their houses, and hindered them from being visited by their clergy. After Athanasius fled to Rome, Gregory became still more bitter: he persecuted the rightful bishop's aunt, and when she died he tried to deprive her of burial; he seized the doles of widows; he caused the duke Balacius to spit upon a letter of remonstrance written to him by "Father Antony" (Athan. Hist. Ari. 13). We hear of him as "oppressing the city," in 341 (Fest. Ind.). Auxentius, afterwards Arian bishop of Milan, was ordained priest by him (Hilar. in Aux. 8). The council of Sardica, at the end of A.D. 343, pronounced him never to have been, in the church's eyes, a bishop (Hist. Ari. 17). He died, not by murder, as Theodoret says, ii. 4, through a confusion with George, but after a long illness (Fest. Ind.), about ten months after the exposure of the Arian plot against bishop Euphrates, i.e. about February, A.D. 345. This date, gathered from Athanasius, Hist. Ari. 21, is preferable to that of the Index, Epiphi 2 = June 26, 346. [W. B.]

GREGORIUS (9) II., fourth patriarch of greater Armenia, grandson of Gregory the Illuminator, succeeding Verthanes and occupying the see for eleven years, c. A.D. 347-58. According to another account he was the fifth patriarch, having succeeded his brother Hesychius or Josec. He is said to have carried the gospel to the Albanenses, a tribe on the Caspian sea, amongst whom he suffered martyrdom. (Galanus, Hist. Armena, cap. 5; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1374.) [L. D.]

GREGORIUS (10), bishop of Caesena c. A.D. 361. He is said to have been a native of Ticinum (Pavia). He died as a martyr A.D. 361; probably in the persecution of Julian. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 453; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 526.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (11), bishop, an uncle of Basil on the father's side. He exercised a paternal care over Basil on the death of Basil's father, and Basil speaks of him with much affection. Gregory was present with other bishops of Cappadocia at Basil's consecration. About A.D. 371 an unhappy difference arose between Basil and his uncle, the circumstances of which, and Gregory Nyssen's awkward and disingenuous attempts to heal the breach, are narrated elsewhere. [BASILIIUS OF CAESAREA, Vol. I. p. 288.] (Basil. epp. 58, 59, 60, in Patr. Gr. xxii. 408-410.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (12) BAETICUS, ST., bishop of Eliberi, Elvira or Granada cir. 357-384. He is first mentioned as resisting the famous Hosius of Cordova, when under the persecution of Constantius Hosius gave way so far as to admit Arian bishops to communion with him. This must have been in or before A.D. 357, the year of Hosius's death.

At the council of Ariminum Gregorius was one of the few bishops who adhered to the creed of Nicaea, and refused to hold communion with the Arians Valens, Ursacius, and their followers. The authority for these statements is a letter to Gregorius from Eusebius of Vercellae, from his exile in the Thebaid (printed among the works of St. Hilary of Poitiers, ii. 700, in Migne, Patr. Lat. x. 713). Eusebius there acknowledges letters he had received from Gregorius, giving an account of his conduct, and commends him highly for having acted as became a bishop. He exhorts him to chide those who had fallen away, and to rebuke the unfaithful, without fearing the secular power, and asks him to write and tell him what success he had met with in his efforts to reform the bad, and what brethren he had either found faithful, or had brought back to the right faith by his own exertions. For the fabulous story contained in the Libellus Precum, mentioned below, c. 9 and 10, of the return of Hosius to Spain, his efforts to compel Gregorius to join him in his apostasy, and his miraculous death, see HOSIUS.

Gams, however (Kirchengeschichte, ii. 256-259, 279-282), takes a totally different view of the character and conduct of Gregorius. He maintains that Gregorius was one of the bishops who fell into heresy at Ariminum, and supports his opinion by the following reasons: (i) The letter of Eusebius cannot be considered a witness in favour of Gregorius, as the only evidence he had before him when he wrote it was derived from Gregorius's own letter of self-commendation. (ii) According to all other authorities not one of the bishops adhered to the orthodox belief. At any rate, had Gregorius stood firm, he could not have escaped banishment, a punishment which the Libellus Precum, c. 10, states expressly that he never suffered. Gams further identifies him with the Gregorius who was one of the deputation headed by Restitutus of Carthage, who were sent by the council to Constantius, and who assented to and subscribed an Arian formula of belief at Nice, in Thrace, Oct. 10, A.D. 359, and held communion with the Arian's leaders, Valens, Ursacius, and others (St. Hilary of Poitiers, Ex Opere Historico Fragmentum 8, in Migne, Patr. Lat. x. 702). His grounds for this supposition are the rarity of the name Gregorius in the West till the 4th and 5th centuries, only one bishop of the name, Gregorius of Portus, who subscribed the canons of the council of Arles, A.D. 314, being found in western church history before Gregorius Baeticus, and the fact that Gregorius must have been a young man in A.D. 359, which agrees with the description given by Sulpicius Severus (Hist. Sac. ii. 45, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 152) of the deputies as "homines adolescentes."

Gregorius is generally supposed to have been one of the leaders of the schism originated by Lucifer of Cagliari. This theory is supported by the terms of praise applied to him by the Luciferians Faustinus and Marcellus in their Libellus Precum ad Imperatores (c. 9, 10, 20, 25, 27, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 89, 90, 97, 100, 102), and also by the way St. Jerome in his Chronicle under the date of 374 = A.D. 370, (in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxvii. 695) couples him with Lucifer of Cagliari, saying that the latter with Gregorius, a Spanish, and Philo, a Libyan, bishop, "nunquam se Arianæ miscuit pravitati." Florez however (Esp. Sagr. xii. 121) maintains at great length that no certain proof of this theory exists. In support of his view he argues that the addition to St. Jerome's statement in the Chronicle of Prosper (732, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 582) "Sed dum vigorem justitiæ erga correctionem eorum qui cesserant non relaxat, ipse a suorum communicatione descivit," shews that though Gregorius and Philo shared Lucifer's resistance to Arianism, they did not follow him in his schism. He then impeaches the credit of Faustinus and Marcellus, by pointing out that they give a wholly fabulous account of the miraculous death of Hosius, and that their statement that Gregorius was the only orthodox bishop whom Constantius left unmolested in his diocese is also untrue, and urges the probability of the Luciferians claiming such a distinguished bishop as a member of their sect, a claim to which his having, like Lucifer himself, been one of the few bishops who had never yielded to Arianism, gave some plausibility. Florez supports his view by the antiquity of the cultus of Gregorius as a saint, for which he cites Usuard, Martyrology, Ap. 24 (in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 967), and argues that he could not have been venerated as such had he been a schismatic. Gams on the other hand (Kirchengeschichte, ii. 310-314) maintains that even before the death of Lucifer, Gregorius was the recognized head of the sect. On the authority of the Libellus Precum, c. 25, he considers that Gregorius, after Lucifer's return from exile in A.D. 362, visited him in Sardinia. He further identifies with Gregorius the bishop mentioned in c. 63, as having been at Rome under the assumed name of Taorgius, and as having consecrated one Ephesius as bishop of the Luciferians there, an event the date of which he places between A.D. 366 and A.D. 371.

As for the sanctity of Gregorius, Gams points out that he does not appear in any calendar before Usuard, and that at any rate God and the church are alone infallible, an attribute to which Martyrologies can have no claim.

The author of the treatise De Trinitate, which was formerly ascribed to Gregorius, was undoubtedly a Luciferian, but it is now universally believed to have been written by the above-mentioned Faustinus. From the Libellus Precum already referred to, and the Rescript of Theodosius in reply addressed to Cynegius, Gregorius appears to have been alive in A.D. 384. In none of the above passages is the see of Gregorius mentioned, as he is called only episcopus Hispaniarum or Hispaniensis, but the name of his see is supplied by St. Jerome, de Vir. Illust. c. 105 (S. Hieron. Op. ii. 937, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxiii. 703), who says "Gregorius Baeticus, Eliberi Episcopus, usque ad extremam senectutem diversos mediocri sermone tractatus composuit, et de Fide elegantem librum, qui hodieque superesse dicitur." The last clause is generally considered to refer to Gregorius himself, and not to his book, and some MSS. omit the "qui," which would make this interpretation certain. In that case Gregorius would have been alive in A.D. 392, the date of St. Jerome's treatise. Opinions have been much divided as to the book De Fide. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Ap. iii. 270) say "etiamnum latet." It was formerly supposed to be the De Trinitate already mentioned. Ceillier (Autours sacrés, iv. 348) and others consider it to be a treatise variously ascribed to St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Ambrose, or Vigilinus of Thapsus, which however is attributed to St. Phoebadius, bishop of Agen (Histoire Littéraire de la France, i. pt. ii. 273-276), and is printed among his works by Migne (Patr. Lat. xx. 31). Finally Gams, p. 314, thinks that the above-mentioned treatise, De Trinitate, though really written by Faustinus, is the work to which St. Jerome alludes. He considers that St. Jerome was misled by Gregorius claiming the book as his own, which, according to his notions, he had some right to do. The ideal of the early church, which Gregorius wished to restore, included the community of property, a system which of course extended to mental property, such as writings. He therefore, as head of the church, might assert a claim to the work composed by one of his followers.

It will be seen by the above account that the materials for a life of Gregorius are scanty, that the Libellus Precum, the work which mentions him most frequently, is of very doubtful authority, and that widely different estimates have been formed of him. This article has endeavoured to set out, as fairly as possible, the conclusions on both sides, with a sketch of the arguments by which they are supported. It should be remembered that Gama, from the favourable view he takes of Hosius, whom he does not consider to have fallen into heresy, is unfavourably predisposed to Gregorius, whom he regards as the author of what are, in his opinion, calumnies against Hosius. Had Gregorius really yielded at Nice or Ariminum, it seems improbable that the opponents of the Luciferians should never have used so telling a retort against them, if he was the head of their sect. The two charges of Arianism and Luciferianism appear to be mutually destructive. It may be further observed that it seems unlikely that so eminent a leader of the orthodox party as Eusebius, when he wrote to Gregorius, had no other information of the events that had happened at Sirmium and Ariminum, except that supplied by Gregorius's letter, or that the latter would have ventured to give an account of his behaviour, which was diametrically opposed to the truth, to a person who either knew already or soon would be informed of what had really occurred. Gregorius is commemorated on April 24. [F. D.]

GREGORIUS (13) L., bishop of Nazianzus in Cappadocia, father of Gregorius Nazianzenus [GREGORIUS (14)]; originally a member of the sect of the Hypsistarii [HYPSISTARII], who were numerous in Cappadocia, he was converted to the Catholic faith, married a lady of the name of Nonna, and was soon afterwards chosen and consecrated bishop of Nazianzus, c. A.D. 329. He was a pillar of the orthodox party, though he was weak enough to sign the creed of Ariminum in deference to the emperor Constantius, A.D. 360. He took part in the ordination of Basil to the see of Caesarea [BASIL, Vol. I. 287]; he opposed the attempts of the emperor Valens, A.D. 371, to overthrow the Catholic faith, yet he, as well as Basil, was spared the banishment that was inflicted on many of the bishops (Socr. iv. xi.). After an episcopate of forty-five years, he died A.D. 374. His son frequently mentions his good father, both in his sermons and his verses, and pronounced a funeral oration over him. (Gregorii Nazian. Oratio xviii. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxv. 330; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 411.)

GREGORIUS (14) NAZIANZENSUS, bishop (370-390) of Sasima and of Constantinople. He has been fortunate in his biographers. He left them abundant materials in his works, especially in a large collection of letters, and an autobiographical poem extending to nearly two thousand lines. His life accordingly occupies a large space in all the chief histories of the church, and we have in addition the important monographs of the presbyter Gregory (10th century; vid. Greg. Naz. Opp. ed. Billii, t. i. Gr. and Lat.; Surius, de Prob. Hist. SS. Mai. p. 121, Lat.); of Baronius, with notes by P. Pechbroch, in the Acta SS. 9 Mai. ii. 373; of Clemencet prefixed to the Benedictine edition of the works; of Hermant (Paris. 1679); and in our own day those of Ullmann, and the Abbé Benoît. The aim of this article is to select from this fulness of materials, and in particular from those which have come to us from St. Gregory himself, the facts which are of chief importance, and to present to the reader (a) an outline of the events of his life; (b) an account of his writings; (c) an estimate of his position as (i.) a writer, and (ii.) a theologian.

(a) St. Gregory takes his distinctive title from Nazianzus, a small town in the south-west of Cappadocia, which is not known to the early geographers, and owes its chief importance to its connexion with our author. The Romans gave to it, or a place in the immediate neighbourhood, the name of Diocaesareia; but in the 4th century this name seems to have fallen into disuse, while Nazianzus was of importance as a bishopric. Close to Nazianzus, in a district known as the Tiberine (Ep. ii. Opera, ii. 2; S. Basil, Ep. iv.), was a village called Arianzus, where the father of Gregory possessed an estate, and where the son was born.

Both the parents of Gregory are known to us. His father bore the same name [GREGORIUS (13)], and belonged in early life to the sect of the HYPsISTARIANS (Orat. xviii. 5 ; Opera, i. 333). The mother's name was Nonna, a child of Christian parents (Philtatius and Gorgonia), and herself praised by her son as a model of Christian virtues. To her life and her prayers he attributes the conversion of his father. A sister and brother are also known to us—Gorgonia, probably older than Gregory, and the subject of one of the most touching of his funeral orations (Orat. viii. ; Opera, i. 217–232); and Caesarius, who rose to eminence at the court of Constantinople, and was in like manner the subject of an eulogy at his death (Orat. vii., Opera, i. 195–216).

The date of Gregory's birth is uncertain, as it depends chiefly on two vague references in his writings, which have been made to give more than one interpretation. He tells us, when speaking of Basil's quitting Athens—καὶ γὰρ πολὺς τέτριπτο τοῖς λόγοις χρόνος.

Carm. xi. de Vilá Sufi, 238, 9. Opera, ii. p. 687.

Gregory the priest, followed by Papebroch (Acta Sanct. ut sup. p. 380 A) and others, understand these words to refer to a period of thirty years spent in study ; but this meaning could only have been extracted from the Greek, or held in opposition to the whole evidence furnished by the life of Gregory and his friend, in order to support the statement, already put forth by Suidas (Γρηγόριος, tom. i. p. 497), that Gregory died at the age of ninety or more in the thirteenth year of Theodosius, i.e. about 392, and that his birth is therefore to be placed in the opening years of the 4th century. Taking the words in their almost certain meaning they fix the departure of Basil from Athens in about the thirtieth year of Gregory's life. Now we know that Basil left Athens [BASILIDUS, p. 283] about the year 335; we know also that Julian, who was with Gregory at Athens, was there in 335; and we get 325 as a proximate date of Gregory's birth. He was a beardless youth when he went to Athens (Αἴνετος νεπὺς, Form. xi. 112, Opera, ii. 690), and this would give a time, probable in itself, of some ten or twelve years spent there.

In another passage he speaks of his father as trying to persuade him to become his coadjutor at Nazianzus, and saying,— ὅσον χρόνον ἐπεσφύγασαι ἴκω

 ἔσως ἑξήκω θύομαι καὶ ἡμέρας.

Cur. xi. de Vitâ Basil. l. 312, 13, Opera, ii. 700.

The simple meaning of these words seems to be that the period of the son's whole life was less than that which the father had lived as priest and bishop, but not much less; and the resort to any other meaning seems due only to the difficulty which some writers have felt in admitting that Gregory, and, if Gregory, Caesarian, for he was the younger of the brothers, was born after the father's ordination. Papebroch (Acta Sanct. ut sup. p. 370 n) would read ἡμερῶν (trade-wind) for ἡμερῶν, with the sense, "Your life is not as long as mine," or, according to his later suggestion, as if feeling that this emendation would not hold, ἡς ἡμῶν, meaning, "Your life is not half as long as mine." Of both emendations it can only be said that they are absolutely without MS. authority, and that a theory which rests upon such support is practically groundless. Stilling (Dissert. de Tempore Natiuit. & Greg. Naz. p. vi. in Acta SS. Bell. Sep. iii.), seeing that ἡμερῶν, the reading of all the MSS., could not be displaced, found an escape in the insertion of a stop at the close of the first line—"You have not yet measured to the full such a life. The time of sacrifice is wholly passed for me;" or, as others would render it, "Have you not yet measured such a life? What a long time it is that I have been offering sacrifices!" But to all such renderings there is the fatal objection that a polished Grecian such as Gregory would not have used ρεσφύραι and ἔσως in immediate proximity except as correlatives. Clementet suggests that "victimæ sunt intellectoris quas quilibet Christianus ex corde puro offert," and is content to say, with Prudentius Maran (Vit. Basil. p. 88, col. 3), "Satis est cum Tillemontio fateri legem ecclesiasticam de continentia episcoporum nondum in omnibus omnino ecclesiis viguisse quam apertissimum locum ejusmodi conjecturis attentare," though he significantly adds, "Ergo, si prius demonstrari posset legem

 fuerit" (Vit. & Greg., Opera, i.
 ; cf. Tillemont, Mémoires, tom.
 it we do not seem necessarily an alteration of the text or to ut Gregory was born during the father. The words would be 1 if he was born at any time a ordination to the priesthood, 1 good reason to believe that a od intervened between the ordi-consecration. Gregory himself viii. 13; Opera, tom. i. p. 340) time passed between the haption and ordination (ὅσον χρόνον εἰς ἐπίσκοπον καὶ ἡμερῶν, ἅλῃς ἡμερῶν καὶ ἡμερῶν), and a few lines later that he succeeded as bishop to a neglected church long deprived of episcopal care (ὅσον χρόνον μὴ ἐπισκοπῆς περιεσφύγασαι, tom. xviii. 16; Opera, ii. 340). He succeeded the bishop who had baptized him, and it seems to follow from a comparison of these passages that the ordination preceded the consecration by an interval of two or three years (cf. Cailliet, Ant.

ancr. tom. v. p. 179, and Benoit, Saint Grégoire,
 p. 769). And, however difficult it may be found to establish the fact, questioned by Clementet, that bishops were permitted to live with wives to whom they had been married before consecration, there can be no doubt that priests in parallel cases continued to live in matrimony, as they are permitted to do by the Roman church in some oriental countries to this day (cf. Duran, Hist. de l'Église, ix. 251; Benoit, ut supra.) The reason for the date assigned by Seidas and his followers being thus removed, we are left to the conclusion, which follows reasonably from Gregory's own words, that he was born in one of the years of the quinquennium, 325-9. The question is discussed with considerable fulness by most of the biographers. It is not important enough to demand more space and more minute settlement here.

Kouss regarded the man-child given to her as an answer to prayer, and in fulfilment of a vow dedicated him to the Lord, but not in baptism, as we shall see. From the first dawn of reason she taught him to read the Scriptures, and led him to regard himself as an Isaac offered in sacrifice to God, who had given him to another Abraham and Sarah. He, as another Isaac, dedicated himself. He rejoices to tell of the examples set before him at home and of the bent given to his studies by companionship with good men. In the lad we find the germ of the man—

ὅσον ἔτι ἡλικίᾳ, σφύγγοντα καὶ ἄρτο ἑξήκω ἔτι ἡλικίᾳ καὶ ἡλικίᾳ σφύγγοντα.

Cur. de Vitâ Basil. ii. 312, 13, Opera, ii. 690.

He is impressed while yet a boy with the importance of the outer form of thought as well as of its inner content, and is determined that style shall not be desecrated by being simply the handmaid of error. He and his brother Caesarius were sent to school at Caesarea, the capital of the province, and famous for its illustrious teachers (ὅσον ἔτι ἡλικίᾳ ἄρτο σφύγγοντα, ὅ ἑξήκω ἔτι ἡλικίᾳ καὶ ἡλικίᾳ σφύγγοντα, Or. xliii. 13, Opera, i.
 780). Some of the earlier authorities have supposed the Palestinian Caesarea to be intended, but Nicetas understands it of the Cappadocian, and the question may be regarded as settled by the Benedictine editors of Basil [BASILIDUS, p. 283, col. 1]. The tutor to whose care the brothers were committed was Carterius, the same, it may be, who was afterwards at the head of the monasteries of Antioch and the instructor of Chrysostom (Tillemont, Mémoires, ix. 370). To his dearly loved tutor Gregory has devoted four epitaphs (Ep. cxi.-cxviii. Opera, ii. 1155). It was Carterius who had guided the reins in youth, who had linked him to the spiritual life, who had formed him by the excellence of his own life, and he prays Carterius to remember him still. Happy dom he extol the land of the Xoles because they have such a protector in heaven.

At Caesarea probably was commenced the friendship with Basil [BASILIUS, p. 283, col. 2], which, tried by many a shock, survived them all; and was the chief influence which moulded the life of both friends, and certainly chief among the influences which has moulded the theology of the Christian church. Basil went from Caesarea to Constantinople; Gregory and his brother went to Caesarea in Palestine to pursue the study of oratory (Orat. vii. 6, Opera, ii. 201). Another reason may well have guided their choice. While they were lads at home the church of the Holy Sepulchre had been consecrated in Jerusalem, and the Asiatic bishops, their own father perhaps among them, had been present in large numbers (Benoît, Grégoire de Naz. p. 33). Pilgrimages were already frequent, and a fresh impulse to them had been given by the supposed discovery of the true cross. Maximus was now bishop of Jerusalem, and Cyril, who was to succeed him, must have been already a man of mark. At Caesarea the brothers separated; Caesarius departing to Alexandria, and Gregory remaining to study rhetoric in the school made famous by Origen and Pamphilus and Eusebius. At this time Thespesius was the master of greatest renown, and Euzoius was a fellow pupil with Gregory (Hieron. de Eccles. Script. cap. 113). The latter has celebrated the fame of his teacher in an epitaph which makes Attica ask "Who now possesses the glory of my art?" (Ep. iv. Opera, ii. 1109). From Palestine Gregory went to Alexandria, which he speaks of as πρωτοίας παιδείσεως, καὶ τότε καὶ νῦν οὖσαν τε καὶ δεκοῦσαν ἐργαστήριον (Orat. vii. 6, Opera, i. 200). Here Didymus now filled the chair of Pantaenus and Clement and Origen, and counted among his pupils the first young thinkers of the Roman empire; and here Athanasius filled the episcopal throne. Gregory does not tell us that he met either the great teacher or the great bishop, and it is probable indeed that the latter was an exile at the time. He did not remain long in Alexandria, for already he was within reach of Athens, the centre of the young student's hopes. His eagerness was not checked by the storm of season—it was about November, the worst month of the year—and a ship of Aegina, among the crew of which there happened to be some of his friends, offered him the wished-for passage (Orat. xviii. 31, Opera, i. 351). When off Cyprus a fierce storm struck the ship. The thunder, lightning, darkness (τὰ παντ' ἦν ὀχρὰ μίλα), creaking of the yards, shaking of the masts, cries of the crew, appeals for help to Christ, even by those who before had not known Him (ὁ γὰρ φόβος διδάγμα καυχήτερον), all added to the terror of the scene. Worst of all the ship was left without fresh water. To die of thirst or hunger seemed the fate before them when the fury of the storm should abate; but a Phoenician vessel came to their rescue and supplied their need. Still the danger was not passed; the storm continued for twenty-two days, during which they saw no chance of deliverance. Gregory's chief fear was not death, but death without having been baptized. In prayer he dedicated himself again to God (γῆς καὶ θαλάσσης δῶρον), and sought for help. The prayer was answered, and the whole crew so affected that they received spiritual as well as temporal salvation. Passing by Rhodes they came to Aegina, and thence he went to Athens —'Ἐπειτ' Ἀθῆναι καὶ λόγῳ (Carm. xi. de Vita sua, 130–212, Opera, ii. 682, 5; Carm. de Rebus suis, 310–340, Opera, ii. 647 et seqq.). Gregory has given another account of this storm in the funeral oration for his father (Orat. xviii. 31, Opera, i. 351, 352), when he refers to the danger as having given him to God—καθυποσχόμενοι εἰ σωθῆμεν ἡμᾶς αὐτοὺς τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ δεδοκότες ὡς ἀπεσώθημεν. The natural meaning of these words, read by the side of those expressing his fear of dying unbaptized, seems to be that he and those with him then received the rite of baptism. So they have been understood by Baronius (Vit. § 17 in Acta SS. ut sup. 378 c), who is followed doubtfully by Clem. noet (Opera, i. lxxxviii.), and certainly by Benoît (S. Grégoire, p. 48). The priest Gregory states that the baptism did not take place until his return to Nazianzus (Opera, i. 133), and this is the view taken by Tillemont (Mémoires, ix. 334) and Hermant (Grégoire, i. 76). We have no data for determining more certainly whether the outward rite took place at this time or not; but that Gregory regarded it as the crisis of his being, and anew dedicated the spared life to the God who had spared it, is beyond doubt.

Among the Athenian sophists of the day, none were more famous than Himerius and Proaeresius, at whose feet Gregory continued the study of oratory. To the latter, who was a Christian, Gregory devoted an epitaph (Epit. v. Opera, ii. 1109), which bids youth flee from Athens, since great men were there no more; and Rome honoured him with a statue bearing the words "Regina Roma Regi eloquentiae" (Eunapius de Vit. Philosoph. et sophist.); while Julian, also his pupil, would have exempted him alone from the proscription of Christian teachers, but that he refused to be exempted.

At Athens two arms of a river which had been divided again flowed together. Gregory and Basil met (Orat. xliii. 15; Opera, i. 781). The one had gone from Caesarea to Palestine and Alexandria; the other to Constantinople; and now they were together again. What that meeting was to Gregory he himself has told us. Athens, with the party factions among the students of different nationalities, and the touting for fresh pupils on the part of every teacher's class, had proved little in accord with his gentler spirit. He had gone there to seek eloquence, and now found Basil; like Saul, who sought his father's asses and found a kingdom (Orat. xliii. 1'; Opera, i. 780). He was able to render Basil various little friendly offices, which saved the freshman no small inconvenience. It was through his means that Basil was exempted from the rough practical joking which all who joined the Athenian classes had to pass through. [BASILIUS, p. 283, col. 2.] The Armenians, jealous of the new-comer, whose fame had preceded him, and with some of the old feeling of antagonism against Cappadocia, tried to entrap him in sophistical debates. When they were being defeated Gregory, feeling that the honour of Athens was at stake, came to the rescue, but soon saw the real object they had in view, and left them to join his friend (Orat. xliii. 16, 17; ibid. 782, 783). These things are trifles, but they had important effects. The two friends, rendered obnoxious to their companions, were bound the more closely to each other. Their fellow-students, for various reasons, bore various names and surnames. They were, and desired to be called, Christians; they had all things in common, and became as one mind possessing two bodies (Orat. xliii. 20, 21; ibid. 785, 786; Carm. xi. 221-235; Opera, ii. 687). Among other students who were at the university with Gregory, was Julian the Apostate. Gregory claims that he had even then discerned the character of the man, that he had read it in his very looks; and that their fellow-students would remember how he used to warn them that Rome was cherishing a serpent (οἶον κακὸν ἢ Ῥωμαίων τρέφει, Orat. v. 24, Opera, i. 162).

Gregory must have spent a long time at Athens, not less probably than ten years. He went there, as we have seen, a beardless youth; he left about his thirtieth year. No decade of life is so important in the formation of character. The receptive faculties are still fresh; the active powers are strong with their first energy. To the effect upon Gregory of those years at Athens the matter and the form of his work alike bear witness. But they drew to a close. Basil had already left, and Gregory would have gone at the same time, but the earnest entreaties of strangers as well as friends, superiors as well as equals, prevailed upon him; for only the strength of an oak could have resisted their pleadings and tears (Carm. xi. 245-262, Opera, ii. 687-688). They apparently wished to retain him at Athens as a teacher of rhetoric (Ὡς δὲ λόγων δάσκαλός ἐκ ψήφου κρείστος, ibid. 256), or, as Clemencet interprets the words (note in loco), were willing to give him the first place among the teachers. It does not seem necessary to understand more than that the students gave him the first rank among themselves.

Leaving Athens then, probably about the beginning of the year 356, Gregory went first to Constantinople, wishing to see the new Rome before his return to Asia. The fact is important, as bearing upon his later decision to enter upon his great work there. Here he unexpectedly met his brother Caesarius, who was journeying to Nazianzus from Alexandria, and determined to continue his journey in spite of the attempt to detain at court the young physician whose fame had preceded him (Orat. vii. 5-9, Opera, i. 200-203). The mother had longed to see both her sons return together, and Gregory has left a touching account of their meeting.

The time had now come for entering upon the duties of life. Nazianzus must have expected much from the foremost of Athenian students, and in the ordinary course a career of distinction and preferment would have been open to Gregory as an advocate, or a teacher of rhetoric. He did not refuse to give his friends some specimens of his oratorical power. He danced a little and then quitted the stage (Carm. xi.; De Vitâ suâ, 265-275; Opera, ii. 689). It is at this point that some of the biographers, as we have seen above, fix his baptism. Gregory himself tells us that he now laid down the plan of his life. Every power he possessed—even that of eloquence itself—was to be devoted to God; but the way thus chosen seemed divided into two, and he knew not which to take. Friends could not help him, for they, too, were divided. Elias, the sons of Jonadab, the Baptist, were types of the life that attracted him; but, on the other hand was the study of the Scriptures, for which the desert offered no opportunities; and the advanced age of his parents presented claims which seemed to be imperative duties (ibid. 300-337). He resolved to seek the good and avoid the evil of both the practical and the contemplative life. The true monastic life is one of habits, not one of physical conditions (τρόπων γὰρ εἶναι τὴν μονήν, οὐ σωματέων, ibid. 329). He resolved to live the strict life of an ascetic, and yet receive the blessings of society and perform its duties (Carm. i. de Rebus suis, l. 65 sq.; Opera, ii. 635). Not even the pleasure of music did he allow himself (οὐ μουσῆς ἀταλαῖς ἐνὶ κροῦμασι θυμὸν ἰδύσθην, ibid. l. 69). He found, however, that the details of domestic duties were little in accord with the cast of his mind. "Many cares fretted him by night and by day. To govern servants was a very network of evil (οἶον δαλέθρου δίκτυον!). Not gentle to bad masters, and not obedient to good ones, they excited the anger of both much more than they supposed. Then to look after property, hear the harsh demand of the tax-collectors, go to law-courts, where the richer man gains the day even if he is wrong,—a man can no more do all this without being the worse for it, than he can go too close to a house on fire without being singed by the flame or blackened by the smoke" (ibid. 140-164).

In the midst of these trifling irritations, which went far to mar the life he had marked out for himself, Gregory heard from his old friend Basil, who had followed the example of his own sister and mother, and after visiting Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Mesopotamia to compare the rival systems, had resolved to found a coenobitic system in Pontus [BASILIVS, p. 284, col. 2]. While students at Athens the friends had formed some such plan of common life as this, and Basil now asked Gregory to join him. He answered that he had not kept the promise to live together and lead an ascetic life (συνέσεσθαι σοι καὶ συμπιλοσοφῆσαι), because the higher claim of filial duties overrode it, but proposed to Basil that he should join them at the Tiberine, where the ascetic life in common could be followed, and the duties of home performed (Ep. 1, Opera, ii. 1). Basil did visit Arianzus, but remained only a short time. From Caesareia he again wrote to Gregory. The letter is lost, but we have the reply, fencing a playful raillery on Arianzus in the same style (Ep. ii., Opera, ii. 3). More letters of a like nature were exchanged (Ep. iv.-v., Opera, ii. 3-5), and after one from Basil describing the beauties of the place, and another describing the nature of the life and work, Gregory set out for Pontus. He was no drone in the busy hive. First in intellectual study and spiritual service, he was no less so in self-denial and in manual labour (Ep. vi., Opera, ii. 6). One substantial result of their joint labours is preserved to us in the Philocalia, a series of extracts from the exegetical works of Origen. Gregory himself speaks of this work, which he sent as a present to his friend Theodosius of Tyana (Ep. cxv., Opera, ii. 103). We know from Gregory's own words also that he took part in composing the famous "Rules" of Basil [BASILUS, p. 285, col. 1]. It is not clear how long he remained in Pontus. Clemencet thinks it was two or three years, and the supposition agrees with the general course of events, and with Gregory's regret that he had but tasted enough of the life there to excite his longing for more (Orat. ii. 6, Opera, i. 14). The silence of Gregory with regard to his return may be due to another cause. Constantius had required the bishops throughout the empire to accept the creed of Rimini (A.D. 359-60), and the bishop of Nazianzus, though hitherto faithful to the Nicene doctrine, did so. The monks of his diocese were devoted to Athanasius, and there followed a division in the church, which Gregory alone could heal. To his father he was acceptable as a known theologian, and the father's sin had indeed been one of ignorance rather than one of wilful heresy. To the monks he was acceptable as almost one of themselves. He induced the bishop to make a public confession of orthodoxy, and delivered a sermon on the occasion (Orat. vi., Opera, i. 179 seq.). If this division at Nazianzus occurred in A.D. 360, we have the reason of Gregory's return. (Tillemont, Mémoires, ix. 345; Schroekh, Kirch. Gesch. xiii. 287; Ullmann, Gregorius von Nazianz. s. 41.) If with Clemencet and others (Opera, i. pp. xciv. seq.) it is assigned to the year 363-4, under Julian or Jovian, rather than under Constantius, we must suppose that the return was due to the claim of filial duties which was again felt binding. In any case he came to Nazianzus, and received letters from Basil asking him to return to Pontus. Again there was an interchange of playful letters, followed by more serious ones. Gregory in reality depended on communion with Basil more than upon the air he breathed (Ep. vi. ad fr. Opera, ii. p. 6). His desire to return was soon to be fulfilled. The aged bishop felt the need of support and help, and no one could so fitly give it as his own son. He resolved therefore to overrule the scruples which made Gregory shrink from the responsibilities of the priesthood. We know that the ordination occurred on one of the high festivals, and it was probably at Christmas, A.D. 361 (Nicetas, ii. 1021; Tillemont, Mémoires, ix. 352). Nicetas assumes that the congregation was aware of the bishop's intention, and that they compelled Gregory to accept ordination. Such forced ordinations were not unknown (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. iv. 2-5, and ix. 7, 1). Basil was in the same way made priest. But Gregory speaks of it in the calm of later years as tyranny, for he can give to it no other name—

οὕτω μὲν οὖν ἤλγησα τῇ τυραννίδι
οὕτω γὰρ ἄλλως τοῦτο καλεῖν ἰσχύω καὶ μοι τὸ θεῖον πνεῦμα συγγνωσκέτω οὕτως ἔχοντι.

(Carm. xi. de Vita sua, 345-348; Opera, ii.

The father had known fully the wishes of the son, and the latter felt he could not bear the tyranny; but, as an ox goaded by some savage sting, fled from home and relatives, and went once more to Pontus to receive consolation from his friend (ibid. 350-356). But here once more the voice of duty is heard. It is no longer only the voice of a father speaking to his son, it is also that of a bishop speaking to a priest. Ordained at Christmas, he preached in the church at Nazianzus on Easter-day of the following year. The sermon was but a short address, in which he presses the duty of mutual forgiveness as becoming the holy season. "The act was one of tyranny—he cannot forget that; but it was tyranny honourably exercised and honourably borne. There was a time for holding back as Moses and Jeremiah did; there was a time for coming forward as Aaron and Isaiah did. The bishop built the magnificent temple in which they worshipped, and, like Abraham, offered his son to God. Let them all devote themselves to God that day" (Orat. i., Opera, i. 3-6). Gregory had expected that a crowded church would have welcomed his return and have applauded his first sermon; but though it was the festival of Easter, the church was almost deserted. At the time he bore this without complaint; but during the same festival he did not hesitate to express his disappointment and surprise. "Their conduct was like that of the guests invited to the marriage-supper (Matt. xxii. 2; Luke xiv. 16), and indeed worse, for they were neither strangers nor invited guests, but they had invited him to that church and feast, and were not present to welcome their guest" (Orat. iii., Opera, i. 68-72). Gregory could not be ignorant of the cause of this estrangement. His flight from the work of the priesthood demanded an explanation before the church of Nazianzus, and before the wide circle of his friends. In proportion to the hopes of earlier years must have been their disappointment now. The question was of too great importance to be considered settled by the short sermon which he had preached at Easter; on all sides a full answer was expected, and Gregory determined to give an answer worthy of the question and of himself. It is contained in the second oration (Opera, i. ii. 65). In no part of his writings do we find proof of greater study. From its length and form we may feel sure that the biographers are right in thinking that in its present shape it was never intended for, and never delivered from, the pulpit. It is practically a treatise on the pastoral office, and forms the foundation of Chrysostom's de Sacerdotio and of the Cura Pastoralis of Gregory the Great, while writers in all ages have directly or indirectly drawn largely from it. Benoît notes that Bossuet is much indebted to it for his celebrated panegyric on St. Paul (Greg. de Naz. p. 138). It is formally divided into two parts, the earlier of which treats of the reasons for his flight, and the latter gives those which led him to return. "He fled because (1) he was wholly unprepared for the ordination, and it came like a sudden thunder-clap, which deprives men of their reason, upon a man who had always been of a retiring nature (Orat. ii. 6); (2) he had always been attracted by the monastic life, and in time of greatest danger had devoted himself to it (ib.); (3) he was ashamed of the life and character of the mass of the clergy. There were some men who had called themselves to the holy office—Is Saul also among the prophets? (ib. 8); (4) he did not at that time, he did not now—and this reason weighed with him most of all—think himself fit to rule the flock of Christ and govern the minds of men" (ib. 9). From this fourth and chief reason he is led on to consider the duties and difficulties of the true pastor, and discusses them in forty sections of the discourse (10-49, pp. 17-58). "It is difficult to obey, much more difficult to rule, especially in the kingdom of God. The pastor's blemish is quickly, his virtue but slowly, communicated to his flock. It is too little that a shepherd should be free from positive sin; he ought to excel in virtue. It is a fault in the man who leads, if he is not a leader. To drive the flock is tyrannical, and that which is exacted by force is never lasting. Man is the most various and complex of beings; to govern him is the art of arts, and science of sciences. The medicine of souls is more subtle than that of bodies. The soul is joined to the body, (1) that, by wrestling with lower elements, it may gain the inheritance of glory, as gold is purified by fire; (2) that it may ennoble the body, and assimilate it to its own nature; that what God is to the soul, this the soul may become to the body. A physician takes note of localities, climates, age of his patient, and such like things. The spiritual physician must note all individual characteristics, that the body may become subject to the soul. The chief difficulties are that men are opposed to the healing of the soul, and seek to hide and excuse their sins, and turn a deaf ear to and hate their physician. Further, in spiritual diseases the diagnosis is more difficult, as none of the symptoms are patent. In spiritual and temporal alike, unpleasant medicines are often profitable. The end aimed at is to give wings to the soul, and wean it from the world. The law tended to this, but Christ is the end of the law. For this reason God was joined to man by an intervening soul, and Christ took upon Him the whole nature, that He might heal the whole nature. The whole Incarnation is the medicine of the soul, and priests are the ministers of this medicine. Physicians never spare themselves, and they seek to prolong even useless lives. Pastors have a difficult task on account of the carelessness of those who need healing, and their varied states, habits, and positions; for men differ more in character than they do in form. Minds, then, like bodies, require individual treatment; some precept, some example; some the rein, some the spur; some to be encouraged by praise, some checked by blame; some we must watch carefully even in trifles, some we must seem never to observe lest we drive them to despair. The same persons, again, require various medicines at various times; and these can only be known as the moment for their use occurs. The mind cannot frame them, nor discourse tell them. To the medical mind they will be plain. Great danger occurs from want of moral worth or skill in the pastor. His first duty is to preach the Word, and this is so difficult that to fulfil it ideally would require universal knowledge. Then, theological knowledge is absolutely necessary, especially of the doctrine of the Trinity, lest he fall into the Atheism of Sabellius, or the Judaism of Arius, or the Polytheism too common among the orthodox. It is necessary to hold to the truth that there is one God, and to confess that there are three persons, and attributes proper to each; but for this there is need of the Spirit's help. Much more is it difficult to expound it to a popular audience, both from the preacher's imperfection and the people's want of preparation. Zeal which is not according to knowledge leads men away from the truth. Then, there is the desire of vainglory, with inexperience, and her constant attendant, rashness, inconstancy, based on ignorance of the Scripture; and a subjective eclecticism which ends in an uncertain creed, and leads men to doubt of truth, as if a blind or deaf man were to place the evil not in himself but in the light of the sun or the voice of his friend. It is more easy to instruct minds wholly ignorant than those which have received teaching which is false; but the work of weeding, as well as that of sowing, must be done. The work of a spiritual ruler is like that of a man trying to manage a herd of beasts, old and young, wild and tame. He must, therefore, be single in will to rule the whole body, manifold to govern each member of it. Then some must be fed with milk; some with more solid food. For all this who is sufficient? There are spiritual hucksters who adulterate the word of truth; but it is better to be led than to lead others, and to learn than attempt to teach what one does not know. Men are foolish if they do not know their own ignorance; rash, if they know it, and yet lightly undertake this work. The Jews did not allow young men to read all parts of the Scriptures; but in the church there is no such bound placed between teaching and learning. A mere boy, who does not know the very names of the sacred writings, if he can babble a few pious words, and these caught by hearing, not by reading, becomes a teacher. Men spend more time and pains in learning to dance or play the flute, than teachers of things divine and human spend in studying them. The love of vainglory is at the root of this evil. The true ideal is to be found in the lives of disciples like Peter or Paul, who became all things to all men that they might gain some. The false teachers incur great danger, and the pastor's sin causes the public woe. The prophets dwelt on the fearful position of the shepherds who feed themselves; the apostles and Christ Himself taught what the true shepherds should be; and His condemnation of Scribes and Pharisees includes all false teachers. Day and night did these thoughts possess Gregory. He was aware of the objections of priests that the candle should be placed on the candlestick, and the talent not hidden; but no time of preparation for the priesthood can be too long, and haste is full of danger. He dreaded both its duties and its dignity. The priest is to the soul as the friend at the marriage, but he himself was rather in danger of being cast out as not having on a wedding garment. He was not fitted to rule the flock in the evil days in which his lot was cast, for the confusion in the church could only be compared to the din of a battle by night or an engagement at sea; and as it was with the people so it was with the priests. He feared no external warfare, not even the wild beast then devouring the church—that devil's complement (τοῦ πονηροῦ τὸ πλῆρωμα, § 87, Opera, i. 53 D)—Julian. The internal warfare he did fear, and fled before it. God's grace alone could give strength to overcome in it; and a man could not mediate between God and men—and this was the priest's work—whose own soul was not cleansed. He had learnt from the examples of Moses and of Nadab and Abihu how fearful a thing it was to draw near to God. Christ was the divine sacrifice and high-priest. The human priest ought, therefore, to be wholly consecrated as a temple of the living God. He who has not learned to speak the hidden wisdom of God, and to bear the cross of Christ, should not enter upon the priesthood. For himself he would prefer a private life. A great man ought to undertake great things; a small man small things. Only that man can build the tower who has wherewith to build it." Such are the reasons which Gregory gives for his flight. He adds those which led to his return. "(1) The longing which he had for them and which he saw that they had for him; (2) the white hairs and feeble limbs of his holy parents—the father who was to him as an angel, and the mother to whom he owed also his spiritual birth. There is a time for yielding as for everything else; (3) the example of the prophet Jonah—and this weighed most with him, for every letter of Scripture is inspired for our use—who deserved pardon, but he himself would not if he still refused. The denunciations of disobedience in Holy Scripture are no less severe than those against the unworthy pastor. On either side is danger. The middle is the only safe course—not to seek the priesthood, nor yet to refuse it. There is a merit in obedience; but for disobedience there is hardly any remedy. Some holy men are more, others less, forward to undertake rule. Neither are to be blamed." The discourse ends with Gregory's own submission, with a prayer for his father's blessing, and an invocation of blessing upon the bishop and his church.

Such is in outline the famous "Τὸ εἰς Ἀβροῦ Ἀπολογητικόν." A full summary of it shews at once what was the discourse, and what the man who penned it. Did it alone remain to us, Gregory must still have been thought of as one of the four pillars of the Greek church, and we should still read the chief traits of his personal character. This sermon was written in A.D. 362. Julian the Apostate had entered Constantinople on Dec. 11, A.D. 361. His history is told elsewhere. [JULIANUS.] It concerns us here only as it crosses the life of Gregory. The first reference to it is in a letter to his brother Caesarius, who had been persuaded by Julian to remain at court, written early in A.D. 362. Gregory was at the time with Basil, who had indignantly rejected like advances, and he blushes that the son of a bishop should accept them. It made their father weary of life, and the fact had to be hidden from their mother (Ep. vii., Opera, ii. 7). What the effect of this letter was upon Caesarius we may judge from his declaration before Julian: "In a word, I am a Christian, and I mean to be one," and from the exclamation of the emperor: "O happy father of such unhappy children!" (Orat. vii. 13, Opera, i. 206; cf. De Broglie, Constantine, ii. 207). Gregory esteemed the victory of Caesarius as a more precious gift than the half of the empire (Orat. vii. 14, ad init.). Yet that letter was meant for no eye but the brother's. The agony of that Christian family at Nazianzus tells what influences moulded Gregory's character; his expression of it tells what was the character which was moulded. But Julian had bitter revenge in store. He, the old fellow-student of Basil and Gregory, and pupil of Proaeresius, ordered that no Christian should teach profane literature. For Gregory this had the effect that he composed many of the poems which we now possess, and which were meant probably as reading-books for Christian schools. It helped to cause another effect. Towards the end of the year 363 or the beginning of 364, he wrote the two Invectives against Julian (κατὰ Ἰουλιανοῦ βασιλέως Σηληνευτικὸς πρῶτος, Orat. iv., Opera, i. 78-147 . . . δεύτερος, Orat. v.; ibid. 147-175). The emperor had fallen, pierced by an arrow, in the previous June. The orator intended by these philippics to hold him up to heaven and earth as the sum of all that was vile. In the first sentence he is called "the dragon, the apostate, the Assyrian, the common enemy, the great mind" (la. x. 12, LXX); and this sentence is the keynote of the whole. Words which may well seem to us more than sufficient to picture in darkest colours any character, seem to the orator wholly inadequate to represent that of Julian. He longs for "the eloquence of Herodotus or Thucydides that he may hand down his iniquity to all future time" (Orat. iv. 92, Opera, i. 126 A). The discourses, which are regarded as two by the editors, form clearly but two parts of one whole. In the earlier the object is to sketch the life and character of Julian; in the later his death is set forth as an example of God's judgment upon sinners. By writers who regard Gregory as a saint, every sentence of these orations is justified, though they have considerable difficulty in extracting from some of them the odour of sanctity. Looked at dispassionately, they remind one rather of Demosthenes or Cicero than of a Christian bishop; and as we listen to the impetuous torrent of words which only stop in their course to call down fire from heaven, other words are suggested which still seem to say, "Ye know not what spirit ye are of." As orations they are worthy to stand by the side of any of either ancient or modern times, but even when we remember that they were never intended for the pulpit, we feel that they have little right to stand by the side of the orations of Gregory the Divine. The worshippers of the saint find the invective against Julian much more easy to explain than the panegyric of the Arian Constantius, which these discourses contain. He is "the most divine and Christ-loving of emperors, and his great soul is summoned from heaven. The sin of his life was the inhuman humanity (τὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων φιλανθρωπία) which spared Julian" (Orat. iv. 34 seq., Opera, i. 93 seq.). Gregory, indeed, speaks elsewhere of three things of which Constantius repented when dying: (1) the murder of his relations; (2) that he had named Julian Caesar; (3) that he had given himself to the dogma of the newer creed (Orat. xxi. 26; Opera, i. 403 a). And yet he is conscious that the emperor gave his support to impiety, and framed laws against the orthodox doctrine (Orat. xxv. 9, Opera, i. 461 a); nor could he have been unconscious that it was at the hands of Euzoius that baptism was administered to the penitent. When the force of every explanation is admitted, the fact remains that the character of Constantius is an oratorical pendant to that of Julian; and that the one is simply a whitened background, on which the blackened blackness of the other may be seen.

While Gregory was thus employed at Nazianzus, Basil returned from Pontus to Caesarea, where Eusebius had been made bishop, and was ordained against his will. He informed his friend of this, and Gregory replied in a letter which is important as marking his thoughts about the position in which both he and Basil had been placed. "Now the thing is done it is necessary to fulfil one's duty—such at least is the way in which I look at it—especially in the present distress, when many tongues of heretics are raised against us, and not to disappoint the hopes of those who have put their faith in us and in our past life" (Ep. viii., Opera, ii. 8). A difference arose ere long between Eusebius and Basil. The grounds of it are not known to us, and Gregory thought it better that they should not be (Orat. xliii. 28, Opera, i. 792); and the difference itself claims notice at this place only because it introduces Gregory in the character of peacemaker. The warm friend of Basil, he was no less an admirer of the bishop, and an advocate for the rights of authority. Invited by the bishop to fill the place made vacant by the retirement of Basil to Pontus, he does not hesitate to assert that the treatment of Basil was unjust, and to demand reconciliation with his friend as the price of his own influence (Epp. xvi.–xx., Opera, ii. 16). An indignant reply from Eusebius served only to call forth stronger letters from the same standpoint (Epp. xvii. and xviii., Opera, ii. 17, 18), and these are followed by an equally plain letter to Basil, telling him that Eusebius was disposed to be reconciled to him, and urging him to be first in the victory of submission (Ep. xix. ibid.). The result was that Basil returned to Caesarea, and gave his powerful aid to the bishop in the dangers which were threatening the church, or rather became bishop in reality, while Eusebius was still so in name,—“the keeper of the lion, the leader of the leader” (Orat. xliii. 33, Opera, i. 796). When peace was thus established Gregory returned again to Nazianzus. Here new troubles awaited him. Caesarius had been chosen by Valens to be treasurer of Bithynia, and once more his brother was distressed at seeing him among the servants of an adversary of the true faith. On Oct. 11, 368, the city of Nicaea was almost destroyed by an earthquake, and Gregory made this the ground of an earnest appeal to Caesarius to abandon his office (Ep. xx., Opera, ii. p. 19). He was on the point of yielding when he was cut off by sudden death. The funeral oration which was delivered by Gregory is placed by Jerome first in the list of the orator's celebrated works (Catal. Scrip. Eccles. 117). It narrates, in the language of fraternal love, the deeds of a noble life, and seeks in that of Christian submission to console his parents and his friends (Orat. vii., Opera, 198, et seq.). Sixteen epitaphs also remain to shew how often a brother's love mourned its loss (Epit. vi.–xxi., Opera, ii. 1111–1115). The death of Caesarius brought other troubles to Gregory, arising from the administration of his estate which had been left to the poor. Against extortioners who tried to seize it he appealed to his friend Sophronius, prefect of Constantinople (Ep. xxix., Opera, ii. 24); and his troubles gave occasion also to the kind offices of Basil. He himself tells us plaintively how he would gladly have fled these business worries, but that he felt it his duty to share the burden of them with his father (Carm. xi. 375–380, Opera, ii. 695). About the same time another shadow of darkness was cast upon the house at Nazianzus by the death of Gorgonia, and once again the orator delivered a funeral discourse of most touching gracefulness (Orat. viii., Opera, i. 218 et seq.).

These sorrows weighed heavily on the spirit of Gregory, and side by side with the public discourses in which he sought to console others, we have the private poems which shew how hard he found it to console himself. “Already his whitening hairs shew his grief, and his stiffening limbs are inclining to the evening of a sad day” (Carm. de Rebus suis, i. 177–306, Opera, ii. 641 et seqq.). In A.D. 370 Eusebius died in the arms of Basil, who at once invited Gregory to Caesarea on the plea that he was himself in extremis. The latter regarded the plea as a pretext, and in the tone of mingled affection and reproach declined to go until after the election of the archbishop (Ep. xl. Opera, ii. 34). The invitation to the bishop of Nazianzus to be present at the election was answered, as all the editors with almost certainty judge, by the hands of the son. He dwells upon the importance of the position and the special qualifications for it possessed by Basil, and promises his assistance if they propose to elect him (Ep. xli., Opera, ii. 35). He wrote also to Eusebius of Samosata by the hands of the deacon Eustathius, urging him to go to Caesarea and promote Basil's election (Ep. xlii., Opera, ii. 37). Eusebius yielded to this request, but the vote of the aged bishop of Nazianzus was also needed. An illness from which he was suffering disappeared as soon as he started. The son thought it prudent to remain at home, but sent by his father's hand a letter to Eusebius, expressing his esteem and excusing his absence, and referring to the miracle of his father's restored health (Ep. xlv., Opera, ii. 39). He did not go even after the election, but contented himself at first with writing letters which witness alike to his wisdom and his affection (Epp. xlv. and xlv., Opera, ii. 40, 41). When the storm had subsided he went in person, but declined the position of first among the presbyters, or probably that of coadjutor bishop (ἡγεμὼν τῆς καθέδρας τυχόν, Orat. xliii. 39, Opera, i. 801), which Basil offered him. Yet the position which he formally declined was in reality accepted. In the opposition caused by the malcontent bishops who were defeated in the election, and in the persecution organized by the prefect Modestius at the command of Valens, Gregory was foremost as a personal friend and as a defender of the faith (Socrat. iv. 11).

In the year 370 Valens made a civil division of Cappadocia into two provinces, and in 372 Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, claimed equal rights with the bishop of Caesarea, i.e. the rights of metropolitan of Cappadocia Secunda, of which Tyana was the capital. Basil resisted this claim, which was the more galling to him, as he himself had been the main cause that Tyana was chosen as the capital instead of Podandus. In this difficulty Gregory, who had returned to Nazianzus, again offered, in a letter full of affectionate admiration (Ep. xlvii., Opera, ii. 40), to visit and support his friend, and went to Caesarea. After his arrival they proceeded together to the foot of Mount Taurus in Cappadocia Secunda, where was a chapel dedicated to St. Orestes, and where the people of those parts were accustomed to pay their tithes in kind. On their return they found the mountain-passes at Sasima guarded by followers of Anthimus. A struggle took place, and Gregory implies that he was personally injured in it (Carin. xi. 453, Opera, ii. 699). He seems soon afterwards to have returned to Nazianzus, whither he was followed by Basil, who had resolved (by way of securing his own rights) to make Sasima a bishopric, and Gregory the first bishop. In this plan he was aided by the elder Gregory, and the son yielded against his own will (Orat. ix., Opera, i. 234-8). At the last moment he sought refuge in flight, but was pursued by Basil, and at length consecrated (Orat. x., Opera, i. 239-41). But still he put off the duties of his see, until Basil sent Gregory of Nyssa to urge that he should enter upon them. He now attempted to do so, but Anthimus was again prepared to resist by an armed force, and Gregory finally abandoned duties which he had never willingly accepted. Basil wrote to him a letter of reproach, and he replied in the same tone. "He would not fight with the warlike Anthimus, for he was himself little experienced in war, and liable to be wounded, and one, moreover, who preferred repose. Why should he fight for sucking-pigs and chickens, which after all were not his own, as if it were a question of souls and of canons? And why should he rob the metropolis of the illustrious Sasima" (Ep. xlviii., Opera, ii. 44). The "illustrious Sasima" must be described in the words of the poem, De Vita sua: "On a much frequented road of Cappadocia, at a point where it is divided into three, is a halting-place, where is neither water nor grass, nor any mark of civilisation. It is a frightful and detestable little village. Everywhere you meet nothing but dust, noises, waggons, howls, groans, petty officials, instruments of torture, chains. The whole population consists of foreigners and travellers. Such was my church of Sasima" (Carin. xi. 439-446, Opera, ii. 696). Other letters were exchanged, but Gregory was convinced that the bishopric of Sasima was not the work to which he was called, and nothing could change his determination. Under the pressure of his father's wish and words he was at length prevailed upon to leave the mountains, whither he had fled for refuge, and to become coadjutor at Nazianzus. But this step did not deliver him from the quarrel between Basil and Anthimus, for Nazianzus was in the new province of Cappadocia Secunda, and the bishop of Tyana soon found it convenient to visit the Gregories, and seek to gain them to his cause. They were firm in their attachment to Basil, but Anthimus then asked the son to interfere between Basil and himself, and to seek a conference. The option of having one at all, the time and place if one was resolved upon, all was left to Basil's will, and yet he felt injured, and expressed his dissatisfaction at Gregory's conduct. The latter felt and said, in plain terms, "that his friend was puffed up by his new dignity, and unmindful of what was due to others. He had himself offended Anthimus by his firm Basilism (Βασιλισμὸν). Was it just that Basil should be offended for the same reason?" (Ep. l., Opera, ii. 44). He soon gave further proof of affection in the active part which he took in the election of Eulalius as bishop of Iconia, and in a remonstrance on the subject of Basil's teaching, which he felt was due from his friendship. He had heard men cavil at Basil's orthodoxy, and assert that he did not hold the Divinity of the Third Person in the Trinity; and humbly asked him, for the sake of silencing his detractors—he himself had heard so often that there could not be room for doubt—to express in definite words what he held as the true doctrine (Ep. lviii., Opera, ii. 50). Basil's reply shewed that he did not accept the friendly letter in the spirit which dictated it. Gregory saw from the reply that it had given pain, in spite of his care. Yet he submits, and is willing to place himself entirely in Basil's hands (Ep. lix., Opera, ii. 53).

The year 373 was an "annus mirabilis" for Nazianzus, which called forth two remarkable discourses from Gregory. An epidemic among their cattle, a season of drought, and a destructive tempest in harvest reduced the people to absolute poverty. They rushed in their need to the church, and compelled Gregory to address them. The discourse seemed to have been an impromptu. The preacher "regrets that he is the constrained speaker rather than his father—that the stream is made to flow while the fountain is dry—and then urges that divine punishments are all in mercy, and that human sins are the ordinary causes of public woes;" then plainly puts before his hearers special sins which belonged to their own city, and invites them to penitence and change of life (Orat. xvi., Opera, i. 299). The inability of the inhabitants to pay the ordinary imperial taxes led to an insurrection in Nazianzus. At the approach of the prefect with a body of troops they took refuge in the church, and he himself consented to listen to the pleading of Gregory in their behalf. While the Invective against Julian reminds us of the Philippics or the De Corona, we have here an oration which has justly been placed, without injury in the comparison, by the side of the Pro Ligario or Pro Marcello, or Chrysostom's plea for Eutropius or Flavian (Benoît, p. 355). The first part points the afflicted people to the true source of comfort; the second is addressed to princes and magistrates. "The prefect was subject to the authority of the teacher, which was higher than his own. Did he wield the sword? it was for Christ. Was he God's image? so were the poor suffering people. The most divine thing was to do good; let him not lose the opportunity. Did he see the white hair of the aged bishop, and think of his long unblemished priesthood, whom, it may be, the very angels found worthy of homage (λατρείας), and did not that move him?" "I adjure you by the name of Christ, by Christ's emptying Himself for us, by the sufferings of Him who cannot suffer, by His cross, by the nails which have delivered me from sin, by His death and burial, resurrection and ascension; and lastly, by this common table where we sit together, and by these symbols of my salvation, which I consecrate with the same mouth that addresses to you this prayer—in the name, I say, of this sacred mystery which lifts us up to heaven!" He concluded by praying "that the prefect may find for himself such a judge as he should be for them, and that all meet with merciful judgment here and hereafter" (Orat. xvii., Opera, i. 317 et seq.). At the commencement of the year 374 the elder Gregory died, and the son delivered a discourse, at which his mother Nonna, and his friend Basil were present, and which was the eulogy at once of both his parents and of his friend (Orat. xviii., Opera, i. 327). Nonna survived her husband for a few months only, and died as she knelt beside the Holy Table. No less than thirty-five epitaphs were devoted by Gregory to her memory (Epit. lxxv.-c., Opera, ii. 1183-49). The brother and sister were already dead. The father and mother, though spared for a hundred years, were now dead. Gregory was left alone. His first care was to devote the whole of the large fortune which had come to him to the poor, keeping for himself only a small plot of land at Arianzus; and then to invite the bishops to elect a successor to the see. The fear that the church would be rent by heresy at length induced him to exercise the office temporarily. About the middle of the year 374 Eusebius of Samosata was banished to Thrace, and we learn from a letter from Gregory that he longed to see the exiled bishop on his way, but was prevented by illness, which confined him to his house (Ep. lxxiv., Opera, ii. 58). During the same illness he wrote similar letters of affectionate consolation to the proconsul Eutropius, who had incurred the displeasure of the emperor (Epp. lxx. lxxi., Opera, ii. 62-3). The illness did not last long, and after a visit to Tyana, whence he wrote to Julian, the newly-appointed collector of tribute, to ask that the clergy may be exempted (Ep. lxxvii., Opera, ii. 60), we find him again preaching at Nazianzus in the presence of Julian. The sermon is entitled εἰς τοὺς λόγους, καὶ εἰς τὸν ἐξισωτὴν Ἰουλιανόν (Orat. xix., Opera, i. 364 et seq.). For two reasons he had resolved not to preach at Nazianzus again—(1) That he may cause them to elect a successor to his father in the episcopacy; and (2) That by his silence he may check the mania for theological discussion, which was spreading through the Eastern church, and which was leading everybody to teach the things of the Spirit without the Spirit (διδάσκειν τε καὶ λαλεῖν τὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος χωρὶς Πνεύματος, ibid. 364 c). They demanded discourses from him as a tribute which he was not willing to pay, but now Julian, who had sought his counsels, joined in the demand, and made compliance a condition of exemptions being granted to the clergy. The demand could no longer be resisted, and it was met by a supreme effort of eloquence, which dwelt on "the vanity of all things earthly, and exhorted each man to devote to God whatever he possessed—wealth, poverty, the will to do good, the active or the contemplative life, discourse or silence, virginity, temperance, prayer, hymns, care for the poor. God accepts the least offering as the greatest, and it is the duty of each to offer what he has, for the disposition gives value to the offering." He concludes by "presenting to Julian the poor, the priests, the monks, and exhorts him and the people to mutual forbearance." For the last time he appeared before them as temporary holder of the see.

Two years had passed since the bishop's death, and in vain had Gregory pressed the election of a successor. His love of retirement was now, as all through life, a powerful influence, and it was strengthened by the difficulty of his position as practically occupying—though he had determined not to occupy—an important see, after he had refused to be bishop of Sasima. Towards the end of the year 375 he disappeared suddenly, and found refuge at Seleucia in Isauria, at a monastery devoted to the virgin Thecla (Carm. xi. 549, Opera, ii. 701). Here he passed three years of which we have no record. What they would be the earlier life tells us; what they were the later work at Constantinople declares. They were as the intervals of calm in every great life, when principles are formed and resolutions taken which become the hidden spring of noble deeds.

In the beginning of the year 379 Basil died, and we find Gregory writing to comfort his brother Gregory of Nyssa. He could neither visit Basil in illness, nor be present at his funeral, for he was himself dangerously ill at the time (Ep. lxxvi., Opera, ii. 65), but his love found expression in twelve epitaphs. These are printed by the Benedictine editors under one number (Epit. cxix., Opera, ii. 1155-9), but the points of division are clear, and the last lines are:—

τῶν ἐπιγραμματικῶν τῆς δευτερείας.

A letter from Gregory to Eudocius the rhetorician, written soon afterwards, speaks of "the loss of all who were nearest to him, and of Basil, his spiritual brother, and of death as the only deliverance from the ills which weighed upon him" (Ep. lxxx., Opera, ii. 72).

But the time was at hand which was to witness the chief work of his life. At the date of the Nicæan council Alexander was bishop of Constantinople, and signed the decrees which condemned Arius. He was succeeded by Paul, who, in devotion to the true faith, was the rival of Athanasius himself, and suffered martyrdom in A.D. 351. For thirty years after the death of Paul, Constantinople was the battle-ground of a constant war with heresy. The followers of Manes and Novatus, Photinus and Marcellus, Sabellius and Apollinarius, were to be found there in large numbers; and the adherents of the Nicene faith, few in number, humiliated, crushed, having neither church nor pastor, were obliged to conceal themselves in the remote quarters of the city (Benoit, Grég. de Naz. p. 397). In this distress they applied to Gregory to help them, and many bishops urged their plea. For a long time he was unwilling to leave his retirement, but then came to him the old feeling that there was a time to yield and a time to resist, and the conviction that he dared not refuse this summons. The date of his arrival at Constantinople cannot be fixed with certainty, but it was probably before Easter, A.D. 379 (Tillemont, Mémoires, ix. 799). A prayer, which took the form of a poem, indicates the spirit with which he entered upon his new work (Carm. iii.; Opera ii. 667). In another poem he has left us his estimate of what that work in the new Rome was. "It had passed through the death of infidelity; there was left but one last breath of life. He had come to this city to defend the faith. What they needed was solid teaching to deliver them from the spider-webs of subtleties in which they had been taken" (Carm. xi. 562-611, Opera, ii. 705, 6). In a private house, where he himself was lodged by relations, his work was begun. He speaks of this as "the new Shiloh, where the ark was fixed after its forty years of wandering in the desert (Orat. xlii. 26, Opera, i. 766), as the holy mountain where the ark of Noah rested"

(Carm. xi. 1080-2, Opera, ii. 731). It was to him "an Anastasia, the scene of the resurrection of the faith" (Orat. xlii. 26, Carm. xi. 1079, ib.), for the house was too small for the multitudes that flocked to it, and a church was built in its place. Gregory's fame, as a theologian, rests chiefly on the discourses delivered at the Anastasia. It will be convenient to examine them later, and to note them here only in relation with the incidents of his life. His first work was to gather the scattered members of the flock and instruct them in the practical duties of Christianity, and the danger of empty theological discussions, and the pre-requisite for any true knowledge of God (Carm. xi. 1210-31, Opera, ii. 737-9). Again and again in the early discourses does he dwell on the truth that it is only through personal holiness that a man can grasp any idea of the Holy One (Orat. xx. and Orat. xxii., Opera, i. 376-384, and 597-603). While doing this work, Gregory exposed himself to the attacks of all parties. His origin, person, clothing, were made objects of ridicule. They would have welcomed a polished orator with external graces; but his manner of life had made him prematurely old, and his gifts to the poor had made him in appearance and reality a poor man. From words they passed to deeds. One night, a mob, led on by monks, broke into the place of meeting and profaned the altar and sacred elements. Gregory himself escaped, but was taken before the judges as a homicide; "but He who knew how to save from the lions was present to deliver him" (Carm. xi. 665-78, Opera, ii. 709). "He cared not that they attacked him—the stones were his delight; he cared only for the flock who were thus injured" (ib. 725, et seq.). His chief sorrow was to come not from any outward opposition but from a division in the flock itself. This division started from the schism of Antioch, which had spread through the whole church; but the immediate question was one of competition for the bishopric. Gregory had kept aloof from this quarrel, but some among his followers, led by one of his priests, took an active part in it, and endeavoured to draw from him a decision for one or other of the rivals. Some seem to have taken the part of Paulinus, some that of Meletius. Gregory, therefore, taking occasion from the greeting, "Peace be with you," and "Peace be with thy spirit," preached a sermon on Peace (Orat. xxii., Opera, i. 414-425), dwelling "on its blessings, and the inconsistency of their faith, servants of the God of peace as they claimed to be, and their practice. Their duty was to remain united when the faith was not in question; to weaken the present struggle by keeping out of it, and thus to do the rivals a greater service than by fighting for them" (ib. 14, p. 423). Soon afterwards the news of the establishment of peace reached Constantinople, and was followed by peace in the little church of the Anastasia. Gregory, though ill, preached almost certainly on this occasion another sermon on peace (Orat. xxiii., Opera, i. 425-34), thankfully celebrating its return, and urging those present who were divided from them by heresy "to be at peace with them by acceptance of the true faith. It was the work of the sacred Trinity to give the faithful "peace among themselves. The sacred Trinity would heal also this wider breach." At the close of this sermon he promises to deal more fully with the questions at issue between the followers of the Nicene faith and their opponents. This he did in the five theological discourses which soon followed (Orat. xxvii.-xxxi., Opera, i. 487-577; vide infra, c. ii.). Other important discourses belong to the same period, of which the most remarkable are a second on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, preached at Whitsuntide A.D. 381 (?) (Orat. xli., Opera, ii. 731-44), and one on Moderation in Discussions—a frequent subject with Gregory—in which heresy is traced to its absence, and on the fact that it is not given to every man or every time to reason about God (Orat. xxxii., Opera, ii. 579-601). About the same period, too, he delivered three (?) discourses of another kind, which gave signal opportunity for oratorical power, and have become models for the great preachers who have chosen as their themes the lives of saints. The subjects of Gregory's panegyrics were Cyprian, whose name was held in deserved honour in Constantinople (Orat. xxiv., Opera, i. 437-50); Athanasius, whose memory was specially dear to Gregory as the champion of Nicene orthodoxy, and who had died but a few years before (A.D. 373) (Orat. xxi., Opera, i. 386-411); and the Maccabees (?) whose heroism might well have been specially intended for an example in the present struggle (Orat. xv., Opera, i. 287-298). Of the date of the last of these Clemencet says, "Quo anno quove in loco habita sit haec oratio certo definire non possumus" (ib. 286). He himself inclines to the period spent at Caesarea, but there seems no good reason for departing from the older opinion of Nicetas, which is here followed. The first of these discourses was hurriedly composed, as Gregory was in the country on the festival of St. Cyprian, and it had escaped his memory. The others, especially that on Athanasius, are considered by all judges, from the time of Jerome downwards, as among the orator's noblest works (Script. Eccles. 117).

Jerome himself became about this time a disciple of Gregory; and the pupil loved to tell how much he had learned from the teacher. He says of him "Eo magistro gloriator et exulto;" "Gregorius, vir eloquentissimus, praeceptor meus a quo Scripturas explanante didici" (ibid.); "Ante annos circiter triginta cum essem Constantino-poli, et apud virum eloquentissimum Gregorium Nazianzenum, tunc ejus urbis episcopum sanctum, Scripturarum studiis erudirer" (Comm. in Isaiam, vi.). He has preserved for us Gregory's opinion of the way in which his congregation were led by mere words, and the way in which the teacher himself could playfully avoid a difficulty. Jerome asked him the meaning of the term "ἐν σαββάρῳ δευτεροπόρῳ," in St. Luke vi. 1. He replied, "I will tell you from the pulpit, and all the people will applaud. And in spite of yourself you will have learnt that of which you are now ignorant; for if you alone do not applaud, they will look upon you as a dunce" (Hieron. Ep. ad Nepot. xxxiv.).

There was another stranger who came to Constantinople, and professed himself a disciple of the now famous theologian. In the works of Gregory he is known to us as Hero, either because he bore two names, or, as Jerome, who had every opportunity of knowing, tells us, because Gregory did not wish the panegyric which he pronounced upon him to be handed down in connexion with the name Maximus. "Quasi non licuerit eundem et laudare et vituperare pro tempore" (De Vir. Illust. 117). The biography of this man will be given in its proper place [MAXIMUS]. Here we have to deal only with his connexion with Gregory, which began not long after the latter arrived at Constantinople. He represented himself as descended from a line of martyrs, and as one who had suffered much through his adherence to the Nicene faith. He was an ardent admirer of Gregory's sermons (καὶ τῶν ἐμῶν προθύμως αἰνέτης λόγων, Carm. xi. 814, Opera, ii. 716). "No one was to him as Maximus, to whom he gave lodging and food and made him the sharer of his counsels" (ibid. 808-812). The man who admired Gregory's sermons so much heard one in which his own panegyric was pronounced (Orat. xv., In Laudem Heronis Philosophi, Opera, i. 454); and the orator regarded it as a mark of a philosophic spirit that he could do so. Meanwhile the professed disciple was planning the overthrow of his teacher, and hoped even to establish himself in the episcopal chair. He had two confederates, Gregory tells us. One was an angel who had become a Belial. The other is not known by name, but is described as barbarian in mind more even than by birth, and first among the presbyters (Carm. xi. 810-827). He had a still more important ally in Peter, bishop of Alexandria, who had recognised Gregory as practically bishop of the orthodox party in Constantinople (ibid. 858-931), but—whether from jealousy at the influence he had gained, or from difference of opinion in the Meletian schism, or that he too had been deceived by the craft of Maximus as Gregory had been—now joined in the plot against him. Seven sailors, whose names Gregory has recorded (ibid. 834), were engaged as spies and sent from Egypt to Constantinople. A party of Alexandrian clergy soon followed. At this time a priest from Thasco had come to Constantinople with a large sum of money to buy Proconesian marble for a church. He, too, was beguiled by the specious hope held out to him. Maximus and his party thus gained the power of purchasing the services of a mob, which was as forward to attack Gregory as it had been to praise him. It was night, and the bishop was ill in bed, when Maximus with his followers went to the church to be consecrated by five suffragans who had been sent from Alexandria for the purpose. Day began to dawn while they were still preparing for the consecration. They had but half-finished the tonsure of the cynic philosopher, who wore the flowing hair common to his sect, when a mob, excited by the sudden news, rushed in upon them and drove them from the church. They retired to a flute-player's shop to complete their work, and Maximus, compelled to flee from Constantinople, went to Thessalonica with the hope of gaining over Theodosius himself. Repulsed by the emperor, who declared that he could recognise in Constantinople no other bishop than Gregory, he returned to Alexandria and demanded from Peter that he would find him another bishopric or relinquish his own. He was silenced by the prefect, who banished him from Alexandria. Gregory devotes more than 200 lines of the poem De Vitâ suâ (Carm. xi. 807-1029, Opera, ii. 117-29) to this painful story, and his words of condemnation are bitter in proportion as the words of his panegyric were strong.

We must probably assign to a date later than the treachery of Maximus, Gregory's sermon on the arrival of the Egyptians (Orat. xxxiv., Opera, i. 619-627). It opens by a reference to the conquest of envy by a higher zeal; and then the preacher goes on to speak of his desire to "blot out the old calumny by new kindness" (ibid. § 6, p. 621). It is quite in keeping with the orator's character to find him welcoming these Egyptian sailors to his church, and regarding them as "one with himself since they are worshippers of the same Trinity," and even uttering words of highest praise for Peter, their bishop (ibid. § 3, p. 620).

In immediate connexion with the story of Maximus, Gregory tells us that he one day uttered the words, "My beloved children, keep intact this Trinity which I, your most happy father, have delivered to you, and preserve some memorial of my labours." One of the hearers saw the meaning, and "the whole congregation was in a turmoil as that of a hive of bees at the presence of smoke." People of all ages and conditions and ranks vied with each other in cries of affection for him and hatred for his foes (Carm. xi. 1057-1113, Opera, ii. 729-731). We have no oration in which these farewell words occur, but they are probably to be regarded as part of one, and to be placed in time soon after Gregory's recovery from the illness during which the plot of Maximus was carried out. His own words shew how bitterly he felt that treachery; and bitterly did he feel also that his position was weakened by it. In spite of the cries of men, women, and children until nightfall, and the resolve that they would be buried in the temple rather than leave it until he had promised to remain with them, his determination was unchanged until one voice cried, "If you go you will banish the doctrine of the Trinity as well as yourself" (ibid. 1100). At this cry he yielded, and promised to remain until the arrival of some bishops who were expected at the council. Both parties left the church in hope—they, that their point had been carried; he, that his departure would not be long postponed. He did not, however, remain in the city. His health was shattered, and he retired for a while to the country to recruit it. On his return he commenced his first sermon with the words, "I kept longing for you, my children, and was persuaded that you in like manner kept longing for me" (Orat. xxvi., Opera, i. 471-485). This relation between the shepherd and the sheep is seen throughout the discourse, which is the loving outpouring and anxious questioning of the heart which knew their need, and knew that there were dangers without and within the flock. Near the end of the discourse (§ 15, p. 483) he refers to the bishopric of Constantinople, declaring that "no man of sense had ever longed much for it. For his own part he could wish that there was no primacy or precedence, and that one should be distinguished by virtue only."

On Nov. 24, A.D. 380, Theodosius made his formal entry into Constantinople. One of his first cares was to restore to the orthodox the churches of which they had been deprived by the Arians. Demophilus and Lucius were both banished (Socrat. Hist. Eccles. v. 7); Gregory was summoned to the imperial presence. He could hardly believe that the words would ever be fulfilled, but early on the morning of Nov. 26, in the presence of an immense crowd, Theodosius and Gregory entered the church of the Holy Apostles. A thick fog enveloped the church, but at the first accents of the chants it was illumined by the rays of the sun, which fell upon the vestments of the priests and the swords of the soldiers, and brought to Gregory's mind the glory of the Tabernacle of old. At the same time there arose a cry like thunder demanding that he should be bishop. "Silence, silence," he cried: "This is the time to give thanks to God. It will be time enough, hereafter, to settle other things." The service was continued and was ended without further interruption. Only one sword was drawn and that was put back unstained into its sheath (ibid. 1325-90). In no part of Gregory's life is the true excellence of his character more clearly seen than in this; to his spirit of moderation and forgiveness is it to be attributed that this great religious revolution was effected without shedding one drop of blood. He has himself recorded an incident which exemplifies the spirit in which he returned the enmity of his foes. While he was ill in bed an assassin who had attempted his life, entered his room, and stung by conscience, fell weeping and speechless at his feet. When Gregory learned the fact he said to him, "May God preserve you! It is nothing wonderful that I whom He hath saved should be merciful to you. Your bold deed has made you mine. Take care to walk, henceforth, worthy of God and of me." Gregory adds that the news of this deed spread through the city, which was softened towards him by it as iron is by fire (ibid. 1445-74).

Δίδωσι, φησὶ, τὸν νεῦν
Θεὸς δὲ ἡμῶν σοὶ τε καὶ τοῖς σοῖς πόντοισιν
Carm. xi. 1311, 2, Opera, ii. 742.

On a day not long after the entry into the metropolitical church—perhaps the very next day—the enthusiasm of the multitude again broke forth, and they attempted to place Gregory by force in the episcopal chair. At the same time there were traces of jealousy, and false motives were freely attributed to him. Always sensitive, he delivered in the presence of Theodosius a sermon "concerning himself, and to those who said that he wished to be bishop of Constantinople, and concerning the favours which the people had shewn towards him" (Orat. xxxvi., Opera, i. 633-43). It is a forcible "Apologia pro Vita sua." "He would have been ashamed to seek that bishopric, bowed down as he was by old age and physical weakness. They said that he had sought another's bride (Constantinople): he had really refused his own (Sasima)" (ibid. vi. pp. 638-9). But the preacher was in the presence of the emperor and the court; questions greater than any personal to himself arose to his mind, and the discourse became an eloquent appeal to princes, sages, philosophers, professors, philologists, orators, to weigh their responsibilities and fulfil their duties.

Another discourse, preached in the presence of Theodosius, is of special interest, as being the only one of Gregory's extant discourses, which is a homily in the narrower sense of being a definite exposition and application of a passage of Scripture (Orat. xxxvii., Opera, i. 644-60). The text chosen was Matt. xix. 1-12. The preacher begins by shewing that "the reason why Christ moved from place to place was that He might heal the more persons. For the salvation of the world He had moved from heaven to earth. This was the cause of His voluntary humiliation, which men who understood it not had dwelt upon as contradicting His divinity, though divine names and attributes are applied to Him. Christ answered some questions (Matt. xix. 3, 4): others He did not answer (Luke xx. 2, 4). The preacher would follow Christ's example" (ibid. v. 648, 9). "Christ answered fully their question about divorce. The preacher applying the teaching of Christ protests against the injustice of the Roman law, which distinguished between the adultery of the woman and that of the man. Men made it, and therefore it was directed against women (ibid. vi. 649). Marriage for the first time is lawful, the second time an indulgence; more than the second, sinful; but virginity is a higher state (ibid. v. iii.-x. 650-2). Husbands, wives, virgins, eunuchs, priests, laymen, all have their duties." He exhorts them to fulfil these, and, as in almost every discourse, passes on to the duty of believing in the doctrine of the Trinity.

Three other important discourses of Gregory, which belong also to the ministry at Constantinople, must not be wholly passed over, though they can only be mentioned here. (1) On the Nativity [Dec. 25, 380?] (Orat. xxxviii., Opera i. 661-75): (2) on the Epiphany [Jan. 6, 381?] (Orat. xxxiv., ibid. 676-691): (3) on Holy Baptism (Orat. xl.; ibid. 691-729).

Theodosius had long intended to summon a general council, and soon after his entry into Constantinople he carried out his purpose. In May, A.D. 381, the synod of the 150 bishops who formed the second Oecumenical council was held in the capital of the East. Socrates tells us plainly that the object of the council was to confirm the Nicene faith, and to appoint a bishop for Constantinople (Hist. Eccles. v. 8; cf. Sozom. vii. 7; Theodor. v. 7; Mansi, Collect. Concil. iii. 523). No Western bishop is mentioned as having been present, and the attempt to shew that Damasus of Rome was either consulted or represented is futile; but thirty-six bishops who were followers of Macedonius were present, and every effort was made to induce them to accept the Nicene faith. Meletius, the venerable bishop of Antioch, "honey-named and honey-natured," (Carm. xi. 1521, Opera, ii. 754,) was at first president. The principal question was the consecration of Maximus, which was at once pronounced void. Then followed, naturally, the question who should occupy the vacant see. The wish of Theodosius that Gregory should be chosen was well known; and the only bishop who opposed it was Gregory himself. He was by force placed in the episcopal chair. But he had this hope—alas! a vain one—that, "as position gives influence, he should be able, like a choragus who leads two choirs, to produce harmony between opposing parties" (Carm. xi. 1525-45, ibid. ii. 755). The joy at the election of Gregory was soon followed by sorrow at the death of Meletius. The new archbishop, naturally, succeeded him as president of the council, but who should succeed him as bishop of Antioch? It is said that the two bishops, Meletius and Paulinus, had agreed that the survivor should be the sole bishop, and that to this agreement the chief clergy and laity of both parties were sworn. Meletius himself expressed an earnest wish for it from his death-bed; but a strong party, both within and without the council, was soon organized against it. Gregory has given us in the poem De Vita sua, a résumé of his own speech on the question (Carm. xi. 1591-1679, Opera, ii. 759-63). "It was no light matter; the universe which had received the blood of God Incarnate was troubled by it. Were the struggle between two angels rather than two men, they could not be worthy of it. But now God had given the means of peace; let them confirm Paulinus in the episcopal office, and when the two should pass away let them elect a new bishop. Let them yield a little, that they may reap a great conquest. For himself he sought their permission to resign the office which they had conferred upon him, and he would gladly retire to some desert far away from evil men. He cared not to live among men whom he could not convince, and whose opinions reason forbade him to accept." He could scarcely have expected that this address would be received with favour, for the Meletian party was overpoweringly strong in the synod, and Paulinus had not been invited; but he was not prepared for the storm which followed. "There arose a cry like that of a number of jackdaws, and the younger members attacked him like a swarm of wasps" (ibid. 1680-90). Elsewhere he compares them to "cranes and geese," and speaks of it as "a disgrace to sit among such hucksters of the faith" (Carm. xii. 154, Opera, ii. 787). He left the synod never to return to it. For a while illness was opportunely (καλῶς) the reason of his absence (ibid. 1745), but the council proceeded to name Flavian as successor of Meletius; and Gregory, finding that his opinion had little weight, withdrew altogether and left the official residence, which was close to the church of the Holy Apostles (Carm. xi. 1778, Opera, ii. 769). This step led to earnest entreaties from the people that he would not desert his flock: "Who would nourish his children in the faith if he left them? Let him honour those labours which had ruined his health, and let that church be the place of departure at the end of life" (ibid. 1785-95). Moved for a while by these prayers he yet persisted in his determination, which was strengthened by the arrival of bishops from Egypt and Macedonia. The East and the West were now opposed to each other, and "prepared for the battle like wild boars, sharpening their terrible tusks" (ibid. 1804). The new members of the synod did not object to Gregory personally; but among the questions brought to the front by anger, rather than by reason, was that of his election, which afforded an obvious means of attack, and which was probably in itself obnoxious as an act of Meletius. It was clearly opposed, they urged, to the fifteenth canon of the Nicene council, which forbade any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to pass from one city to another. By that canon he ought to be sent back to Sasima. Gregory's party, on the other hand, urged that he was released from that obligation by the same authority which imposed it, when another general council elected him bishop of Constantinople; but it could not be expected that this plea would be accepted by bishops who were not a party to that act, nor is Gregory himself justified in speaking of the Nicene canons as obsolete:

Νόμους στρέφοντες τοὺς πάλαι τεθηκότας
Ὅν πλείστον ἤμεν καὶ σαφὺς ἐλεύθεροι.

Ibid. 1810, 11.

While they were thus discussing his election, his continued illness confirmed the conviction that it was his duty to resign his office. He appeared before the council, and exhorted them to think of higher things and mutual harmony. "He would be another Jonah to pacify the angry waves. Gladly would he find retirement and rest. He owed but one debt, the debt of death, and that was in God's hands. He had but one anxiety, and that was for his beloved doctrine of the Trinity (ib. 1828-55). He left the synod glad at the thought of rest from his labours; sorrowful as one who is robbed of his children." The synod received his resignation with satisfaction, for it removed a chief ground of dissension, and from many it removed, probably, a ground of jealousy (ib. 1869; Carm. xii. 145-8, Opera, ii. 787). Gregory went from the assembly to the emperor "to demand from him no gifts; he left such demands to others; no—he was weary of the hatred even of his friends because he had sought God only, and all he asked was that the man who had conquered barbarians would seek a new triumph in putting an end to their strife, and would allow him to retire from an office to which, in spite of himself, he had been chosen" (ibid. 1881-1901). Theodosius could not refuse that which he unwillingly granted. Gregory's only remaining care was to reconcile those who had been opposed to him, and to bid farewell to his friends. He did this privately, but he felt also that there must be a public statement of his position and a public farewell to the council and his church. This he delivered towards the end of June, A.D. 381 (Orat. xlii., Opera, i. 748-68). The oration is entitled, Συνακτῆριος εἰς τὴν τῶν πρ' Ἐπισκόπων παρουσίαν, and was pronounced before the synod, in the presence of a congregation which filled every corner of the church, and among whom no eye was dry. "Was there needed proof of his right to the bishopric? He would render his accounts. Let his work answer. He found them a rude flock, without a pastor, scattered, persecuted, robbed. Let them look round and see the wreath which had been woven—priests, deacons, readers, holy men and women. That wreath he had helped to weave. Was it a great thing to have established sound doctrine in a city which was the centre of the world? In that, too, he had done his part. Had he ever sought to promote his own interests? He could appeal like another Samuel. No; he had lived for God and the church, and kept the vows of his priesthood. All this he had done through the Holy Trinity and by the help of the Spirit. He would present to the synod his church as the most precious offering. The reward he asked was that they would appoint some one with pure hands and prudent tongue to watch over it—and that to the white hairs and worn-out frame of an old man, who could hardly then preach to them, they would allow the longed-for rest. Let them learn to prove these his last words—bishops to see the evil of the contentions which were among them; people to disregard externals, and love priests rather than orators, men who cared for their souls rather than rich men." The preacher then pronounces his lengthened farewell "to the beloved Anastasia, to the large temple, to the churches throughout the city, to the apostles who inhabited the temple, to the episcopal throne, to the clergy of all degrees, to all who helped at the holy table, to the choruses of Nazareans, to the virgins, wives, widows, orphans, poor; to the hospitable houses, to the crowds of hearers; to prince and palace and their inhabitants; to the Christ-loving city, to Eastern and Western lands; above all, to angels, protectors of the church and of himself; to the Holy Trinity, his only thought and treasure." With this pathetic climax, unsurpassed elsewhere even by Gregory himself, he concluded his last discourse in Constantinople. He left the city probably in the same month of June, A.D. 381, and retired to Nazianzus. Here he received a letter from Philagrius, an old friend of Caesarius and himself, animadverting upon his retirement. His answer breathes the same spirit which we find in the poem De Vita sua, and in the farewell sermon. "He was tired of fighting against envy and against venerable bishops, who destroyed the peace and put their personal squabbles before questions of faith" (Ep. lxxxvii., Opera, ii. 76). Among other letters belonging to this period, two addressed to Nectarius, who was chosen to succeed Gregory at Constantinople, deserve special note, as shewing that he cherished for him and the church nothing but the most entire good-will (Epp. lxxxviii. and xci., Opera, ii. 77, 8).

Gregory's difficulties were not yet at an end. On his return to Nazianzus he found the church there in confusion, chiefly through the teaching of the Apollinarians (Carm. xxxi., Opera, ii. 870-7). Heresy was powerful in places where, hitherto, it had never entered. He tried to find a bishop who would stem the evil, but was thwarted in his plan by the presbyters, and by the desertion of seven bishops who had promised to support him. His candidate had been hitherto engaged in secular affairs, but he still thought him the most promising. He seems after this to have succeeded in naming another bishop, and then to have retired to Arianzus. But a short time passed before he was again urged to take the governance of the church at Nazianzus and check the Apollinarianism which was rapidly spreading, and, in spite of his own strong disinclination, he agreed to do so. He states in a letter to his friend Boëporius, bishop of Colonia in Cappadocia Secunda, that he was willing only on account of the imminent increase of adversaries (Ep. cxxxviii., Opera, ii. 115). During this second administration of the diocese, Gregory was the means of delivering Nazianzus from impending danger. The prefect Olympius threatened to destroy the city in consequence of a seditious attack; and it was saved only by a pacific letter from the bishop, admitting that the offence was indeed grave, but that it was committed not by the city, but by the rashness of a few young men (Ep. cxli., Opera, ii. 118-20). Other letters of the same kind shew that Gregory was as the father of the city, watching over all its interests with loving care.

But Gregory felt that his constant illness unfitted him for his duties, and we even find him writing to the archbishop of Tyana, and in the most earnest tone beseeching him to take steps to appoint another bishop. "If this letter did not effect its purpose, he would publicly proclaim the bishopric vacant rather than that the church should longer suffer from his own infirmity" (Ep. clii., Opera, ii. 128). To such an appeal there could be but one answer, but the old opposition recurred when Gregory wished to vote in the election of his successor. It was again urged that if he were bishop of Nazianzus there could be no election; if he were not, he could have no claim to vote. They formally asserted their position, but then elected Eulalius, Gregory's colleague and relation, and the man of his choice. His satisfaction is expressed in a letter to Gregory of Nyssa, in which he also justifies his position on the ground that he was himself consecrated to Sasima and not to Nazianzus (Ep. clxxxii., Opera, ii. 149).

Eulalius entered upon his duties at Sasima about the end of the year 383. Gregory at once withdrew to Arianzus, and spent in retirement the six remaining years of life. To this period belong certainly a large number of poems and letters; and, probably two discourses, one on the Festival of St. Mamas, which was kept with special honour in the neighbourhood of Nazianzus on the first Sunday after Easter (καυρή κυριακή), and one on the Holy Passover (Orat. xlii. and xlv., Opera, i. 834-868).

The place of Gregory's retirement was at first the little plot of ground at Arianzus, which he had reserved to himself when all his other property was given to the poor. Here there was a shady walk with a fountain, which was his favourite resort (Carm. xlii. 1-24, Opera, ii. 915-17). But even this peaceful spot was to be denied him, and he was to be "driven forth without city, throne, or children, but always full of cares for them, as a wanderer upon the earth" (Carm. xliii. 1-12, Opera, 913-15). He found another temporary resting-place at a tomb consecrated to martyrs at a place called Carbala, of which nothing is known, and which the Bollandists indeed suppose (Mai. ii. 424 f) to be another name for the little plot at Arianzus. But he was driven thence by a relative named Valentinian, who settled near him with the female members of his family, as from another paradise by another Eve. Οικαρχίας δὴ γυναικῶν οὕτως ἐποχώρησεν, ὡς περ ἐχιδναίοις ἐνιδρομαῖς (Ep. cciii., Opera, ii. 169).

The poems and letters of this period speak of constant illness and suffering, from which he had but short intervals of relief after his retirement from Constantinople. A frame, never strong, had given way under the severe asceticism of the earlier, and was wholly unequal to bear the burden laid upon it by that of the later, life. "I suffer," he says in one of the letters, "and am content, not because I suffer, but because I am for others an example of patience. If I have no means to overcome any pain, I gain from it at least the power to bear it, and to be thankful as well in sorrowful circumstances as in joyous; for I am convinced that, although it seems to us the contrary, there is in the eyes of the Sovereign Reason nothing opposed to reason, in all which happens to us" (Ep. xxxvi., Opera, ii. 32). These physical sufferings he could bear, but it was added to the bitterness of his lot to suffer intense spiritual agony, which at times took from him all hope either in this world or the next. In the thick of the spiritual combat did this, as other great souls, learn the lessons it was to teach to the world. At length the end came, but it found him, swan-like, continuing his song unto death. Jerome tells us in the de Script. Eccles. "Decessit ante hoc ferme triennium sub Theodosio Imperatore." The date of that work is the fourteenth year of the same emperor. Gregory's death, therefore, is to be assigned to about the eleventh year of Theodosius, i.e. A.D. 389 or 390.

(b) The Writings of Gregory.—The extant works are contained in two folio volumes of the Benedictine edition. Vol. i. consists of forty-five sermons, of which such an account as is possible within our present limits is given elsewhere in this article. The contents of vol. ii. are more varied. It includes 243 letters, addressed to various persons, and on various subjects—theological, pastoral, political, domestic; the will of Gregory, taken from the archives of the church of Nazianzus, and signed and attested in legal form; the poems arranged in two books, of which a summary account must be given here. The first book (i.) is divided into two sections—(1) dogmatic and (2) moral. The poems of the second book (ii.) are historical, relating (1) to Gregory himself, or (2) to others, this last section including epitaphs and epigrams.

i. (1) The dogmatic poems are thirty-eight in number. Nos. 1–9 form one whole of 688 hexameter verses, with the addition of the sixth, which consists of 116 iambic verses, and is placed here with questionable editorship, because it treats of the same subject as the fifth (Providence). The poem is a brief exposition of the chief theological doctrines.

No. 10 (74 iambics) is on the Incarnation, against Apollinarius.

No. 11 (16 hexameters and pentameters), is also on the Incarnation.

Nos. 12–29 are Mnemonic verses on the facts of Holy Scripture, apparently meant for school use. The subjects are the books of Scripture, the sons of Jacob, the plagues of Egypt, the ten commandments, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, with an epigram on a temple of Elijah, the double genealogy of Christ, the twelve apostles, the miracles and parables of Christ according to each evangelist, the parables of Christ according to all the evangelists, the stilling of the tempest.

Nos. 29–38 are prayers or hymns addressed to God.

(2) The moral poems are forty in number.

No. 1 (732 hexameters) is a eulogy of virginity.

Nos. 2–7, in various metres, deal with kindred subjects, exhortations and counsels to virgins and monks, and the superiority of the single life.

Nos. 8–11 are on the secular and religious life, and exhortations to virtue.

Nos. 12 and 13 on the fragility of human nature.

No. 14 is a meditation on human nature in 132 hexameters and pentameters. It ranks with No. 1 among the most beautiful of Gregory's poems.

The remainder of the poems in this section are on such subjects as the baseness of the outer man; the blessedness of the Christian life; the sin of frequent oaths and of anger; the loss of dear friends; the misery of false friends. Four of them are satires against a bad-mannered nobleman (26 and 27); misers (28); feminine luxury (29).

ii. (1) There are ninety-nine poems relating to his own life. One of them (No. xi. De Vita sua) is an autobiography extending to 1949 lines, which we have frequently referred to, and another (No. 12, De seipso et de episcopis) is an appendix to it of 836 lines more. There are 19 elegies, 15 meditations, 25 prayers, 3 satires, a defence of the author's poetry, a defence of the religious life. The others are shorter pieces.

(2) Of the historical poems which relate to others 7 (? 8) are epistles addressed (1) to Hellenius on behalf of the monks; (2) to the prefect Julian, asking for exemption for the poor; (3) to Vitalianus on behalf of his son, from whom he had been estranged; (4) to Nicobulus, pleading in the name of his son for means to enter a certain famous school; (5) to Nicobulus, the son, a reply in the name of the father; (6) to Olympias, a famous deaconess of the church of Constantinople excusing himself from her wedding, to which he had been invited, and giving her counsels for the married life; (7) to Nemestius, an eminent public man, shewing him the errors of paganism, and urging him to accept Christianity. These poetic epistles are of considerable length, and are a witness to the varied interests and practical wisdom of the writer. (? 8 to Seleucus, vide infra.) There are 129 epitaphs, some of which have been noted above; and ninety-four epigrams, most of which are short poems, with little in them of the modern epigram, though some shew (e.g. 10–14, Εἰς Ἀγαστρούς), that the pen of Gregory could, when occasion required, be pointed with adamant. No less than 63 (31–94), belonging probably to the writer's youth, are upon the spoilers of tombs. This résumé will give some idea of the extent and subject-matter of Gregory's poems; though if the statement of Jerome and Suidas, that he wrote 30,000 verses, is to be understood literally, more than a third of them are now unknown.

In addition to these writings, which may be taken as undoubted, the Benedictine editors have printed six pieces which are of questionable authority. Four of these, (1) an interpretation of Ezekiel i. 5 et seq., (2) a paraphrase of Ecclesiastes, and (3 and 4) two short tractates De Fide Orthodoxa, are printed as an appendix to vol. i. (1) is judged by Tillen to be unworthy of Gregory (Mémoires, ix. 464), and ought rather to be called "Breves et indigestae annotationes in Ezechielem et alia quaedam Scripturae loca." This view is taken by the Colbertine Scholion and adopted by Billius. The piece is absent moreover from some of the best (e.g. the two Coislin) codices; (2) is by almost common consent to be ascribed to Gregory Thaumaturgus (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 25; Hieron. Script. Eccles. p. 121; Tillen, Mémoires, ix. 464; Billius in loco), Clemencet, the editor of the first Benedictine volume, relegates them to an appendix, because be found them in common editions, but did not judge them to belong to Gregory (Opera, i. 869 and 873). The two tractates exist only in Latin, though it has been held that they shew traces of a Greek original. Their ascription to Gregory is due to very doubtful inference from a passage in Augustine (Ep. cxlviii.). Tillemont (Mémoires, ix. 558, 727) follows Quenellius in ascribing them to Gregory Eliberitanus. Clemencet follows the author of the Gallia Litteraria in believing them to be the work of one Phaebeus. In any case they claim mention here only to be excluded from the works of Gregory, and the reader may be referred for further discussion of their authorship to Clemencet and Tillemont, ut supra. The other two pieces are printed in the Benedictine vol. ii.; (1) a poetical epistle to Seleucus (No. viii. Opera, ii. 1089). Some of the older editors, especially Combefisius, contend that it differs from the genuine writings of Gregory in the list of the canonical books, and, with the support of several MSS. ascribe it to Amphilocheus. But the style is clearly that of Gregory, and the only difference in the canon is the addition of Esther and the Apocalypse, which are not named by Gregory elsewhere. Billius, Caillau, and most modern editors, have claimed therefore with great probability, on internal grounds as well as with the support of the chief codices, that there is no sufficient reason for excluding an epistle which is entirely in the style of Gregory from the list of his works; (2) The Christus Patiens, a tragedy extending to 2601 lines, in which the personae are Christus, Theotokos, Joseph, Theologus, Magdalene, Nicodemus, Nuntius, Pilatus, Congregatio Pontificum, Chorus Virginum, Semichorus, Adolescentulus, Custodia, is, on the other hand, relegated to an appendix as not the work of Gregory, in accord with the opinion of all the best authorities; though M. Villemain (Tableau, &c. p. 135) has assumed its genuineness without note or question. Reference may be made to Caillau's Monitum in loco, Tillemont (Mémoires, iii. 559), Dom Ceillier, Hist. des Aut. &c. vii. 196. Caillau is himself inclined to attribute it to a Gregory who became bishop of Antioch A.D. 572.

Of the MSS. in which the works of Gregory have been preserved and the printed editions, a full account is ready to hand in the prefaces of Clemencet (Opera, i. pp. 1-16) and Caillau (Opera, ii. pp. 1-6); and in Fabricius, Biblioth. Graeca Eccl. ed. Harl. viii. 398, et seqq. The earliest of the Greek editions is the Gregorii Nazianzeni Orationes Lectissimae XVI. Graecè ex editione M. Musuri; Venetiis in aedibus Aldi, 1516, in 8vo. The earliest of the Latin is Gregorii Nazianzeni carmina, ad bene beateque vivendum utilissima, Latine ex editione Aldi Manutii Romani et Petri Candidi Monachi; Venetiis, Aldus Manutius, in 4to, 1504. In 1569 there appeared at Paris Prima operum Gregorii adornata a Jacobo Billio Prunaeo S. Michaelis in Eremito Abbate editio sive interpretatio. It was accompanied by a new translation and by the commentaries of Nicetas, &c. In the same or the following year it appeared at Cologne, and has often been reprinted. Soon afterwards Leuvenklaius published an edition "Basiliae anno 1571 ex Officina Hervagiana," which bore on its first page the words "Nec deinceps aliam expectari locupletiore posse de praemio lector intelliget"; and added the commentaries of Elias of Crete. Another edition of Billius was published at Paris in 1583 by Genebrardus, who included the new matter from the work of Leuvenklaius, and made several other additions. The work now formed two volumes. In 1609, and again in 1630, appeared the famous Graeco-Latin edition of Paris, containing the Greek of Gregory and the Latin interpretation of Billius. It was honoured by a magnificent laudation from Morellus, which was ridiculed by Montacutius, who thus described the work of the editors: "Habebant fortasse, habere sane poterant Regios, Regineos, Petavii libros, Sirleti, &c. sed ut ille Epicteti lucernam ad ostentationem, non ad usum; quippe qui deformarunt magis Gregorium quam fuerat in editione prima." Clemencet gives his own opinion thus: "Inde Gregorius sub falsi Billii nominis umbra neglectus incultusque jacet quia summam curam collatus cum MSS. et emendatus a Billio temere praedicatur." In 1778 the first volume of the Benedictine edition, with the title Sancti Patris nostri Gregorii Theologi vulgo Nazianzeni Archiepiscopi Constantinopolitani, Opera omnia quae extant vel ejus nomine circumferuntur, ad MSS. codices Gallicanos, Vaticanos, Germanicos, Anglicos, nec non ad antiquiores editiones castigata; multis auctis, &c. &c. was published at Paris. It had been announced as early as 1708. Undertaken first by De Friche, then by Louvard and Maran, it was finally edited by Clemencet, with the assistance of Patert, Brion, D'Olive and others. In the preparation of the second volume he had the help of de Cosniac; and de Verneuil succeeded to the labour after Clemencet's death. But the storm of the French Revolution drove the monks of St. Maur from their home, and the second volume was not published until 1842, when it was edited by Caillau.

(c) i. In forming an estimate of Gregory's literary position we have to consider (1) his poems, (2) his letters, and (3) his orations. Of each kind of writing we have seen that there are abundant materials from which to form a judgment. (1) Two modern criticisms of the poems from very different standpoints may help us to arrive at the true mean. To Dr. Ullmann (Gregorius, s. 200-2) they are "inferior to the letters, the product of old age, whereas the true vein of poetry must have shewn itself in earlier life; cramped by their subject-matters, which did not admit of originality; prosaic thoughts wrapped in poetic forms; involved and diffusive." The critic thinks that even the better poems are open to these remarks, but he admits that some of the short pieces are poetry of a high order, and that the didactic aim of Gregory is to be taken into account. "Still they could never be more than a poor substitute for the older poetry of Greece." To Villemain, who in poetic genius and critical faculty stands as much above Ullmann as in theological knowledge and historical accuracy he must be placed below him, the poems are the finest parts of all Gregory's works. "The greater part of his poems are religious meditations, which, in spite of the differences of genius and of times, have more than one link with the reveries of the poetic imagination in our days of scepticism and social progress. There is one, especially, the severe charm of which seems to have anticipated the finest inspirations of our melancholy age, while it preserves the impress of a faith still fresh and honest, even in its trouble" (Tableau de l'Eloquence chrétienne au Quatrième Siècle, p. 133). He then translates the greater part of the poem "De humanâ naturâ" (No. xiv., Opera, ii. 469-77), and adds, "There is undoubtedly a singular charm in this mixture of abstract thoughts and emotions, in this contrast of the beauties of nature with the restlessness of a heart tormented with the enigma of existence, and seeking to rest in faith. It is not the poetry of Homer; it is another poetry which has its truth, its novelty, and thence its grandeur. I much prefer it to the artificial imitations in which Christian literature sought to seize and to impose upon religious subjects the forms of the older idiom of the Muses" (ibid. p. 135). Again, he says, in words which exactly characterize the genius of Gregory's poetry: "It was in the new form of a contemplative poetry, in this sadness of man regarding himself, in this mystic melancholy so little known to the ancient poets, that the Christian imagination was especially to enter the arena against them without disadvantage. There, this poetry which modern satiety seeks for, this poetry of reflection and reverie, which enters into the human heart, and describes its inmost thoughts and vague desires, sprang up of itself" (ibid. p. 136). And at the end of a paragraph, when he is referring to Gregory, though he speaks of "the writings of the bishop of Caesarea," M. Villemain adds, "His funeral eulogies are hymns; his invectives against Julian have something of the malediction of the prophets. He has been called the 'Theologian of the East.' He ought to have been called rather 'the Poet of Eastern Christendom'" (ibid.).

In both these critiques there is an element of truth, but neither in the pages of Dr. Ullmann nor in those of M. Villemain do we find the Gregory who is portrayed to us in his own works. Dr. Ullmann knows, but does not always bear in mind, Gregory's own statement of the aim of his poetry. It must be admitted that "as soon as he falls, in the course of his longer didactic poems, into dogmatic polemics and subtleties, or a discursive moralising strain, all claims to poetry naturally disappear," but Gregory had a higher mission than that of a poet, and he is himself fully conscious that he is sacrificing form to substance, and beauty to necessity (Carm. xxxix. εἰς τὰ Ἑμμετρα). Nor does the critic remember how large a part of Gregory's poems are neither dogmatic nor discursive. The criticism, indeed, could hardly have been written had the second volume of the Benedictine edition been already published. M. Villemain, on the other hand, has seen with his usual keenness of perception, and expressed with his usual felicity of language, the characteristic beauties of these poems; but when in his admiration of the poet he exalts him above the theologian, he fails to recognise the true value of the orations, and Gregory's first claim to greatness. To the critic, who is himself a theologian, Gregory appears as a theologian rather than a poet; to the critic, who is himself a poet, Gregory appears as a poet rather than a theologian; to the careful reader of his own works he appears as both, but as one who regarded the teaching of dogmatic truth, and the combating of error, as the work of life to which all besides was made to give way.

(2) Gregory's extant letters, though upon very various subjects, and written in many cases under the pressure of immediate necessity, are almost invariably finished compositions. In one of them we have his own views as to what a letter should be. "A medium must be preserved between ambiguous brevity and wearisome prolixity. The oratorical style is to be avoided, the familiar style cultivated. The best letter is that which in few words conveys a sense to the unlearned, and yet utters a fuller meaning to him who is instructed. Another requisite in a good letter is that it should be graceful. It ought to contain nothing without meaning, and nothing without finish. Illustrations and proverbs are suitable to the epistolary style, and it is made pleasant by plays on words. But here, too, there must be moderation. Such things are to style what the purple colour is to raiment, and are to be used with careful hand. So with figures of speech. A few are to be admitted, but the careful balancing of antitheses and like phrases is to be left to the Sophists, or used playfully rather than in earnest. A good letter is more beautiful than others, just as the eagle of the old story was more beautiful than all other birds, because no one remarked its beauty. The thing to be aimed at in a letter is the beauty which comes from being natural, and which needs no adornment." Gregory modestly concludes by excusing himself from the rules of good letter-writing, because he was oppressed by weightier cares (Ep. li., Opera, ii. 46). The next letter (ibid. p. 48) accompanied a collection of epistles sent to Nicobulus as specimens for use, not for show, for to ask the writer for letters, seeing that he had long ago given up the culture of literature, was like gathering flowers from an autumnal field; and the next to this (ibid. p. 48) places the letters of Basil before his own. He is led to do so no less by truth than by friendship, though an impartial judgment may think that he was influenced by friendship rather than by truth.

(3) A higher place has been claimed in this article for Gregory's orations than for his poems; and examples have been given which may be considered sufficient to justify the claim. The Roman Breviary (Die ix. Maii) speaks of him as having surpassed all other sacred orators in solidity, and a consensus of opinions from the 4th century to our own day may be quoted as supporting this view. He is now held to be greater than Basil, or again to have eclipsed Chrysostom himself, or again to have combined "the invincible logic of Bourdaloue; the unction, colour, and harmony of Massillon; the flexibility, poetic grace, and vivacity of Fénelon; the force, grandeur, and sublimity of Bossuet The Eagle of Meaux has been especially inspired by him in his funeral orations; the Swan of Cambrai has followed him in his treatise on 'The Existence of God'" (Benoît, Grégoire de Nazianze, p. 721). It will be here enough to refer to such opinions as are found in the preface to the Benedictine edition, or in any of the lives; for the present purpose they are important as placing Gregory in a position which, after making full allowance for the besetting weakness of editors and biographers, must be admitted to be in the very first rank of Christian orators. He was indeed an orator by training and profession. For this he studied at Caesarea, Alexandria, and Athens, and was the acknowledged chief in the schools of the rhetoricians. He not unfrequently refers to the power of his own eloquence, and in a famous passage of the first invective against Julian, who had boasted "ours is eloquence and the arts of Greece and the culture of the gods; yours is ignorance and boorishness" (Ammian. Marcell. xv. 4), he thus speaks of it, "I give up all besides; riches, nobility, glory, power, and all such earthly things. But I cling to eloquence alone; and I do not regret the labours by land and by sea which I have undertaken to acquire it" (Orat. iv. 100, Opera, i. 132). The oratory of the Christian pulpit was the creation of Gregory and Basil. It was based on the ancient models, and was akin, therefore, to the speeches of Demosthenes and Cicero, rather than to the modern sermon. The extant orations of Gregory are, moreover, but a few out of the many which he must have written, and are practically a volume of sermons for special occasions. Some of them were not delivered from the pulpit at all. Others were delivered to a multitude moved to tears as they thought of the death of some friend, or excited by the discussion of some burning question, and ready at any moment to burst forth in cries of sympathy, or hisses of dissent, or deafening cheers of approval. It has not unfrequently been a charge against the sermons of Gregory that they are not an exposition of Scripture. As compared with the Homilies of Chrysostom, for example, they certainly (with one exception, Orat. xxxvii., Opera, i. 644-60) are not; the nature of the case made it impossible that they should be. But the answer to the charge, in the sense in which it is often made, is found in the discourses themselves. The margin of every page abounds with references to Scripture, and no reader can fail to see with Bossuet that "Gregory's whole discourse is nothing but a judicious weaving of Scripture, and that he manifests everywhere a profound acquaintance with it" (Défense de la Tradition, &c. iv. 2; Benoit, Grégoire, &c. 723).

ii. Great as was the position of Gregory as a writer, it is as a theologian that he has left his chief mark upon history. He alone beyond the apostolic circle has been thought worthy to bear the name "Theologus" which had been appropriated to St. John. In the story of his life, frequent allusion has been made to his teaching, and further reference may be made to the elaborate analysis of Ullmann (Gregorius, &c. ss. 209-352), who, following Clemencet (Opera, i. xlix-lxxviii.), has arranged under their separate headings his views on the articles of faith. Within our present limits the chief of them only can be referred to as they are contained in the five famous theological discourses delivered at Constantinople (Orat. xxvii.-xxxi., Opera, i. 487-579).

(1) The first is entitled Katà Eὐνομίδων προεδάξεις. It opens by shewing "the evil of the desire for fine words," and comparing his "adversaries who left the practice of piety for the discussion of theological questions to mountebanks who seek the applause of crowds. To discourse about God is a task of the greatest difficulty, not fitted for all times or all persons, nor to be undertaken in the presence of all persons. The heretics, having no strength in their own teaching, find it in the weakness of ours, as flies gather round wounds. We ought not to make our accusers our judges, nor in the presence of the foe draw the sword to our own destruction. The teacher of theology ought first to practise virtue. There is abundant scope for work to refute the older teaching of the pagan philosophers, or to discuss simpler questions of science and theology; but as to the nature of God our words should be few, for we can know but little in this life."

(2) Περὶ Θεολογίας. Gregory reasserts here his favourite position, that "it is the pure mind only that can know God. Moses ascends the mountain; Aaron is near; the elders are at a distance; the people are far away below; the beast on the mountain, incapable of thought and knowledge of God, is stoned. Heretics are like beasts on the mountain. The theologian beholds part of God, but the divine nature he can neither express in words nor comprehend in thought. The higher intelligence of angels even cannot know Him as He is. That there is a creating and preserving cause, we can know, as the sound of an instrument bears witness to its maker and player; that God is, we know, but what He is, and of what nature He is, and where He is, and where He was before the foundation of the world, we cannot know. The Infinite cannot be defined. We can only predicate negative attributes, for the nature of the divine essence is beyond all human conception. There may be various reasons why God cannot be known by man. Three are suggested: (a) we shall hereafter prize this knowledge the more; (b) we should have been in danger, had we the faculty of knowing Him, of falling by pride, as Lucifer did; (c) that they may have a rich reward, who have purged themselves from sin here, and have patiently waited for the fulfilment of their hope. The cause of our present inability is the union of the soul with the body, which prevents it from rising wholly above sensible objects. The mind is soon wearied in the attempt to form ideas of God. In infinite condescension to our weakness, God is called in Holy Scripture by names drawn from sensible objects. The mind either forms from these ideas the many gods of idolatry, or uses them as stepping-stones to a knowledge of the true God. The mystery of the divine essence is natural, and is analogous to other mysteries which surround us. Man—the juncture of soul and body, the functions and powers of the mind and various organs of the body, the continuity of species and variety of individuals; the wonderful variety and powers of animals, fishes, birds, insects; the many kinds, utility, and beauty of plants, fruits, flowers; the phenomena of earth and sea and sky; the nature of angelic beings; all these are equally beyond human reason."

(3) Περὶ Τριῶν. The two previous discourses were introductory. He now passes to the next subject. "The three earliest opinions concerning God were anarchia, polyarchia, and monarchia. The two former could not stand, as leading to confusion rather than the order of the universe. We hold that there is a monarchia, but that God is not limited to one person. If unity is divided, it becomes plurality. But if there is equal dignity of nature, and agreement of will, and identity of movement, and convergence to unity of those things which are of unity (and this cannot be the case in created things), there may be distinction in number without by any means involving distinction in essence and nature. Unity, therefore (μονάς), from the beginning going forth to duality (εἰς δύο), constituted a Trinity (μέχρι τριάδος). Human words fail to express the generation and procession, and it is better to keep to scriptural terms; but the writer has in his thoughts an overflowing of goodness, and the Platonic simile of an overflowing cup applied to first and second causes. The generation and procession are eternal, and all questions as to time are inapplicable." Gregory then proceeds to state and answer the common objections of his adversaries.

"The Son and the Spirit can be co-eternal with the Father, and yet be born of and proceed from Him. Eternity does not imply self-originality, but an originality to which it may be referred: just as light proceeds from the sun, but is not later than the sun."

"This generation is free from all passion because it is incorporeal."

"The Father is properly Father because He is not also Son; the Son is properly Son because He is not also Father. Man is both father and son, and is properly neither."

"The Scriptures use the past tense in speaking of the generation of the Son, but every student of Scripture knows that the tenses of verbs are interchanged (e.g. Ps. ii. 1 and xxv. 6)."

"To ask whether the Father begat the Son voluntarily or involuntarily, is as absurd as it would be to ask whether He is God voluntarily or involuntarily."

"The generation of the Son is indeed incomprehensible; but that of every human being is also incomprehensible and yet true."

"The question whether the Son existed before He was begotten is absurd, when eternal generation is thought of. The Arian dilemma is met by another. Is time in time or not?"

"Begotten and not-begotten are not the same thing. Are the Father and the Son, then, the same thing?" "The Father and the Son are the same in their essence and nature. These properties do not belong to the divine essence any more than immortality, innocence, immutability. Otherwise there would be several divine essences. That is the divine essence which belongs to God alone, but we cannot know that essence, as has been already shewn."

"If the Son is of the same essence as the Father, and the Father is unbegotten (they say), the Son must be unbegotten." "But God and 'unbegotten' are not the same thing."

"Or, again, to say 'If God made not an end of begetting, the generation is imperfect; and if there is an end, there must have been a beginning,' is to argue from corporeal to spiritual things. What would they say of the angelic or human spirits which have come into existence but will not cease to be."

"The Son is not, as they say, called God equivocally, as a painting is called an animal, but is really and properly God."

After dealing with other paralogisms, Gregory passes on to an examination of the passages in Scripture in which the divinity of the Son is expressed, and of the passages which speak of the humanity, and are quoted as opposed to the divinity by the Eunomians. "The Son was equal to the Father, and what He was He remained at the Incarnation; what He was not He assumed. God became man that we might become gods."

The oration ends with an apology for dealing with such subtleties, which weaken the force of the truth; and a prayer that his adversaries may have faith, by which alone spiritual truth can be discerned.

(4) Περὶ Θεοῦ. In this discourse the subject of the third is continued. Gregory has already answered the objection, that some passages of Scripture speak of the Son as human. He here enters upon an exhaustive examination, under ten objections, of the scriptural language applied to our Lord, and then passes to an exposition of the names which are (a) common to the Deity, (b) peculiar to the Son, (c) peculiar to the Son as man.

(5) Περὶ τοῦ Ἁγίου πνεύματος. Gregory commences this oration on the Holy Spirit by referring to the special difficulties arising from (a) the fact that many who admitted the divinity of the Son regarded the divinity of the Holy Ghost as a new doctrine not found in Holy Scripture; (b) that those defeated by his previous arguments had become the more determined to hold their ground here; (c) that he was himself worn out by the earlier discourses, and that his adversaries were wearied with them. He then expresses, in the strongest terms, his own belief in the divinity of the Third Person in the Trinity no less than in that of the Father and the Son. "The Holy Spirit is holiness. Had the Spirit been wanting to the divine Trinity, the Father and the Son would have been imperfect."

Historically, it is true that the Sadducees did not believe in the Holy Spirit; neither did they in angels or a resurrection, but it is difficult to see how they avoided the express witness of the Old Testament. The most eminent of the pagan philosophers had a glimpse of the truth, for they spoke of the "Mind of the Universe," the "Mind without," &c.

"Our argument is neither with those who deny that there is a Spirit nor yet with pagans, but with professing Christians who accept the Scriptures. Now the Spirit is either a substance or an attribute—not the latter, for he is said to 'separate' (Acts xiii. 2), and to 'be grieved' (Eph. iv. 30). If a substance, he is either God or a creature; but not a creature, for how could we believe upon, or be brought to perfection by, a creature?"

"But (it is objected) the Spirit must be unbegotten or begotten. If unbegotten, then are there two without beginning; if begotten, then of the Father or of the Son?" "True, it is impossible for the human mind to understand procession as distinct from generation. Let the objector explain how the Father is unbegotten or the Son begotten before he presses the difficulty that the Spirit proceedeth. The word of the Gospel is clear (John xv. 26): 'We who cannot comprehend those things which lie at our feet, and cannot count the sand of the sea, or the drops of rain, or the days of an aeon, how can we penetrate the profound depths of Divinity, and explain a nature thus obscure and beyond all power of speech?'"

"The Spirit is not called Son, not because anything is wanting in him which is present in the Son, for nothing can be wanting to God, but on account of the difference of their manifestation and mutual relation. In the same way the Father is not called Son."

"The Spirit is of the same substance with the Father and the Son (ὁμοούσιον). Again, we have a mystery beyond human thought, but in the varieties of the generation of animals there are faint shadows which may help us. Adam was a creature of God, Eve a segment of the creature, Seth the offspring of both. Was the same thing creature and segment and offspring? And yet no similitude can fully represent the truth."

"If they ask who of ancient or modern times worshipped the Spirit, the answer is found in the words of Scripture (John iv. 24; Rom. viii. 26; 1 Cor. xiv. 15). It is true that St. John says of the Son, 'by Him were all things made that were made,' but this does not include the Spirit, for the evangelist does not say 'all things' simply."

"Their chief objection is that to acknowledge the divinity of the Spirit is Tritheism. Are they themselves then, seeing that they do acknowledge the divinity of the Son, Ditheists (Διθεῖται)? Do they assert that things which have the same substance are numbered together (Συναριθμεῖται τὰ ὁμοούσια), and that things which differ in substance are numbered separately? This is to forget that number refers to quantity, not to quality; to the quantity of the things contained under it, not to their nature. Three things may be called 'one, one, one,' though they are of the same substance; or 'three' though they are of different substances."

"Do they ask why Holy Scripture is not more express in its statements about the divinity of the Spirit? Let them observe the method of Scripture. Some things are spoken of which are not, e.g. as when God is said to sleep or to wake or be angry. Some things are not spoken of which are. Where do they derive the terms τὸ ἀγεννητον, or τὸ ἀραρχον, or τὸ ἀθάνατον? Some things are not, and are not spoken of; as an evil God, or a square circle. Some things are, and are spoken of; as God, man, angel, judgment. It is absurd then to render the question one of words. The Scripture does not in so many words assert the divinity of the Holy Spirit, but it does in fact. Besides, why do the Arians make this an objection when the most express terms did not convince them of the divinity of the Son? God blesses men with, not against, their own will. Further, the revelation of Father (Old Testament), Son (New Testament), and Spirit (after the Ascension) is progressive. The human mind could not have grasped the full truth at once; it was to be expected therefore that the divinity of the Spirit, who was given after the ascension of the Son, should not be taught during the earlier manifestation. There are, moreover, in Holy Scripture a number of texts which do teach it." These Gregory quotes and explains, and then passes on to sum up in a restatement of the doctrine of the Trinity.

"There are some faint resemblances which may in some degree help to give an idea of Trinity in Unity. The fountain, the stream, the river; the sun, the ray, the light; the ray falling upon the water and reflected by it. But there is a danger that these images should mislead rather than lead; and the only safe position is that of humble faith."

It has been said with truth that these discourses of Gregory would lose their chief charm in translation. No conception of their subtlety of thought or beauty of expression, can be given in an outline, where a few words often represent several pages. Critics have rivalled each other in the praises they have heaped upon them, but no praise is so high as that of the many theologians who have found in them their own best thoughts. A critic who cannot be accused of partiality towards Gregory has given in a few words perhaps the truest estimate of them. "A substance of thought, the concentration of all that is spread through the writings of Hilary, Basil, and Athanasius; a flow of softened eloquence which does not halt or lose itself for a moment; an argument nervous without dryness on the one hand, and without useless ornament on the other, give these five discourses a place to themselves among the monuments of this fine genius, who was not always in the same degree free from grandiloquence and affectation. In a few pages and in a few hours Gregory has summed up and closed the controversy of a whole century." (De Broglie, L'Église et l'Empire, v. 385; Benoît, Grégoire, &c. 435, 436).

Books.—Little is needed for the study of Gregory's life and works beyond the admirable Benedictine edition referred to above, and the Lives by Ullmann (Gregorius von Nazianz der Theologe, 2. Aufl., Gotha, 1867; first part of earlier edition translated by Cox, Oxford, 1855) and Benoît (Saint Grégoire de Nazianze, Paris, 1876). A well-known comparison of Gregory and Basil will be found in Dr. Newman's Church of the Fathers, pp. 116–45, 551. See also a recent important work discussing some of the disputed questions in the life of Gregory by the Abbé Louis Montaut, Revue Critique de quelques questions historiques se rapportant à St. Grégoire de Nazianze et à son siècle. [H. W. W.]

GREGORIUS (15) NYSSENUS, bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia (372–395), brother of Basil the Great, and a leading theologian of the Eastern church in the second half of the 4th century. He and his brother and their common friend Gregory Nazianzen were the chief champions of the orthodox Nicene faith in the struggle against Arianism and Apollinarianism, and by their discreet zeal, guided by independency of spirit and moderation of temper, contributed chiefly to its victory in the East. He was one of the ten children, five of each sex, of Basil, an advocate and rhetorician of eminence, and his wife Emmelia, of whom Basil bishop of Caesarea was the eldest, and Gregory Nyssen the third or fourth (Greg. Nyss. de Vit. S. Macr., Opp. ed. Morel. tom. ii. pp. 182–186). [BASILIUS OF CAESAREA.] It is evident from the relations between them and the language which he adopts in speaking of him, as a son to a father, that Gregory was several years younger than Basil. As the latter was born in A.D. 329 or 330, we may place Gregory's birth about A.D. 335 or 336. His birthplace was probably Caesarea. We are destitute of all information as to the place of his education and his teachers. It is certain, however that he did not share in his eldest brother's advantages in receiving a university training, and we may reasonably conclude that he was brought up in the schools of his native city. That no very special pains had been devoted to his literary and intellectual instruction, we may gather from the words of his sister Macidora to him on her deathbed, in which she ascribed the high position he had gained among the bishops of his time to the prayers of his parents, since "he had little or no assistance towards it from home" (De Vit. & Macr. Opp. tom. iii. 192). A feeble constitution, subject to frequent illnesses, and a natural shyness disposed the young Gregory to a literary retirement in preference to the active walks of life. His intellectual powers were considerable, and had been improved by diligent private study; but he shrank from a public career, and appears after his father's death to have lived upon his share of the paternal estate, without adopting any profession. That his religious instincts did not develop early appears from his account of his reluctant attendance at the religious ceremonial held by his mother Emmelia in honour of the "Forty Martyrs." A day having been fixed for the translation of the relics of these sainted soldiers to a chapel erected for their reception, Emmelia summoned her son to Annesi to take part in the festival. The occasion was one in which a young layman like Gregory had but little sympathy, and he was immersed in occupations which he was unwilling to leave. He records the annoyance he felt at his mother's having chosen a time for her function so inconvenient to him, and for compelling him to be present even before the ceremonies began. The service in honour of the martyrs was held in his mother's garden, and lasted all through the night. But it had few attractions for the young student, who, wearied with his journey, threw himself down in an arbour and fell asleep. His mind, however, was not altogether at ease, and as he slept he seemed to be seeking to enter the garden, the approach to which was barred by the martyrs, who beat him with their rods, and would have excluded him altogether but for the intercession of one of their band. On awaking from his dream, full of remorse for the dishonour he had done to these holy men, he hastened to the urn which enshrined their ashes and bedewed it with bitter tears, beseeching God to be propitious to him, and the sainted soldiers to forgive the slight he had shewn them (Orat. in XL. Martyr., Opp. tom. ii. p. 212). It is evident that this terrifying vision had a very powerful effect on the young Gregory's mind, and under its influence he undertook the office of a "lector," in pursuance of which, as his friend, Gregory Nazianzen, reminds him, he read the Bible lections in the congregation (Greg. Naz. Ep. 43, tom. i. p. 804). He would seem, however, to have soon tired of his new vocation, which he deserted for that of a professor of rhetoric. This backsliding, caused great pain to Gregory's friends, and gave occasion to the enemies of religion to suspect the young reader's motives and bring unfounded accusations against him. Gregory Nazianzen, whose affection for him was warm and sincere, addressed to him a very strong remonstrance, expressing the grief felt by himself and others at his gradual and stealthy falling away from his first love; his discarding the Holy Scriptures, so full of the streams of grace, for the brackish and arid channels of secular learning, and seeking for "inglorious glory." He reproaches his friend for the "demoniacal ambition" which led him to covet the name of rhetorician rather than that of Christian, as well as for bringing discredit on his Christian profession by the public exhibition of himself in oratorical contests. He earnestly entreats him to return to a better mind, to make his apology to God, to the altar, and to the faithful, engaging to pray for his restoration to the God that quickens the dead (Greg. Naz. Ep. 43 [37], tom. i. p. 804). The date of this temporary desertion cannot be ascertained, but since during the short reign of Julian it was forbidden to Christians to act as public instructors we must place it either before 361 or after 363. At or about the same time we may place Gregory's marriage. His wife was named Theosebeia, and from the description given of her by Gregory Nazianzen in the letter written to console his friend on her death, we may gather that her character answered to her name, and that in piety and devotion to good works she was worthy to be "the spouse of a priest," ἐπέως ἐύψυχος. Gregory Nazianzen calls her "his Theosebeia," counting spiritual relationship stronger than that of nature. We do not know when her death occurred, but it was after Gregory had become a bishop, and, according to Tillemont, subsequently to the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. Expressions in Gregory Nazianzen's letter would lead us to believe that both himself and his friend were somewhat advanced in life at that time; and from Theosebeia being styled Gregory Nyssen's "sister" we may gather that they had ceased to cohabit, probably on his becoming a bishop. We do not hear of their having any offspring. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 95, tom. i. p. 846; Niceph. H. E. xi. 19.)

Gregory did not long exercise his profession of a teacher of rhetoric. The urgent remonstrances of his friend Gregory Nazianzen would have an earnest supporter in his elder sister, the holy recluse Macrina, who would not fail to use the same powerful arguments with him which had proved effectual in inducing Basil to give up all prospect of worldly fame for the service of Christ. It is probable also that the profession he had undertaken may have proved increasingly distasteful to one of Gregory's sensitive and retiring disposition, and that the small results of his exertions to inspire a literary taste among the youth (who, as he complains in letters to his brother Basil's tutor Libanius, written while practising his profession as a rhetorician (Greg. Nyssa. Epist. 13, 14), were much more ready to enter the army than to follow rhetorical studies), may have discouraged him from bestowing any further labour on so unproductive a soil. After some struggles he finally resolved to quit the world and its pursuits, and retired to a monastery in Pontus, which we cannot hesitate to identify with that on the river Iris presided over by his brother Basil, and in close vicinity to Annesi, where was the female convent of which his sister Macrina was the superior. In this congenial retreat he passed several years, devoting himself to the study of the Scriptures and the works of Christian commentators. Among these it is certain that Origen had a high place, the influence of his writings being evident in his own theological works. During his residence in Pontus, c. A.D. 371, he composed his work, De Virginitate, in which, while extolling the state of virginity as the highest perfection of Christian life, he laments most poignantly the fatal error by which, as by a wall or a gulph, he had separated himself from it, and rendered it impossible that he should ever attain that angelic virtue which he regarded as the only road to moral perfection (De Virg. lib. iii. tom. iii. pp. 116, sq.). Towards the close of his residence in Pontus, A.D. 371, circumstances occurred displaying Gregory's goodness of heart together with his simplicity and complete want of judgment in a striking manner. From some unexplained cause an estrangement had arisen between Basil and his aged uncle, the bishop Gregory, whom the family deservedly regarded as their second father. The younger Gregory took on himself the office of mediator. Straight paths having failed to conduct to the desired end, he adopted crooked ones, and forged letters to his brother in their uncle's name desiring reconciliation. The result was such as might have been expected. The letters were indignantly repudiated by the justly offended bishop; strong language was used on both sides, and reconciliation became increasingly hopeless. On the discovery of the deceit, Basil addressed a letter to his brother, which is a model of dignified rebuke. He first ridicules him with his simplicity, unworthy even of one of the lower animals, still more of a Christian, reproaches him for endeavouring to serve the cause of truth by deception, and upbraids him with his unbrotherly conduct in adding affliction to one already pressed out of measure (Basil. Ep. 58, [44]). From this calm retirement in A.D. 372 (the same year which saw the consecration of his friend Gregory Nazianzen to the see of Sasima, as well as that of one of the most widely venerated of the Western prelates, St. Martin of Tours) Gregory was reluctantly forced by his brother Basil to undertake the cares and labours of the episcopate. His unwillingness to exchange his life of studious leisure and religious contemplation for the harassing duties of a bishop was so great that, as we learn from a letter of Basil's, force had to be used to compel him to allow the ordaining hands to be laid upon him (Basil. Ep. 225 [385]). The see selected for him by his brother was Nyssa, an obscure town of Cappadocia Prima, about ten miles from the capital, Caesarea. So inconspicuous was the place that their common friend, Eusebius of Samosata, wrote to Basil to remonstrate on his burying so distinguished a man in a see so unworthy of him. Basil replied that he had not done this through any want of appreciation of his brother's merits, which made him worthy to govern the whole church gathered into one, but from a desire that the see should be made famous by its bishop, not the bishop by his see (ibid. 98 [259]). Basil's words contained an unconscious prophecy. Nyssa, which would otherwise have been utterly unknown, has gained universal celebrity from its bishop. It was not long after Gregory Nyssen's ordination that his namesake of Nazianzus was also made to experience the irresistible power of Basil's will in his consecration to the bishopric of Sasima. The ceremony took place at Nazianzus. The future bishop was eagerly expecting the support of his friend Gregory Nyssen's presence on the occasion. He did not, however, arrive till several days after the ceremony. It was a martyr's festival, and the new bishop was to preach. He devoted the exordium of his sermon to a studied eulogy on the two brothers, Gregory and Basil, whom he compared to Moses and Aaron, mingling, however, with his encomiums covert reproaches, of the one for his absence at his ordination, of the other for forcing him into the episcopate against his will (Greg. Naz. Orat. 6, pp. 136 sq.).

Basil had speedily fresh cause to complain of his brother's well-intentioned but blundering endeavours to befriend him. We are left in the dark as to the nature of the circumstances to which he refers in a letter to Eusebius of Samosata (Basil. Ep. 100 [256]), but the mention of synods collected by Gregory at Ancyra, and the plots against him caused by his simplicity, render it probable that a mistaken confidence in his powers of dealing with men had caused him to promote the gathering of episcopal synods in the hope of rendering his brother effectual assistance, while he was really becoming a tool in the hands of clever and unscrupulous men of the world for his injury. So mistaken an estimate did Gregory entertain of his own powers that about this same time Basil had again to interpose his authority to prevent his being sent as the colleague of Dorotheus, the presbyter of Antioch, on his mission to Italy to solicit the intervention of Damasus and the Western bishops in the troubles of the East caused by the Meletian schism. In a letter to Dorotheus, Basil expresses his conviction of his excellent brother's complete unfitness for so delicate a negotiation, both on account of his thorough inexperience in ecclesiastical matters, and because his simple-hearted goodness would be despised by a haughty character like Damasus, preferring flattery to truth (ibid. 215 [250]).

Gregory's episcopate fell in troublous times for the orthodox. Valens, a zealous Arian, was on the throne, and lost no opportunity of forwarding his own tenets, and vexing those who professed opposite views. The miserable Demosthenes had been recently appointed vicar of Pontus, with the understanding that he was to do all in his power to crush the adherents of the Nicene faith. A keen recollection of his disgraceful discomfiture when, in his earlier character as clerk of the imperial kitchen, he had rashly entered into a theological controversy with Basil, would make him look on Gregory with no friendly eyes. [DEMOSTHENES.] After various petty acts of persecution, in which the semi-Arian prelates joined with high satisfaction, as a means of retaliating on Basil, a synod was summoned at Ancyra, at the close of A.D. 375, for the double purpose of examining some alleged canonical irregularities in Gregory's ordination to the episcopate, and of investigating a frivolous charge brought against him by a certain Philocharis, of having made away with some of the church funds left by his predecessor. A band of soldiers was sent to arrest Gregory and conduct him to the place of hearing. A chill on his journey brought on a pleuritic seizure, and aggravated a painful malady to which he was subject. His sufferings were so severe that he entreated his conductors to allow him to halt for medical treatment. But they were deaf to his entreaties and mercilessly hurried him on. In some unexplained way, however, he managed to elude their vigilance and escaped to some place of concealment where his maladies could be cared for. Basil proved equal to the occasion. He collected a synod of orthodox Cappadocian bishops, in whose name he addressed a dignified but courteous letter to Demosthenes, apologizing for his brother's non-appearance at Ancyra, and stating that the charge of embezzlement could be shewn to be false by the books of the treasurers of the church; while, if any canonical defect in his ordination could be proved, the ordainers, not the ordained, were those who should be called to account, an account which they were ready to render (ibid. 225 [385]). Basil wrote at the same time in his brother's behalf of a man of distinction named Aburgius, begging him to use his influence to save him from the misery of being dragged into court, and being implicated in judicial business from which his peaceful disposition shrank (ibid. 33 [358]). The non-appearance of Gregory having rendered the synod of Ancyra fruitless, a second was summoned by Demosthenes A.D. 376, through the active instrumentality of Eustathius of Sebaste, for his own episcopal city of Nyssa. Still Gregory refused to appear. He was pronounced contumacious and deposed by the assembled bishops, of whom Anysius and Ecdicius of Parnasse were the leaders, and a successor was consecrated, spoken of with scorn by Basil as a miserable slave who could be bought for a few oboli (ibid. 237 [264], 239 [10]). Gregory's deposition was followed by his banishment by the emperor Valens (Greg. Nyss. de Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 192). These accumulated troubles proved utterly crushing to Gregory's gentle spirit. In his letters written at this period he bewails the cruel necessity which had compelled him to desert his spiritual children whom with so much pain he had brought forth, and driven him from his home and all that was dearest to him, his brethren, his kinsmen, his friends, to dwell among malicious enemies who scrutinized every look and gesture, nay his very dress, and made them the ground of accusation. He dwells with tender recollection on the home of which he had been deprived,—his fireside, his table, his pantry, his bed, his bench, his sackcloth,—and contrasts it with the stifling hole in which he was forced to dwell, of which the only furniture was straitness, darkness, and cold. His only consolation is in the assurance that his brethren would remember him in their prayers. (Greg. Nyss. Epist. 18, 22.) His letters to his friend Gregory Nazianzen have unfortunately perished, but the deep despondency in which he was sunk is shewn by the replies. After his expulsion from his see his namesake wrote that, though prevented from gratifying his desire of accompanying him in his banishment, he went with him in spirit, and that he trusted in God that before very long the storm would blow over, and that he would get the better of all his enemies, as a recompense for his strict orthodoxy (Greg. Naz. Epist. 142, tom. i. p. 866). Driven from place to place, to avoid the evil designs of his enemies, he had compared himself to a stick carried aimlessly hither and thither on the surface of a stream; his friend replies that his movements were rather like those of the sun, which brings life to all things, or of the planets, whose apparent irregularities are subject to a fixed law (ibid. 34 [32], p. 798). Out of heart at the apparent triumph of Arianism, Gregory bids him be of good cheer, for the enemies of the truth were like serpents, creeping from their holes in the sunshine of imperial favour, who, however alarming their hissing, would be driven back into the earth by time and truth. All would come right if they left all to God (ibid. 35 [33], p. 799). This trust in God proved well-founded. On the death of Valens, in 378, the youthful Gratian recalled all the banished bishops, and, to the joy of the faithful, Gregory was restored to his see of Nyssa. In one of his letters, not improbably written to his brother Basil, he describes with graphic power the circumstances of his return. The latter half of his journey, which lay through a chain of villages along the riverside, was a triumphal progress. The inhabitants poured out to meet him, and escorted him along the road with acclamations and tears of joy. A heavy storm of rain a little before he got to Nyssa driving the inhabitants indoors caused him to enter the city unobserved; but no sooner were his chariot-wheels heard on the pavement than so large a crowd collected that his further progress was impeded, and he was prevented alighting, and was near fainting. When he got near the church a river of fire seemed to be pouring into it, from the number of lighted tapers borne before him by the holy virgins who had come forth to welcome back their beloved bishop (Greg. Nyss. Epist. 3, Zacagni; No. 6, Migne). The happiness of his return was, however, short-lived. Private sorrow soon succeeded to public distress. The first day of the following year, Jan. 1, A.D. 379, saw the death of Basil, whom he loved as a brother and revered as a spiritual father. If not present at his death, he certainly attended his funeral, on which occasion he delivered his funeral oration, to which we are indebted for many particulars of that father's life. In common with Gregory's compositions generally, it offends by the extravagance of its language and turgid oratory (Greg. Nyss. in Laud. Patr. Bas. tom. iii. pp. 479 sq.). Gregory Nazianzen, who was prevented from being present at his friend's obsequies by disabling illness, wrote a consolatory letter, praising Gregory very highly, and saying that the chief comfort he now had was to see all Basil's virtues reflected in him, as in a mirror (Greg. Naz. Epist. 37 [35], p. 799). One sorrow trod close on the heels of another in Gregory's life. The confusion in the churches after the long Arian supremacy entailed severe labours and anxieties upon him, and he was sent hither and thither for the defence of the truth, and the reformation of the erring (De Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 192). He had scarcely recovered from the blow of Basil's loss before he had to mourn that of his sister Macrina, to whose wise instructions and holy example both he and Basil owed so much. In September of this year, A.D. 379, he had taken part in the council held at Antioch for the double purpose of healing the Antiochene schism (which it failed to effect) and of taking measures for securing victory to the church over the Arianism which had been lately dominant (Labbe, Concil. ii. 910; Baluz. Nov. Concil. Coll. p. 78). On his way back to his diocese, Gregory visited the monastery at Annesi, over which his sister Macrina presided. He found her suffering from a mortal illness from which she expired the evening of the next day. A full account of Macrina's last hours, together with a detailed biography of her from her birth, and even before it, is given by him in a letter to the monk Olympius (de Vit. S. Macrinæ Virg. tom. ii. pp. 177 sq.). In his treatise de Anima et Resurrectione (entitled, in honour of his sister, τὰ Μακρίνα) we have another account of her deathbed, in which he puts long speeches into her mouth, as part of a dialogue held with him on the proofs of the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body, the object of which was the mitigation of his grief for Basil's death (tom. iii. pp. 181 sq.). [MACRINA THE YOUNGER.] After celebrating his sister's funeral, Gregory continued his journey to his diocese, where, he complains to a brother bishop named John, who had been with him at Antioch (his letter to whom is our chief authority for this part of Gregory's history [Epist. xix.]), an unbroken series of calamities awaited him. The Galatians had been sowing their united heresies among his churches. The people at Ibora on the borders of Pontus having lost their bishop by death availed themselves of Gregory's presence to superintend the election and take the votes, to elect him to the vacant see. This, in some unexplained way, became the cause of troubles calling for the intervention of the military, with the count at their head, "setting the troops of the commanding officer in motion against him." When these difficulties had been settled, he was compelled to set out on a long and toilsome journey, in fulfilment of a commission he had received from the council of Antioch, "to visit and reform the church of Arabia" (tom. iii. p. 653), by which, as we learn from the same letter, that of Babylon is intended. He found the state of the Babylonian church even worse than had been represented. The people had grown hardened in heresy, and were as brutish and barbarous in their lives as in their tongue. They gloried in the heinousness of their evil deeds, and set such store by low cunning and violence that Sisyphus and Sciron would be far greater in their eyes than Archimedes. Lying was more natural to them than to speak the truth. We have no definite information as to the results of this mission; but from the despairing tone in which he speaks of it it is evident that he met with but little success. At the termination of this visitation he availed himself of his proximity to the Holy Land to visit the spots consecrated by the life and death of Christ. The journey was made easier by the facilities afforded by the emperor, who at the outset had put one of the public chariots at his disposal, which he records served him and his retinue "both for a monastery and a church"; fasting, psalmody, and the hours of prayer being kept up with the utmost regularity all through the journey (tom. iii. p. 658). He accomplished his object as far as seeing the sacred spots went. He visited Bethlehem, Gethsemane, the Mount of Olives, and the Anastasis. But the result of this pilgrimage was simple disappointment. His faith received no confirmation, and his religious sense was scandalized by the gross immorality he found prevailing in the Holy City itself, which he describes as a sink of all iniquity. The church of Jerusalem was in an almost equally unsatisfactory state. Cyril, after his repeated depositions by Arian influence, had finally returned, but had failed to heal the dissensions of the Christians, or bring them back to unity of faith. Gregory's efforts were equally ineffectual, and he returned to Cappadocia depressed and saddened with the spectacle. He poured forth the feelings of his heart in two letters, one to three ladies resident at Jerusalem, Eustathia, Ambrosia, and Basilissa (tom. iii. pp. 659 sq.), the other the celebrated one "de Euntibus Hierosolyma," in which he declares his conviction not of the uselessness only but of the evil of pilgrimages. "He urges the dangers and suspicions to which pious recluses, especially women, would be subject, with male attendants, either strangers or friends, on a lonely road; the dissolute words and sights which may be unavoidable in the inns; the dangers of robbery and violence in the Holy Land itself, of the moral state of which he draws a fearful picture. He asserts the religious superiority of Cappadocia, which had more churches than any part of the world, and enquires in plain terms whether a man will believe the virgin birth of Christ the more by seeing Bethlehem, or His resurrection by visiting His tomb, or His ascension by standing on the Mount of Olives." (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. chap. 11, vol. iii. p. 192, note.) His language is so unmeasured that it has led some Roman Catholic writers, especially Bellarmine (de Cultu Sanctorum, lib. iii. c. 8) and Gretser, to call in question its authenticity. It is, however, fully supported by Baronius and Tillemont, and there is no sufficient reason for questioning its genuineness. The next time we hear of Gregory is at the second general council, that of Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Labbe, Concil. ii. 955), accompanied by his deacon, Evagrius, in which he held a principal place as one of the recognised theological leaders of the age, τῆς ἐκκλησίας τὸ κοινὸν ἔρεισμα, as his friend Gregory Nazianzen had at an earlier period termed him. That he was the author of the clauses then added to the Nicene symbol is an unverified assertion of Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xii. 13). It is probable that it was on this occasion that he read to his friend Gregory Nazianzen and to Jerome his work against Eunomius, or at least the more important parts of it (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 128). Gregory Nazianzen having been reluctantly compelled to ascend the episcopal throne of Constantinople, Gregory Nyssa delivered an inaugural oration which has perished, and soon after a funeral oration on the venerable Meletius of Antioch, which has been preserved (Socr. H. E. iv. 26; Oratio in funere Magni Meletii, tom. iii. pp. 587 sq.). Before the close of the council the emperor Theodosius issued a decree from Hecale, July 30, A.D. 381, containing the names of the bishops who were to be regarded as centres of orthodox communion in their respective districts. Among these Gregory Nyssen appears, together with his metropolitan Helladius of Caesarea and Otreius of Melitene, for the diocese of Pontus (Cod. Theodos. l. iii. "de Fide Catholica," t. vi. p. 9; Socr. H. E. v. 8). Gregory however was not made for the delicate and difficult business of restoring the unity of the faith. He was more a student than a man of action. The simplicity of his character caused him to be easily imposed upon. Open to flattery, he became the dupe of designing men, and it is not difficult to believe that the mistakes made by him in the execution of his commission were not few or small. His colleague Helladius was in every way his inferior, and if Gregory took as little pains to conceal his sense of this in his personal intercourse as in his correspondence with Flavian, we cannot be surprised at the metropolitan's dignity being severely wounded. Helladius revenged himself on Gregory for his ill-disguised contempt by gross rudeness. Gregory when returning from Sebaste, where he had been celebrating the first anniversary of his brother Peter's death, having turned out of his way to pay his respects to his metropolitan, and to inquire after his health, of which he had heard unfavourable accounts, was kept standing a long time at the door under the midday sun, and when at last admitted to Helladius's presence, his complimentary speeches were received with chilling silence. After waiting some time in vain for any reply, Gregory addressed a mild remonstrance at such a cold reception, on which Helladius broke forth into cutting reproaches for his conduct towards him, and rudely drove him from his presence without asking him to partake of the slightest refreshment. He returned whence he came hungry and weary, and wet to the skin, and at once sat down to pour forth his chagrin in a letter to Flavian, a bishop whom he had already addressed on the same subject, detailing the circumstances of Helladius's insulting behaviour, and calling upon him to assist him in reducing his pride, and teaching him that he was in no degree superior to his brethren in the episcopate, to whom the emperor and the council had given an equal authority (Epist. ad Flavian. tom. iii. pp. 645 sq.). There is no proof that Gregory was present at the synod held at Constantinople in A.D. 382, but it is certain from internal evidence that he was there the next year, A.D. 383, when he delivered his discourse on the Godhead of the Second and Third Persons of the Trinity (de Abraham, tom. iii. pp. 464 sq.; cf. Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. ix. p. 586, "S. Grég. de Nysse," art. x.). He was again at Constantinople in A.D. 385, on which occasion he pronounced the funeral oration over the little princess Pulcheria, who had died at the age of six years, at Constantinople, and shortly afterwards over her mother, the empress Flaccilla, who had speedily followed her to the grave at a place called Scotumin, in Thrace, whither she had gone to drink the waters. Both orations are extant (tom. iii. pp. 514 sq., 527 sq.). During these visits to Constantinople, Gregory obtained the friendship of Olympias, the celebrated deaconess and correspondent of Chrysostom, at whose instance he undertook an exposition of the Canticles, a portion of which, containing fifteen chapters, he completed and sent her (in Cont. tom. iii. pp. 468 sq.). The last recorded visit of his is his presence at the Constantinople synod, A.D. 394, at which he was one of the church of Rufinus, under the presidency of Nectarius, to decide between the rival claims of the bishops Bagadius and Agapius to the see of Bostra, in Arabia; a question really appertaining to the jurisdiction of the see of Antioch (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1151). It was on this occasion that at the request of Nectarius Gregory delivered the homily bearing the erroneous title, "de Ordinatione," which is evidently a production of his old age (tom. ii. pp. 40 sq.). His architectural taste, which is evident in other parts of his works, especially in the minute description of a domed martyrion he was building, in his letter to Amphilocheus (Epist. 25), appears in this homily. He employs the contrast between the gilded vault of the church, and the blue circles introduced to throw up its brilliancy, to illustrate the contrast between his sermon and the magnificent discourses which had preceded it. It is probable that he did not long survive this synod. The date of his death is uncertain, but it must be placed before the close of the century, perhaps in A.D. 395.

Writings.—Gregory Nyssen was a very copious writer, and the greater part of his recorded works have been preserved to us. His writings may be divided into five classes: I. Exegetical; II. Dogmatical; III. Ascetic; IV. Funeral Orations and Panegyrical Discourses; V. Letters.

I. Exegetical.—Gregory did not accomplish much for the exegesis of Holy Scripture, and what he has left is of no high value, his system of interpretation being almost entirely allegorical. To this class belong his works on the Creation, written chiefly to supplement and defend the great work of his brother Basil on the Hexameron. These are (1) Ἀπολογητικὰ περὶ τῆς ἐξαήμερου, dedicated to his youngest brother Peter, bishop of Sebaste. It takes its title Apologeticus from its containing a defence of the actions of Moses, and also of some points in Basil's work which had been called in question. (2) Περὶ κατασκευῆς ἀνθρώπου, a treatise on the creation of man, written as a supplement to Basil's treatise (vol. i. p. 45; Socr. H. E. iv. 26), the fundamental idea of which is the unity of the human race—that humanity before God is to be considered as one man; also dedicated to his brother Peter. It is called by Suidas ῥήχος θαυμάσιον. (3) Two homilies on the same subject (Gen. i. 26). These are frequently appended to Basil's Hexameron, and are erroneously assigned to him by Combefis and others. There is also a discourse (tom. ii. pp. 22–34) on the meaning of the image and likeness of God in which man was created. (4) A treatise on the Life of Moses as exhibiting a pattern of a perfect Christian life; dedicated to Caesarius. (5) Two books on the Superscriptions of the Psalms. In this work he fruitlessly endeavours to shew that the five books of the Psalter are intended to lead men upward, as by five steps, to moral perfection. The first book, in nine chapters, investigates the object of each of the five divisions of the Psalter. The second book is in sixteen chapters. The first six deal with the titles in detail, expounding them allegorically, without any critical insight into their real meaning; chapter 7 explains the word Allusia; chapters 8 and 9 relate to the psalms that are destitute of superscriptions, giving easterly reasons for their absence where wanting both in the Hebrew and the LXX, and ascribing their absence in the Hebrew text, when present in the LXX, to the blindness and impiety of the Jews. In chapter 10, he attempts an explanation of the diapente, and in the remaining chapters he carries out in detail his principle of the progressive teaching of the psalms, whose order he regards as due to the Holy Spirit, very briefly in the first eleven, and more fully in Pa. xl.-lviii. An explanation of the sixth Psalm concludes this work. (6) Eight homilies expository of Ecclesiastes, ending with ch. vii. 13, "less forced, more useful, and more natural" (Dupin). (7) Fifteen homilies on the Canticles, ending with ch. vi. 9; dedicated to Olympias. (8) Five homilies on the Lord's Prayer, "lectu dignissimæ" (Fabric.). (9) Eight homilies on the Beatitudes. (10) A discourse on 1 Cor. xv. 28, in which he combats the Arian perversion of the passage as to the subjection of the Son. (11) A short treatise on the witch of Endor, Ἐργαστήριον, to prove that the apparition was a demon in the shape of Samuel; addressed to a bishop named Theodosius.

II. Dogmatical.—Far more valuable than Gregory's attempts at exegesis are his dogmatical works. These are deservedly regarded as among the most important patristic contributions towards a true view of the mystery of the Trinity, hardly, if at all, inferior to the writings of his greater brother, Basil. (1) The chief of these, both in size and importance, is his great work against Eunomius, written subsequently to the death of Basil, to refute the apology put forth by Eunomius, in reply to Basil's attack upon his teaching, and to vindicate his brother from the calumnious charges brought against him by his adversary. We learn from the dedicatory epistle to his youngest brother, Peter, bishop of Sebaste, and his reply, that the work was written at his request, after his return from Armenia. It is in twelve books, of which the last is the longest, being more than a quarter of the whole. (2) Almost equally important with this are the replies to Apollinarius, especially the Antirrheticus adversus Apollinarem. These treatises are not only valuable as giving the most weighty answer on the orthodox side to the erroneous views of these heretical leaders, but, from the large number of extracts from their writings contained in them, they are really the chief sources of our acquaintance with the real character of their doctrines. The same subjects are treated with great accuracy of thought and spiritual insight in (3) Sermo Catecheticus Magnus, a work divided into forty chapters, containing a systematized course of theological teaching for the use of catechists, proving, for the benefit of those who did not accept the authority of Holy Scripture, the harmony of the chief doctrines of the faith with the instincts of the human heart. This work contains passages asserting the annihilation of evil, the restitution of all things, and the final restoration of evil men and evil spirits to the blessedness of union with God, so that He may be "all in all," embracing all things endued with sense and reason—doctrines derived by him from Origen. To save the credit of a doctor of the church of acknowledged orthodoxy, it has been asserted from the time of Germanus of Constantinople that these passages were foisted in by heretical writers (Phot. Cod. 233, pp. 904 sq.). But there is no foundation for this hypothesis, and we may safely say that "the wish is father to the thought," and that the final restitution of all things was distinctly held and taught by him in his writings. The concluding section of the work, which speaks of the errors of Severus, a century posterior to Gregory, is evidently an addition of some blundering copyist. Other dogmatic treatises from Gregory's pen which deserve mention are, that addressed to Simplicius, a military tribune, on Faith in the Trinity; another dedicated to Ablabius against Tritheism; one to his brother, Peter of Sebaste, on the difference between "essence," οὐσία, and "person," ὑπόστασις; and the Sermones adversus Arium et Sabellium; and de Spiritu Sancto adversus Macedonium, first printed by Mai in his Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio (tom. viii.), and in the Nov. Patr. Bibl. (tom. iv.). Weighty as Gregory's utterances are on the doctrine of the Trinity and the union of the two natures in Christ, it must be acknowledged that in his desire to exalt the divine nature he came dangerously near the doctrines afterwards developed by Eutyches, and the Monothelites, if he did not actually enunciate them. While he rightly held that the infinite Logos was not imprisoned in Christ's human soul and body, any more than the light of a torch is confined to the wick—so that while the flame is indissolubly limited to the ὄργανον or substratum of the torch, the light is not therefore imprisoned in it (Cat. Magn. c. 10)—he cannot be said to have assigned the proper independence to the action of this human soul and will. When he discusses the question how far Christ can be said to have had a free human will, he assigns the passivity alone to the human will, the active agency being simply and solely divine. He views Christ's will as merely something ὑπερῶν, possessing mutability, passibility, and a passive capability of development, without any power of self-determination (cf. Dorner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. ii. vol. i. pp. 36, 175, Engl. transl.). Hooker quotes some words of his as to the entire extinction of all distinction between the two natures of Christ, as a drop of vinegar is lost in the ocean (Eccl. Polit. tom. ii. 697), which he deems so plain and direct from Eutyches that he "stands in doubt they are not his whose name they carry" (Eccl. Pol. bk. v. ch. iii. § 2; cf. Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. iv. p. 115, Clark's transl.).

III. The class of his Ascetical Writings is small. To it belong his early work de Virginitate; his Canonical Epistles to Letoia, bishop of Melitene, classifying sins, and the penances due to each; the Hypotyposis, a summary of the ascetical life; the two works on the Meaning of the Name of Christian, addressed to Harmonius; and a Refutation, addressed to Olympius; &c.

IV. The chief of Gregory's funeral orations are those already mentioned on his brother Basil and Meletius. To these may be added those on the empress Flaccilla and the young princess Pulcheria. We have also three panegyric discourses on the Forty Martyrs, one also on St. Stephen, on the martyr Theodorus, on Gregory Thaumaturgus, and on St. Ephrem. To this class, though couched in the form of a letter, belongs his life of his sister St. Macrina. His homilies include discourses against Usurers, Fornicators, those who postpone Baptism, those who harshly condemn others for sin, on Charity to the Poor, avoiding fornication, and the like; together with sermons preached on the chief festivals, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension Day, &c.

V. Epistles.—The number of Gregory's letters preserved to us is not great. The chief are that to Flavian, complaining of his contumelious treatment by Helladius, and the two on Pilgrimages to Jerusalem. Fourteen letters were published by Zacagni (a librarian of the Vatican, died 1712) in his Collect. Mon. Vet. Eccl. Graec. et Lat. pp. 354–400 (quarto, Rom. 1698), to which seven were added by J. B. Caraccioli from a Medicean MS. (Florence, 1781). The whole were transferred to Galland's Bibl. Vet. Patr. vol. vi. pp. 604, sqq. and Migne's Patrologie (vol. xlv. pp. 999 sqq.).

Editions—Latin Translations.—Omitting the editions of separate treatises, the earliest publication of Gregory's collected works was in a Latin translation issued from the press at Cologne in 1537. This was followed by one from the Basil Press, 1562, L. Sifanius being chiefly responsible for the version. It appeared again at Basil with additions in 1571, and at Paris in 1573 under the editorship of Possevin. All these editions were greatly surpassed in elegance and accuracy by that of Paris 1603, under the superintendence of Front du Duc.

Greek and Latin.—The first edition of the Greek text with a Latin translation appeared from Morel's press at Paris in 1615 in two volumes folio, also edited by du Duc. To this an appendix was added in 1618 from materials supplied by Gretser. It issued again from the same press, but with a great falling off both in elegance and accuracy, in 1638, in three volumes folio. Other complete reprints, including his epistles and other additamenta, are those by Galland (Bibl. Vet. Patr. tom. vi.) and Migne (Patrologie, tom. xlv.–xlv.). A good critical edition of the works of Gregory Nyssen is, however, much wanted. It is matter for surprise and regret that no duly qualified scholar has undertaken a task in which, to quote the Bibliotheca Graeca of Fabricius (ed. Harles, vol. ix.), "amplissimus patet campus in quo vires ingenii, eruditionis, et diligentiae, cum laude pariter ac utilitate, possit exercere." Two praiseworthy efforts have been commenced to supply this deficiency in the proposed editions of the Rev. G. H. Forbes, Burntisland, 8vo, 1855, and of Fr. Oehler, Halis, 8vo, 1865 (in which last it is to be regretted that sufficient care has not been exercised in the use of the MSS.); neither of which has, we believe, gone beyond the first volume. Oehler has also edited a selection from the works of Gregory Nyssen, accompanied by a good German translation (Bibliothek der Kirchen-Väter, Band 1–4, Leipzig, 1858–9). The later editions of Galland and Migne include some very important additions to the original Morellian edition, first given to the world by Zacagni (Collect. Monum. Vet. Eccl. Graec. Romae, 1698, 4to, tom. i.), and J. B. Caraccioli (Flor. 1731). Some valuable fragments from other sources are also published by Galland and by Mai (Nov. Collect. Vett. Script. vol. iii.). The familiar letters published by Zacagni and Caraccioli are very helpful towards forming an estimate of Gregory's character. They shew us a man of great refinement, with a love for natural beauty and a lively appreciation of the picturesque in scenery and of elegance in architecture. Of the latter art the detailed description given in his letter to Amphilocheius (Epist. 25), of an octagonal "martyrium" surmounted by a conical spire, rising from a clerestory supported on eight columns, proves him to have possessed considerable technical knowledge. It is perhaps the clearest, and most detailed description of an ecclesiastical building of the 4th century remaining to us. His letter to Adelphius (Epist. 20) furnishes a charming description of a country villa, and its groves and ornamental buildings, at Vanota in Galatia, on the banks of the Halys. He enlarges with evident delight on the vine-clad trellises laden with delicious grapes, the orchards of peaches and other fruits, the arbours bright with roses, the shrubberies vocal with the song of birds, and the stews filled with fish so tame that they came to be fed. Few passages of patristic literature will better repay perusal than this delightful letter, which makes us keenly regret the nearly total loss of his correspondence. He was commemorated in the Cal. Ethiop. on Nov. 22.

GREGORIUS (16), bishop of Merida from cir. 402. He is known to us only from the decretal of Innocent I. addressed ad universos episcopos in Tolosa (should be "qui in Toletæ congregati sunt"). (For a discussion of the mutilated and imperfect form in which this letter appears in the Spanish Codex Canonum, drawn up, according to the majority of authorities, before 633, and of the inferences to be drawn from its mutilation, see dispute between Fr. Maassen, Gesch. der Quellen und der Literatur des Kanonischen Rechtes, &c., and Gams, Theol. Theolog. Quartalschrift, 1867, 1–23, and Kirchengesch. ii. 2, 463.) Innocent's letter (which Jaffé dates 404) is concerned partly with the schism of those bishops of Baetica and Carthaginiensis who refused to acknowledge the authority of the council held at Toledo in A.D. 400, in which the once Priscillianist bishops, Symphosius and Dictinius, were readmitted to communion, and partly with certain irregularities in the manner of ordination then prevalent in Spain. The pope lays down that although strictly speaking the illegal ordinations already made ought to be cancelled, yet, for the sake of peace and to avoid tumults, what is past is to be condoned. The number of canonically invalid ordinations recently made is, he says, so great that if all were to be inquired into, the existing confusion would be made worse instead of better. "How many have been admitted to the priesthood who, like Rufinus and Gregory, have after baptism practised in the law courts? How many soldiers who, in obedience to authority, have been obliged to execute harsh orders (severa praecepta)? How many curiales who, in obedience also, have done whatever was commanded them? How many who have given amusements and spectacles to the people (voluptates et editiones populo celebrarunt) have become bishops? (See Gams's comments on Can. 2 of Council of Eliberi. ii. 1, 53.) "Quorum omnium neminem ne ad societatem quidem ordinis clericorum, oportuerat pervenire" (see Decret. cap. iv. Tejada y Ramiro; Col. de Can. ii). In cap. v. we have the second mention of Gregory, "Let the complaint, if any, of Gregory, bishop of Merida, ordained in place of Patruinus (who presided at C. Tol. i.) be heard, and if he has suffered injury contra meritum suum, let those who are envious of another's office be punished, lest in future the spirit of faction should again inconvenience good men."

From these notices it appears then that Gregory succeeded Patruinus in the metropolitan see of Merida shortly after the council of Toledo in 400. that in his youth and after baptism, he had practised as an advocate; that his election to the bishopric of Merida was therefore, strictly speaking, illegal, and that, either on this account or on some other, great opposition had been made to his appointment. The effect of Innocent's letter would naturally be to confirm him in his see and to discredit the party of opposition to him. In all probability, it was during Gregory's pontificate that the irruption of Vandals, Alani, and Suevi into Spain took place (in the autumn of 409, Idat. apud Esp. Sagr. iv. 353), and those scenes of horror and cruelty took place of which Idatius has left us a vivid, though possibly exaggerated, picture. After a first period of indiscriminate devastation and plunder, "Barbari ad pacem ineundam Domino miserante conversi, sorte ad habitandum sibi Provinciarum dividunt regiones" (Idat. l. c. ann. 411). In this division Lusitania and Carthaginensis fell to the Alani, themselves to be shortly destroyed by the Goths under Walga (418), and Merida with its splendid buildings and its Roman prestige, together with all the other great cities of southern Spain, "Barbarorum per Provincias dominantium se subjiciunt servituti."

Innocent's letter, in which the passages above quoted concerning Gregory occur, is extremely valuable for Spanish church history at the time. It is given in two forms by Tejada y Ramiro II.; in the incomplete and mutilated form in which it appears in the Spanish Cod. Canonum, and in the complete form containing all the names and historical matter, in which it appears in other collections. (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 163; Gams, Kirchengesch. ii. 1. 420.) [M. A. W.]

GREGORIUS (17), a bishop of Lydia. He was an adherent of Chrysostom, compelled to retire from his see to some place of concealment in his native country, where he was living in A.D. 408. (Pallad. Dial. 195.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (18), bishop of Tamalle in Eyzacene, present at Carth. Conf. 411. (Mon. Vet. Den. 128.) [H. W. P.]

GREGORIUS (19), bishop of Cerasus, supposed to be Chrisanda in Pontus, at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1123 c, 1214 d Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 515.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (20), a bishop of Lilybaeum of uncertain date, but probably between A.D. 200 and 450. He suffered martyrdom, but at what time, and whether under some Roman emperor or from the Vandals, is uncertain. (Acta SS. Jun. 5; Pirri, Sicil. Sacr. i. 492.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (21), bishop of Adrianople, metropolitan of the province of Haemimontus, at the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451; one of the bishops who subscribed the synodal letter of that council to Leo I. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 98, 1304, Migne); present also at the council held at Constantinople under Gennadius against simony, about A.D. 459. (Harduin, Acta Concil. ii. 785.) He was also one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo addressed his imperial letter in defence of the orthodox faith A.D. 457, on the occasion of the massacre of Proterius of Alexandria and the other excesses of the Egyptian Eutychians. No reply of Gregorius is extant, as in the case of many other of the metropolitans to whom the emperor's letter was addressed. (Harduin, Acta Concil. ii. 689; Oriens Christ. i. 1173; Tillemont, xv. p. 798.) [C. G.]

GREGORIUS (22), bishop of Sebastopolis in Lesser Armenia; his name is appended to the letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 589; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 426.) [L. D.]

GREGORIUS (23), supposed Sicilian bishop. There is a great doubt who and what he was. Such a person is supposed to have been driven from Africa during the Vandal persecutions of the 5th century, and to have found refuge in Sicily, where he afterwards met with martyrdom at the hands of some of the remaining heathen inhabitants. (Acta SS. Jun. 18.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (24), bishop of Modena, mentioned in a minatory letter of pope Simplicius to John, archbishop of Ravenna, who had ordained Gregory, much against his will, bishop of Modena (Simplic. Pap. ep. 2 in Patr. Lat. lviii. 35, dated by Jaffé May 30, 482, Reg. Pont. 50). Jaffé's date, if correct, must be the period of Gregory's consecration; but in the list of the bishops of Modena, according to Sillingardus (Catal. Episc. Mutinens. p. 14), Gregory sat from 477 to 501, coming between Theodorus and Bassianus. The same author details the circumstances under which Gregory was appointed. The see of Modena had been originally subject to Milan, but in 450 was transferred along with Bologna, Reggio, Parma, and Placentia, to Ravenna by the emperor Valentinian III., who wished thereby to increase the dignity of his capital city. Accordingly John of Ravenna claimed to consecrate the bishop of Modena, and pope Simplicius was appealed to on behalf of the rights of Milan. [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (26), bishop of Jericho at the council of Jerusalem, 536. (Mansi, viii. 1172; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 655.)

GREGORIUS (27), ST., twelfth bishop of Auxerre, between St. Theodosius and St. Optatus, early in the 6th century. He is said to have occupied the see twelve years and six months, and upon his death, in his eighty-fifth year, to have been buried in the church of St. Germanus. He is commemorated Dec. 19. (Gall. Christ. xii. 266.)

GREGORIUS (28), fourth bishop of Saintes, between St. Ambrosius and Petrus I., at the beginning of the 6th century. All we know of him is from the Acta of St. Germerius bishop of Toulouse, according to which that saint was ordained subdeacon and deacon by him; but these Acta, which purport to be the work of Pretiosus, a contemporary, are quite untrustworthy. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 592; Gall. Christ. ii. 1056; Gams, Series Episc. 623.)

GREGORIUS (29), ST., sixteenth bishop of Langres, succeeding Albiso. He belonged to one of the highest Gallic families, being related to Euphronius archbishop of Tours, and likewise great-grandfather of Gregory the historian, who wrote a short account of him. He was the uncle, too, of that Attalus who was one of the hostages given by Childebert to Theodoric, and after his rescue from slavery by one of Gregory's servants became count of Autun. It was not till late in life that he dedicated himself to the church. For forty years he was count of Autun, and remarkable for his inflexible justice. Upon the death of his wife, Armentaria, "he turned to the Lord," in Gregory's phrase, and was elected and consecrated bishop of Langres (A.D. 506). As bishop he was noted for his unostentatious abstinence, and his secret midnight devotions in the baptistery at Dijon, where he usually lived. Numerous miracles also are recorded of him, and especially the finding of the body of St. Benignus, the martyr of Dijon (A.D. 178), which his biographer relates at length (De Glor. Mart. li.). It was Gregory who induced St. John, the founder of Réomay who had left his monastery and retreated to Lérins, to return to his post and not abandon his undertaking (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 856). Gregory was at the council of Epaon in A.D. 517, and that of Clermont in 535, and was represented by Evantius a priest at the third of Orleans in 538.

He died of a fever caught in walking from Dijon to Langres to be present at the services of the Epiphany (probably in 539), and was buried, as he had desired, in a church within the walls of Dijon. His son and successor in the see, Tetricus, translated his remains into a more gorgeous tomb. He was commemorated Jan. 4.

A vapid epitaph was written on him by Venantius Fortunatus. (Greg. Tur. Vitas Patr. vii.; Hist. Franc. iii. 15, 19, iv. 15, v. 5; De Glor. Mart. li.; Venant. Fort. Miscell. iv. 2; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 153; Boll. Acta SS.

GREGORIUS (30), thirteenth bishop of Geneva, between Pappulus I. and Nicerius, about the middle of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 381.)

GREGORIUS (31) THEOPOLITANUS, bishop of Antioch A.D. 569-594. In his earliest youth he devoted himself to a monastic life, and he became so celebrated for his austerities that when scarcely past boyhood he was chosen superior of the Syrian laura of Pharon or Pharan (Moschus), called by Evagrius the monastery of the Byzantines. Moschus had the following anecdote relating to this period of his life from Sergius the Armenian in the monastery of the Eunuchs near the Jordan, and the occurrence is placed by the narrator six years before Gregory became patriarch of Theopolis, as Antioch was then called. Sergius was earnestly importuned by Gregory to conduct him to his venerable master, another Sergius dwelling by the Dead Sea. When the latter Sergius saw Gregory approach he cordially saluted him, brought water, washed his feet, and conversed with him upon spiritual subjects the whole day. Sergius the disciple afterwards reminded his master that he had never treated other visitors, although some of them had been bishops and presbyters, as he had treated father Gregory. "Who father Gregory may be," the old man replied, "I know not; but this I know, I have entertained a patriarch in my cave, and I have seen him carry the sacred pallium and the Gospel." (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 139, 140, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 189.) From Pharan Gregory was summoned by Justin II. to preside over the monastery of Mount Sinai. During the period of his rule this monastery sustained a siege from the Arabs, which placed it in extreme danger (Evagr. H. E. v. 6). On the expulsion of Anastasius bishop of Antioch by Justin in 569, Gregory was appointed his successor. Theophanes (Chronog. A.C. 562, p. 206) does not mention his appointment at Mount Sinai, but makes him promoted from the first-named monastery. His administration is highly praised by the ecclesiastical historian Evagrius, who was then practising as an advocate at Antioch, and was fortunate enough to obtain the favour of the new patriarch. Evagrius ascribes to Gregorius almost every possible excellence, an imposing person and sweet address, quickness of perception and promptitude in execution, dauntless courage both in meeting danger and in confronting the secular power, and prudence in counsel both for himself and for others. Vehement in his indignation when occasion called for it, he was equally conspicuous for his gentleness and meekness. Moschus describes him as famous for his alms, his forgetfulness of injuries, and his tears of compassion for sinners. When Chosroes I. had again invaded the Roman territory, A.D. 572, Gregory, who was kept informed of the real state of affairs by his friend the bishop of Nisibis, which was then being besieged by the Roman forces, vainly endeavoured to rouse the feeble emperor from his habitual self-indulgence and lethargy, by representations of the successes of the Persian forces and the incompetence of the imperial commanders. His letters were treated with contempt by Justin, who refused to believe in any serious danger, and during the intervals of the shocks of an earthquake which had thrown down a considerable portion of the city walls, and had compelled Gregory to take refuge in flight with the treasures of the church, the bishop had the mortification of witnessing Antioch occupied by the troops of Adaormanes, the general of Chosroes (Evagr. E. H. v. 9). The latter years of Gregory's episcopate were clouded by his extreme unpopularity with his people, and embittered by a succession of grave accusations. Soon after the accession of Tiberius, an intimacy with the successful adventurer Anatolius, who was charged with sorcery and other abominable crimes, raised a violent popular suspicion against him, and though examination by torture failed to elicit anything from Anatolius to criminate the bishop, he was placed in extreme danger (ibid. c. 18). In the reign of Maurice, A.D. 588, a quarrel with Asterius, the popular Count of the East, again excited the passions of the excitable Antiochenes against their bishop. All classes united to heap insult upon him, every one declaring he had suffered some injury from him. He could not appear in public without being openly reviled by the mob, and even the actors turned him into ridicule on the stage. On the removal of Asterius, his successor, John, was commissioned by the emperor to make formal enquiry into the charges against Gregory. Among them was one so foul, incest with his own sister, and he felt so little hope of justice at Antioch, John having openly sided with the popular feeling against him, that he applied to the emperor and claimed to be heard before a synod. He proceeded to Constantinople, accompanied by Evagrius as his legal adviser, c. A.D. 589, and the charges having been investigated before a mixed court, partly ecclesiastical and partly secular, he received a triumphant acquittal, his accuser being condemned to be scourged through the city and banished (ibid. vi. 7). Gregory returned to Antioch to witness its almost total destruction by earthquake, A.D. 589, from which he barely escaped with his life (ibid. c. 8). The widespread discontent of the imperial forces, which was soon to issue in the deposition and murder of Maurice and the elevation of Phocas, having extended to Syria, the troops on the Persian frontier broke out into open mutiny. They drove away their general, Priscus, and refused to accept Philippicus, whom Maurice had sent to succeed him. In this emergency, Gregory, who by his largesses had made himself very popular with the troops, was despatched to bring them back to their allegiance. He was suffering so severely from gout that he had to be conveyed to the camp in a litter, from which he addressed the army with such moving eloquence that they at once consented to accept Philippicus as their commander. His harangue is preserved to us by his grateful friend Evagrius (ibid. c. 11-13). Soon after this his diplomatic skill caused him to be selected by the emperor Maurice as an ambassador to the younger Chosroes, when compelled by his disasters to take refuge in the imperial territory, A.D. 590 or 591, and his advice was instrumental in the recovery of his throne, for which the grateful monarch sent him some gold and jewelled crosses, and other valuable presents (ibid. c. 18-21). In spite of his age and infirmities, he conducted a visitation of the remoter portions of his patriarchate, which were much infected with the doctrines of Severus, and succeeded in bringing back whole tribes, as well as many separate villages and monasteries, into union with the catholic church (ibid. c. 22). After this he paid a visit to Simeon Stylites the younger, who was suffering from a mortal disease, in the hope of receiving his last breath, but was disappointed (ibid. c. 23). Soon after he appears to have resigned his see into the hands of the deposed patriarch Anastasius, who resumed his patriarchal authority in 594. His own death very soon followed. He was poisoned by an excessive dose of the medicine administered to relieve his gout, A.D. 594 (ibid. c. 24). His extant works consist of a homily in Mulieres unguentiferas, printed in Greek by Combefis (Auctiar. Nov. tom. i. p. 727). It is found in Galland (Bibl. Patr. xii. 289), and Migne (Patrol. lxxxviii. p. 1847). There are also two sermons by him on the Baptism of Christ, which have been erroneously ascribed to Chrysostom. Evagrius also attributes to him a volume of historical collections, now lost (Evagr. H. E. vi. 24). (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. 102; Cave, Hist. Lat. i. 534.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (32) TURONENSIS, bishop of Tours (cir. 573-594). 1. Authorities.—For the life of Gregory, the principal materials are to be found in his own writings. The Vita S. Gregorii Episc. Turon. per Odonem Abbatem, generally published along with his works, is almost entirely based upon what Gregory says of himself. The Odo Abbas, to whom it is attributed in all the printed editions from that of 1511 downwards, is conjectured to have been St. Odo, abbat of Cluny (died 948), who was a native of Tours. There is another short life of Gregory by Joannes Egidius (Jean Gilles) of Tours; it is of the 16th century, and of small value. It is to be found in Bordier's edition of the Miracula, &c. vol. iv. pp. 234-7. There are numerous allusions to Gregory in the poems of Venantius Fortunatus, a contemporary, but there are not many facts to be gleaned from them, nor from the Testimonia of other writers collected in the fourth volume of Guadet and Taranne's edition of Gregory's History.

Gregory himself gives a list of his works. At the end of his history he says, "Decem libros historiarum, septem miraculorum, unum de vitis Patrum scripsi: in Psalterii tractatum librum unum commentatus sum: de cursibus etiam ecclesiasticis unum librum condidi." (Bk. x. ch. 31, sub fine). Of these all are extant except the commentary on the Psalms, of which only fragments exist, collected in the third volume of Bordier's edition, pp. 401 sqq. The treatise De Cursibus ecclesiasticis was supposed to be lost till Professor F. Haase of Breslau discovered what he believed to be it in a MS. in the library at Bamberg, and published it under the title of S. Georgii Florentii Gregorii Tur. Ep. Liber ineditus de Cursu Stellarum, ratio qualiter ad officium implendum debet observari, sive de Cursibus Ecclesiasticis, Breslau, 1853. Professor Haase adds a short preface and a facsimile of a page of the MS., as well as notes, in which he compares the language of this treatise with that of the other known works of Gregory. The assumption that this work entitled De Cursu Stellarum, &c., is identical with Gregory's de Cursibus Ecclesiasticis is founded on the similarity of its style to that of Gregory, and on the fact that it was written by a native of Auvergne in the time of Gregory. The MS. itself contains no ascription of authorship. The treatise has been since reprinted from Haase's edition by Bordier in his fourth volume.

Of the seven books of the Miracles the first, "De Gloria Martyrum," deals with the miracles of our Lord, the apostles, and many early saints, in 117 chapters; the second book is entitled "De Miraculis S. Juliani martyris"; books iii.-vi., "De Miraculis S. Martini"; the seventh book, "De Gloria Confessorum," recounts the miracles of many Gallic saints.

Besides the above, Gregory appears to have translated the Passion of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus (Glor. Mart. 95), and to have translated or edited the Liber de Miraculis B. Andreae Apostoli, that is to say, to have written a short preface to it (see Bordier, iv. pp. 29 sqq.; cp. Monod, p. 39), as he tells us he had edited the Missae of Sidonius Apollinaris ("Quod in praefatione libri, quem de Missis ab eo compositis conjunximus, plenius declaravimus"). (Hist. ii. 21.) There are various other biographies of saints or accounts of their miracles attributed to Gregory, generally on the authority merely of ascriptions in the MSS., sometimes through the error of treating separate parts of the various Libri de Miraculis as independent works. Ruinart (Preface) has discussed in detail the claims of these various tracts to authenticity, deciding definitely in favour of none; Monod (p. 39) acknowledges Gregory's hand in the Miracula S. Andreae. There is little or no probability in the theory sometimes advanced that Gregory is the author of another Chronicle, or of the Gesta Francorum. The Historia Epitomata of Fredegar and the Gesta Francorum no doubt are made up mainly of extracts from Gregory, but by no means are on that account to be attributed to his authorship. Compare Bordier, vol. iv. pp. 29-32.

Gregory himself gives instructions as regards the editing and preservation of his works. "Although," he says, "these books of mine are written in a somewhat unpolished style, I nevertheless adjure all the priests of the Lord, who after my unworthy self shall be pastors of the church of Tours, I adjure them by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the day of judgment, a day of terror to all the wicked, as they hope to escape confusion and damnation at that dread day, that they shall never suffer these books of mine to be destroyed or to be copied with selections and omissions (quasi quaedam legentes et quasi quaedam praetermittentes); but these my books shall remain with my successors, complete and unaltered as I have bequeathed them." (Hist. x. 31, s. f.)

2. Editions of the Works of Gregory, and Literature of the Subject.—The first edition of the History was published at Paris at the press of Ascensius in 1512,* the Vita and the Miracles of St. Martin, together with some of the Opuscula, had appeared in the previous year, edited by Clichtoveus. The best text of the works, the standard of all subsequent editions, is that of Ruinart, published at Paris in 1699. A new text of the History, founded on a careful recension of all the extant MSS., has been promised for many years for Pertz's Monumenta, but has not yet been published. The History is to be found in the second volume of Bouquet, as also in the collections of La Bigne, Duchesne, and Migne. Of recent editions, the most complete are those of the Société de l'Histoire de France, with French translations and notes, viz. the Histoire ecclésiastique des Français, edited by MM. Guadet et Taranne (4 vols. 1836-8), and Les Livres des Miracles et autres Opuscules, including the Vita, extracts from Fortunatus, &c., by M. H. L. Bordier (4 vols. 1857-64). M. Bordier has published a separate translation of the History, founded upon that of MM. Guadet and Taranne (2 vols. Paris, Didot, 1859-61). Of the numerous other French translations of the History the best known is that by M. Guizot, originally published in his Collection des Mémoires relatifs à l'Histoire de France, 1823, and republished in 1861 (2 vols. Didier), edited by M. Alfred Jacobs, who has appended thereto his treatise on the Geography of Gregory of Tours, and other valuable matter. There is a German translation, with an admirable introduction by W. Giesebrecht, in Pertz's Geschichtsschreiber der Deutschen Vorzeit, Lieferungen 12 and 16, or vi. Jahrhundert, Bde. 4 and 5.

Of the commentaries and works bearing on the life and writings of Gregory, the most important and thorough, besides the prefaces, &c., of Ruinart, Bordier, Jacobs, and Giesebrecht above referred to, are Löbell's Gregor von Tours und seine Zeit, 2nd edit. 1869, and Gabriel Monod's Études critiques sur l'Époque mérovingienne, pt. i. 1872, being Fascicule No. 9 of the Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes Études. Compare also Wattenbach's Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 3rd edit. 1873, and for the more detailed bibliography of the subject Monod, pp. 23-24; also Répertoire des Sources historiques du Moyen Âge, par Ulysse Chevalier, Paris, 1877-8, Potthast's Wegweiser, s. v., and Bordier, vol. iv. M. Monod gives a critical list of the extant MSS. of Gregory (pp. 50-54), and examines in detail the textual objections brought against the authenticity of various parts of the history (chap. 3).

3. Life of Gregory.—Georgius Florentius (subsequently called Gregorius, after his great-grandfather St. Gregory, bishop of Langres), son of Florentius and Armentaria, of noble or senatorial family in Auvergne, was born on St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30) of the year 538. So Monod, p. 28, relying chiefly on the passage in the Mir. Murt. iii. 10. Previous authorities have generally placed his birth in the year 543, from the passage in the Vita which states that he was thirty years old at the time of his episcopal consecration, which took place in 573.

Members of his father's and mother's families had held high office both in church and state.

besides the History of Gregory) gives 1522. But that is evidently a misprint, for the 'Privilege du Roi' which is on the reverse of the same folio is dated 1511, and the separate colophon of the History gives 1512.

* Not 1522, as Potthast, Monod, and others. The colophon of the book (which contains other works

His grandfather, Georgius, on the father's side, and his great-grandfather, Florentius, on the mother's side (V. P. 8, 1) had been senators at Clermont. Gallus, son of Georgius and uncle of Gregory, had become bishop of Auvergne; another uncle, Nicetius or Nizier, bishop of Lyons (H. v. 5, V. P. 8); another, Gundulf, had risen to ducal rank (H. vi. 11). Gregory, bishop of Langres, and originally count of Autun, was his great-grandfather, and all the previous bishops of Tours, except five, had been of his family (v. 50). It is with justifiable pride, therefore, that he asserts (V. P. 6) that none in Gaul could boast of purer and nobler blood than himself.

His father appears to have died early, and Gregory received most of his education from his uncle Gallus, bishop of Auvergne. The history of his adopting the clerical profession is told by himself. Being sick of a fever in his youth, he found relief by visiting the shrine of St. Illidius, the patron saint of Clermont. The fever however returned, and Gregory's life was despaired of. Being again carried to St. Illidius' shrine he vowed to God to dedicate himself to the ministry if he recovered, nor would he quit the shrine till his prayer was granted (V. P. 2, 2).

Armentaria, Gregory's mother, returned to Burgundy, her native country, and Gregory apparently lived with Avitus, at first archdeacon, afterwards bishop of Auvergne, who carried on the work of his education. Avitus directed his pupil rather to the study of ecclesiastical than of secular works. It is Avitus that Gregory looks upon as in the fullest sense his spiritual father. "It was his teaching and preaching," he says, "that, next to the Psalms of David, led me to recognise that Jesus Christ the Son of God had come into the world to save sinners, and caused me to reverence and honour those as the friends and disciples of Christ who take up His cross and follow in His steps." (V. P. 2, Intr.) By Avitus he was ordained deacon, probably about the year 563. (Monod, 29.)

Of Gregory's life before he became bishop of Tours few details are known. There are allusions to various journeys from Auvergne to Burgundy to visit his mother (Mir. Mart. i. 36, iii. 60; Gl. Conf. 85; Gl. Mart. 84), whose affection and piety he on more than one occasion commemorates (Mir. Mart. iii. 10, V. P. v. 12, Monod, 28-29), and he appears to have been well known at Tours before he became bishop (Mir. Mart. i. 32, Vita, ch. ii.); for it was in consequence of the expressed wish of the whole people of Tours, clergy and laity, that Sigebert appointed him, in 573, to the see. He was consecrated by Egidius of Rheims.

He was known to and favoured by Radegund the widow of Clotaire I., foundress of St. Cross at Poitiers, and according to Fortunatus her favour was of weight in bringing about his election to the bishopric of Tours.

Quem patris Egidii Domine manus alma sacravit
Ut populum recreet, quem Radegundis amet;
Huic Sigebertus ovans favet et Brunehildis honor,
Judicio regia, nobile culmen adest. (Carm. v. 3.)

The elevation of Gregory to the see of Tours was contemporary with the renewed outbreak of civil war between Sigebert and Chilperic, the former of whom had inherited the Austrasian, the latter the Neustrian, possessions of their father Clotaire I. (died 561). Of the other sons of Clotaire, Guntram had obtained Burgundy with Orleans as his capital, and Charibert Aquitaine together with Touraine and other territories. On Charibert's death in 567 (so G. Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Reichs, s. a.; in 570 according to Giesebrecht) his possessions were divided, each of the three sons obtaining one-third share in Paris, which thus became a kind of federal capital, Sigebert Touraine, Chilperic, besides his share of Paris, only a few cities in Aquitaine (v. CHARIBERT, CHILPERIC, and on these divisions Bonnell, Anfänge des Karol. Hauses, pp. 206-215). Chilperic seized upon Tours and Poitiers (H. iv. 46), but his son Clovis was expelled from thence by the united forces of Guntram and Sigebert under Mummolus. Again later (probably in 573-4, Richter, but the chronology is very obscure), Chilperic sent a plundering expedition into Touraine under his eldest son Theodebert (H. iv. 48). Fearful destruction was committed, and "the lamentations of the church were worse than in the days of the persecution of Diocletian." In the following year (575), however, Theodebert was defeated and slain by Guntram Boso and Godegisel, Sigebert's generals (iv. 51), and Touraine regained for Sigebert. Almost immediately afterwards Sigebert was assassinated at Fredegund's instigation, and Chilperic recovered Tours (v. 13, 14, 49), which remained in his possession till his death in 584.

The possession of Touraine and Poitou was thus in some sort the occasion of the war, and these countries suffered from the devastation and ravages of both parties. Gregory's sympathies were with Sigebert, from whom he had originally obtained his bishopric (Vita S. Greg. § 11), and the people of Tours were generally (iv. 50), though not unanimously (iv. 46), on the Austrasian side. Cruel and regardless of human life though all the Merovingian princes appear to have been, Chilperic, according to Gregory, was conspicuously so; he was the "Nero and Herod of his age" (vi. 46); he not only plundered and burned throughout the country, but he specially destroyed churches and monasteries, slew priests and monks, and paid no regard to the possessions of St. Martin (iv. 48).

Tours remained under the subjection of Chilperic till his death in 584, and some of the best traits in Gregory's character appear in the resistance which he made to the murderous violence of the king and the truculent treachery of Fredegund. Thus he braved their wrath and refused to surrender their rebellious son Meroveus (H. v. 14), and their enemy Guntram Boso who had defeated and killed Theodebert (v. 4), both of whom had taken sanctuary at the shrine of St. Martin; and Gregory alone of the bishops dared to rebuke Chilperic for his unjust conduct towards Praetextatus, and to protect Praetextatus from the vengeance of Fredegund (v. 19). So, too, when Chilperic wanted to force on his people his views of the doctrine of the Trinity, Gregory withstood him. Chilperic recited to Gregory what he had written on the subject, and added, "I will that such shall be your belief and that of all the other doctors of the church." "Do not deceive yourself, my lord king," Gregory replied, "you must follow in this matter the teaching of the apostles and doctors of the church, the teaching of Hilary and Eusebius, the confession that you made at baptism." "It appears then," angrily exclaimed the king, "that Hilary and Eusebius are my declared enemies in this matter." "No," said Gregory; "neither God nor His saints are your enemies," and he proceeded to expound to the king the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. Chilperic was very angry. "I shall set forth my ideas to those who are wiser than you, and they will approve of them." "Never," answered the bishop; "it would be no wise man, but a lunatic, that would adopt such views as yours." (v. 45.)

Gregory had a persistent and treacherous enemy in Leudastes, a man of low origin, who had risen under Charibert to be count of Tours, and who held the same post under Chilperic (v. 49). When removed from office because of his misdeeds, he endeavoured to take revenge on Gregory by maligning him by false accusations to the king, that he was going to deliver over the city to Childebert, Sigebert's son, and finally that Gregory had spread a report that Fredegund had committed adultery with Bertrand, bishop of Bordeaux. Whether there was any concerted scheme of Fredegund's to bring about Gregory's ruin is not clear. Anyhow the king was very angry, "beat and kicked" Leudastes severely, and cast him into prison. Leudastes appealed to the evidence of Riculfus, a clerk of Tours, and a declared enemy of Gregory. Chilperic summoned a council of the bishops of the kingdom at Braine, near Soissons, to investigate the charge. Popular sympathy was entirely on Gregory's side, a woodcutter, Modestus, being unable to restrain his indignation, and suffering for his pains, and the people outside making an uproar during the council (v. 50). Gregory entirely denied the charge, he had neither heard of nor spoken of such a thing. It was found that the accusation rested solely on the evidence of Leudastes and Riculfus. All agreed that the witness of an inferior was not to be believed against a priest and his superior ("non potest persona inferior supersacerdotem credi"), and so Gregory was acquitted on condition of solemnly disclaiming on oath all cognizance of the charge. Leudastes fled, Riculfus was condemned to death; at Gregory's intercession he was spared death, but not torture, which in the most horrible forms was inflicted on him (v. 48-50, Grégoire de Tours au Concile de Braine, par S. Prioux, Paris, 1847, is a mere réchauffé of Gregory's own account of these proceedings, and of no independent critical value). The subsequent fate of Leudastes illustrates the best side of Gregory's character. After being a fugitive in different parts of Gaul, Leudastes presented himself at Tours to have his excommunication removed with a view to marrying and settling there. For this end he brought letters from several bishops, but none from queen Fredegund, his principal enemy, and when Gregory wrote to her, she replied by asking Gregory to postpone receiving back Leudastes into communion till further inquiry had been made. Gregory, suspicious of Fredegund's design, warned Leudastes' father-in-law, and besought him to induce Leudastes to keep quiet till Fredegund's anger was appeased. "This advice," says Gregory, "I gave sincerely, and for the love of God, but Leudastes suspected treachery and refused to take it: so the proverb was fulfilled which I once heard an old man tell, 'Always give good counsel to both friend and foe; the friend will take it, the foe will despise it.'" Leudastes went to the king to get his pardon; Chilperic was willing, but warned him to be careful till the queen's wrath was appeased. Leudastes rashly tried to force forgiveness from the queen. Fredegund was implacable and furious, and Leudastes was put to death with great cruelty. "He deserved his death," says Gregory, "for he had ever led a wicked life" (vi. 32).

During the wars that followed the death of Chilperic Touraine and Poitou were again the subject of contention, and again suffered accordingly. Their desire was to be subject to Childebert, Sigebert's son, that is, to resume their allegiance to the Austrasian king; but they were compelled to submit to Guntram, the king of Orleans and Burgundy (vii. 12, 13), and under his power they remained till the treaty of Andelot in 587, in concluding which Gregory was one of Childebert's commissioners, when they were restored to Childebert (iv. 20). Gregory appeared during this period at the courts of both sovereigns; at Guntram's court at Orleans (viii. 2), and again at Coblenz with Childebert (viii. 13). Guntram was guardian of Childebert, and had adopted him as his heir, and one of the terms of the treaty of Andelot was that the survivor of the two should be the heir of him who died first. Guntram died in 593 and Childebert succeeded, and the latest notice in Gregory's writings is the visit of Childebert to Orleans after Guntram's death. (Mir. S. Martin, iv. 37.) The story in the Vita (c. 24) of Gregory's visit to Rome is very improbable (Monod, p. 37). Gregory himself died on Nov. 17, 594.

Gregory's activity was not confined to the general affairs of the kingdom. He was even more zealous for what concerned the welfare of his own and the neighbouring dioceses. He was much occupied in his later years with the disturbances caused by Chrothildis in the nunnery at Poitiers which had been founded by Gregory's friend St. Radegund. Gregory's first interference was ineffectual (ix. 39 sqq.), but the disturbance having increased, and having caused an émeute in the town, the two kings, Guntram and Childebert, appointed a joint commission of bishops to inquire into the matter. Gregory was one of Childebert's commissioners, but he refused to enter upon the work until the civil disturbance had been actually repressed (x. 15, 16). So too he had a great deal of trouble with another rebellious nun, Berthegunda (ix. 33, x. 12).

With the city of Tours itself his relations were peculiarly intimate. He not only magnifies his office as bishop, but he takes a kind of family pride in it, when he says that all previous bishops of Tours, with only five exceptions, were of his family (H. v. 50; see above), and he magnifies the sanctity and power of Tours' great patron St. Martin. He maintained the rights of sanctuary of the shrine in favour of the most powerful offenders, and in spite of the wrath of Chilperic and Fredegund (e.g. Meroveus, Guntram Boso, Ebrulfus, vii. 22, 29). He was a builder of churches in the city and see, and especially a rebuilder of the great church of St. Martin (x. 31). He did his best to arbitrate in and appease the bloody feuds within the city, whether springing from private or political partisanship (vii. 47), and he was a rigorous and effectual defender of the exemption of the city from increased taxation (ix. 20). Evidently a man of unselfish earnestness and energy, he was popular in the city with all. It was to the popularity of his early years that he owed his election to the see (Vita, ch. 11); that his popularity continued during life is manifested at the council of Braine and on many other occasions, and his popularity at death is attested by his almost immediate veneration as a saint. And his sanctity, his biographer (Vita, pref.) says, was manifested not so much by the working of miracles, as in being meek and lowly of heart, and so following in the footsteps of Christ.

4. The Writings of Gregory.—Gregory began to write first as bishop, and was induced to begin on the Miracles of St. Martin by the increasing wonders which had been wrought by the saint, since his life and miracles had been recorded by Paulinus and Severus, and by a vision of his own mother, who urged him to undertake the work (Mir. S. Martin i. pref.).

Giesebrecht (Pref. pp. 26, 27) concludes from the fact that Venantius Fortunatus, in 576, alludes to the work of Gregory on the Miracles of St. Martin, that a first draft of at least a part of it, probably the first two books, must have been written by that time. These two books, however, were not completed till 583, the third book not before 587, and the fourth was still being written at the time of Gregory's death. Contemporaneous with the writing of the Miracles of St. Martin was the composition of the Miracles of St. Julianus and the Gloria Martyrum about the year 585. Gregory continued his labours in the same field in the Gloria Confessorum (completed 588) and the Vitae Patrum, the latter of which was continued till the time of his death. It is probable, from internal evidence, that Gregory was in the habit of making from time to time improvements and additions to what he had written.

The history appears to have been written contemporaneously with the books of the Miracles of the Saints, and most probably in several divisions and at different times. Giesebrecht who has carefully investigated the internal evidence bearing on this subject comes to the following conclusions. The history was originally written at three separate periods, and it falls into three separate divisions. The first division, comprising Books i.—iv. and the first half of Book v., was probably composed about the year 577; the second division, from the middle of Book v. to the end of the 37th chapter of Book viii., in the years 584 and 585; the remainder of the work in the years 590 and 591. The last chapter of the last book is an epilogue, separately composed; for the history as a history is unfinished. Had Gregory desired to bring it to completion he probably would have carried it on at least to the death of Guntram in March 593. As in the case of the books of the Miracles Gregory appears to have revised his History, and we find in the earlier books insertions, references to Gregory's other works, and references to events of later date. This revision does not appear to have reached further than the end of the sixth book; hence it is that several MSS., and these the most ancient, contain only the first six books, and the authors of the Hist. Epit. and of the Gesta Reg. Franc. appear to have known only these first six books. The conclusions of Monod with regard to the dates of the composition of Gregory's works are substantially the same as those of Giesebrecht. In the History he also finds a threefold division, namely, Books i. to iv. composed about 576; Books v. and vi., composed from 584 to 587; Books vii. to x. in 590 and 591; and the Epilogue or last chapter in 592. (Monod, pp. 115–119.)

The difficulty, that if the composition of the books of the Miracles and of the History was contemporaneous, there would be allusions to the History in the books of the Miracles, as there are allusions to the books of the Miracles in the History, is got over by Giesebrecht by the conjecture that, as Gregory intended his History to be for the use of posterity (Hist. i. pref.), whilst the books of the Miracles were for the edification of contemporaries, he kept the History secret during his lifetime and did not publish it in any form (p. 31).

Gregory begins his History, like most chroniclers of the time, with the Creation, and his first book is founded on, and in many cases made up of extracts from, Eusebius, Jerome, and Orosius (Hist. i. Prol. sub fine, ch. 34, 37). In the second book, which treats of the Frankish conquests, he still owes much to Orosius and to the Lives of the Saints, and quotes from the works of Renatus Frigidarius and Sulpicius Alexander (ii. 9), two writers of the 5th century, whose works are no longer extant. But from this point onwards he writes directly from oral tradition and unwritten authorities. The third and fourth books, dealing with events down to 575, two years after Gregory became bishop, are, compared with those which follow, meagre and not chronologically arranged, giving prominence to events which took place in Auvergne and Burgundy, the districts in which Gregory passed his childhood (Monod, p. 102). From 575 the narrative becomes fuller and more systematic, the intervals of time being regularly marked. And as the writer becomes himself a more and more important personage in the state, so he is able to give more and more details about state affairs. (Giesebrecht, pp. 32–34. Monod, in his 4th chapter, investigates the comparative value in different parts of the work of the documentary and oral sources of Gregory's history.)

Gregory apologizes on more than one occasion for the rudeness of his style. He has had no practice, he says (Gloria Conf. sub init.), in letters, he cannot distinguish the true character and meaning of words, he mistakes masculine for feminine and feminine for masculine, &c. (cp. Hist. pref., and Hist. book i. pref.). And doubtless this rudeness to a certain degree produces obscurity, and has damaged his reputation in modern times, though Sigebert of Gemblour (quoted by Monod, p. 111) gives him the highest praise, "Gregorius Turonensis episcopus, vii magnae nobilitatis et simplicitatis, scripsit multa simplici sermone." But rough though his style might be, Gregory was far from being without learning or culture such as his age could afford. Though ignorant of Greek, he had a fair acquaintance with Latin authors, quoting or referring to Livy, Pliny, Cicero, Aulus Gellius, &c. (Monod, 112).

In the art of the historian as such, he is quite unskilled; that is to say, he does not attempt to make his history a consistent and well-balanced whole. He cannot subordinate that which is of local to that which is of general interest. The length and fulness of his recital of particular events depends not upon their intrinsic importance but upon the amount of information he has at his command. Hence the great detail in which he recites the quarrels of Ingeltruda and Berthegunda at Tours (H. ix. 33 sqq.) and of Chrodieldis at Poitiers, matters of merely local interest, but with which he had a very immediate connexion.

So too he follows the dramatic method of writing history, putting speeches into the mouths of individuals which are the composition of the author, not the authentic utterance of the individual. Again, he does not attempt to estimate the value of the evidence of his informants. He retails immediately and at first hand whatever is given to him on fairly credible authority. As to his own words and works, he plainly gives us exactly what he himself has said and done. Never at any time does he repress his personal individuality.

Where, however, he depends upon written authorities he is, in detail, untrustworthy. Where he borrows from writers now extant, and can be compared with them, as in the first two books of the History, his inaccuracy is found to be considerable; he transcribes carelessly, and often instead of transcribing he cites from memory, giving the substance of that which he has read, and that not correctly (see instances ap. Monod, pp. 80 sqq.). It may be laid down generally that little confidence can be placed in his narrative of events outside of Gaul, and less confidence in proportion as the scene of action is farther removed from Gaul.

His authority as an historian, that is to say, his sincerity and impartiality, has been attacked in modern times on various grounds; that he unduly favours the church, or that he traduces the church in the recital he gives of the wickedness of the bishops of the time, or that he traduces the character of the Franks (Kries, De Gregorii Turonensis episcopi vita et scriptis, Breslau, 1859), whether from motives of race-jealousy or any other.

With regard to his ecclesiastical sympathies Gregory looks upon history as a struggle of the church against unbelief in the heathen and heretics, and against worldly-mindedness in professing Christians. In accordance with this view he begins his History with a confession of the orthodox faith (Scripturus bella Regum cum gentibus adversis, Martyrum cum paganis, Ecclesiarum cum haereticis, prius fidem meam proferre cupio, ut qui legerit, me non dubitet esse catholicum.—Hist. i. Prol.). The epithet ecclesiastica applied to the History from Ruinart's time is a misnomer if used in the ordinary modern sense, for Gregory specially defends his method of mixing in his recital things secular and religious (mixte confusque tam virtutes sanctorum, quam strages gentium memoramus.—Hist. ii. Prol.). Of course with a man so passionate and impressionable as Gregory, the fact of his being a priest and the bishop of the see of St. Martin, the ecclesiastical and religious centre of Gaul, does influence his feelings and actions towards individuals. Hence to a certain degree it is that Guntram, the friend of the bishops and of Gregory, is the "good" king Guntram, and Chilperic, who delights in bitter raillery against bishops, is the "Nero and Herod" of his time. But even if ecclesiastical prejudices may have so far influenced Gregory's mode of speech, they did not prevent him reciting events as they were told to him, even though he might have to relate molestation of bishops on the part of Guntram, or deference to bishops, even to Gregory himself, on the part of Chilperic. His professional feelings, no doubt, affect the praise and blame which he assigns to individuals, and the reprobation with which he speaks of evil deeds, but the "impartiality of his narrative corrects the partiality of his judgment" (Monod, p. 134). And that in both directions, for although Gregory's patriotism was love of the church and not love of his country, he is not prevented thereby from recording the evil deeds of bishops and priests, such as were the turbulent Salonius and Sagittarius (H. v. 21), the adulterous Dagulf (viii. 19), the immoral Palladius and Bertrand (viii. 7), the drunken Droctigisel (ix. 37, cp. x. 14).

On the much-disputed question of the relation of the Gallo-Roman subjects to the conquering Franks, Gregory gives no support to the theory that there was a continuous contest of races going on in Gaul, still less that that was a vital political principle at the time. Gregory was himself, as he tells us, a Roman, and he speaks of the Franks often as barbarians, but barbarians in the ancient not in the modern sense of the word. He shews no rancour in treating of the Frankish conquerors, such as would be natural in the victim of an oppressed nationality. Löbell treats elaborately of the question of the distinction and jealousy of Romans and Teutons from the ethnographical point of view (pp. 57-83), and shews further that after the first days of the conquest there was no political subjection of Roman to Teuton as such, and that Romans were not excluded from offices and dignities because of their birth (pp. 101-118).

Whatever may be the defects of the history of Gregory, due generally to the character of the author and lying sufficiently on the surface, his work remains as the great and in many respects the only authority for the history of the 6th century. During that dark period, when the forces out of which the nations of Western Europe and European civilization were to arise, were still in conflict, Gregory's fresh and simple, though not unbiassed, narrative is of the greatest value. He tells us exactly what the Franks were like, and what life in Gaul was like. He tells us, in so far as he knows them, all the facts, and he gives us his own judgment on them. We may agree with that judgment or not, but at any rate we are not kept in the dark as to the evidence upon which that judgment is founded.

[T. R. B.]

GREGORIUS (33) I., bishop of Agrigentum, in the 6th and 7th centuries. He was the author of an extant Greek commentary in ten books on Ecclesiastes. The latest edition (1740) of Cave's Hist. Lit. (i. 517) refers to this commentary as lost to view since 1681. In 1791 it was edited in folio at Venice by Morcelli, with a Latin version and annotations, the life of Gregory by Leontius mentioned below accompanying it. In 1860 this edition was reprinted in the Patrologi Græci (xcviii. 741), and in 1862 it was noticed by Ceillier (xi. 587), with a criticism of the style and a brief account of the author's doctrinal views, which were in accordance with the orthodoxy of his day. Morcelli discusses the question of the biblical text made use of by Gregory, it being found frequently to vary from the Septuagint. He also seeks to account for the circumstance that a Sicilian of the 7th-century wrote in the Greek language.

There is likewise extant a very full Life of Gregory of Agrigentum, under the name of Leontius abbat of St. Saba at Rome, written not long after the bishop's death. It is, however, so devoid of dates and all notes of time that nothing more than an inferential and approximate chronology of its events is possible. According to Leontius Gregory was born near Agrigentum, and baptized by bishop Potamio, of whom no dates are known. At eighteen, being smitten with an ardent desire of seeing the sacred places of the Holy Land, he set sail for Carthage and thence proceeded to Palestine, where he passed some years among the various monastic communities, and especially those in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, by the patriarch of which city, Macarius, he was ordained deacon. Thence he repaired to Antioch, where Eustathius was bishop, and after a year proceeded to Constantinople, where Justinian was reigning. He next visited Rome, for the sake of its sacred places, and while there was consecrated by the pope bishop of Agrigentum. He had scarcely entered upon his episcopal duties when a plot was contrived to blast his character, his enemies having early one morning, while he was at church, secretly introduced a strange female into his house. He was summoned to Rome to clear himself, was acquitted by the pope and restored to his flock, among whom he continued to labour until his death. The names above given will furnish a first approximation to the chronology. Macarius of Jerusalem ruled between cir. 544 and 573, but not uninterruptedly (Clinton, F. R. ii. 537, 557, 558). No Eustathius of Antioch later than the Nicene period is otherwise known. Justinian reigned from 527 to 565. We have in addition a statement by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xvii. 17), that Gregory was present at the fifth general council, i.e. 553. Taking this date for a departure, Cajetan computes the year of Gregory's birth to have been 524, and Pirri nearly agrees with him (Cajet. Vit. Sic. SS. i. animadv. p. 167; Pirri, Sic. Sac. i. 693). But their calculation is perplexed by certain letters of Gregory the Great. Two of these (lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 72; lib. iii. ind. xi. ep. 12), dated by Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 97, 102), A.D. 591, 592, mention a Gregory bishop of Agrigentum. They are brief, and contain little direct information, but there are other letters which, without naming him, plainly allude to his case (lib. ii. ind. x. ep. 33; lib. v. ind. xiii. ep. 12; nb. viii. ind. i. ep. 23). From this group of epistles it is easy to discern that Gregory of Agrigentum is under accusation, that he is required at Rome with his accusers and the documents, that the see is under sequestration, and that he eventually returns to his church. In other words, here in pope Gregory's correspondence is an incident disclosed accurately corresponding with that described by Leontius. But the date is inconveniently late for the other computations of Cajetan and Pirri, who are therefore induced to conclude that there existed another Gregory of Agrigentum subsequent to theirs, labouring under a similar accusation. Him they call Gregory III. Morcelli on the other hand, believing this solution unnatural and far-fetched, takes his departure from the papal epistles, and working backwards constructs a theoretical chronology of the life thus:—Birth, 559; ordination at Jerusalem, 579, under John III. and not Macarius; Antioch, 586; Constantinople, 588; consecration at Rome, 590; accusation, 591; restoration, 594; death, cir. 638. But Morcelli, finding his scheme interfered with by the statement of Nicephorus, believes himself warranted in rejecting the "fifth synod," and that on two grounds; first, because the records of the council have no mention of the presence of a deacon or priest Gregory (vid. Mansi, ix. 175 c, 391 d); secondly, because another writer, Nicetas Pectoratus (Contra Latinos, cap. 12 in Patr. Gr. cxx. 1018), puts the council as the sixth, i.e. 680, a discrepancy which makes each writer discredit the other, as proving that neither had access to official documents. Morcelli's investigation is more searching than that of his predecessors, and his conclusion is supported, he thinks, by the internal evidence of the commentary. His chronological scheme is the one adopted in the new edition of Ceillier.

A Latin version of Leontius is given by Cajetan in his Lives of the Sicilian Saints (i. 188). The original Greek, with another Latin version, accompanies Morcelli's edition of the commentary as mentioned above. Morcelli gives an account of every subsequent Life of Gregory founded on that of Leontius, and cites all the ancient authors by whom Gregory is mentioned. (See also Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. viii. 322, x. 232, ed. Harles.) Founded on Leontius is a Life by Simeon Metaphrastes, the Latin of which may be seen in Surius (de Prob. Hist. SS. Nov. p. 487), Latin and Greek in Patr. Gr. cxvi. 189. The brief entry of Gregory under Nov. 23 in the Menologium Græcorum of Sirlet (Canisius, Thesaur. iii. 490), assigns his birth to the reign of Justinian; while the Menologium of Basil, Nov. 24, puts it under Justinianus Rhinotmetus, i.e. 685–711.

Finally it should be noticed that Pirri (ut sup.) gives a Gregory IV. of Agrigentum, citing as his authority a note by Baronius under Nov. 23 of the Roman Martyrology edited by him in 1610. This note is to the effect that the signature of a Gregory of Agrigentum is attached to the synodal of pope Agatho at Rome in 680, and must belong to a bishop later than the commentator. But Morcelli points out that Baronius here has simply misread his document, since the word in every copy, without a single various reading, is not Gregory but George [GEORGIUS (22)]; (see Mansi, xi. 305 A). Gregory IV. of Agrigentum therefore disappears as well as Gregory III. [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (34), bishop of Rhinocorura (Farma) on the frontiers of Egypt and Palestine. He is mentioned by Metaphrastes in his life of St. Joannes Eleemosynarius (cap. 1, Patr. Gr. cxiv. 901), as being sent c. A.D. 610 by that patriarch to relieve and ransom the Christians who had been seized by the Persians in the invasion of Chosroes. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 543.) [J. de S.]

GREGORIUS (35), bishop of Osma, from a little before 610. He signs the acts of the so-called synod of Carthaginensian bishops at Toledo, A.D. 610. [GUNTHER.] (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 322; Esp. Sagr. vii. 288.) [M. A. W.]

GREGORIUS (36) IV., supposed bishop of Agrigentum, in 680. [GREGORIUS (33), GEORGIUS (22).]

GREGORIUS (37), bishop of Oreto (nr. Almagro) from 681 to about 690. His signature is 15th among forty-eight at the 13th council of Toledo, 683. He also appeared at the fourteenth and fifteenth councils, A.D. 684–688. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287, 304, 313; Esp. Sagr. vii. 271.) [AUDONIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GREGORIUS (38), the name of several bishops present at the councils of 680 and 692 at Constantinople, viz. of—

Arce in Lesser Armenia, 680 (Mansi, xi. 676; Le Quien, O. C. i. 448).

Azani in Phrygia, 692 (M. 1001; O. C. i. 800).

Calantea in Asia, 692 (M. 994 e, Greek ἐπίσκοπος τῆς Γαλάτων πόλεως. Mansi suggests Ἰκελεντῶν in the Hellespont).

Calœ, in the valley of Cayster, 692 (M. 993; O. C. i. 725).

Cantanus in Crete, 680 (M. 317, 614 e; O. C. ii. 274).

Evaza or Theodosiopolis in Asia, 692 (M. 996; O. C. i. 734).

Jutalea, 692 (M. 998 b, Greek, Georgius in Latin).

Mitylene, 680 (M. 614 c, 693; O. C. i. 956).

Naxos, 680 (M. 615 d, Gregorius in the Latin, Georgius in Greek).

Tabia in Galatia, 692 (M. 995 a; O. C. i. 474).

Triocala in Sicily, 680 (Pirri, Sicil. Soc. i. 490). Mansi has Georgius. [GEORGIUS (23).]

GREGORIUS (39), bishop of Ostia c. 707. The date is fixed by a document containing a privilege granted by John VII. to the monastery of Subiaco. Besides his bishopric, he was "sanctae sedis bibliothecarius et cancellarius." (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 64; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 445.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (40), bishop of Pavia at the beginning of the 8th century. He is mentioned by Landulph (Muratori, Scriptores, iv. 76) in a complaint addressed to pope Constantine by Benedict, archbishop of Milan, on the subject of his right of consecration to the see of Pavia. [A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (41), supposed bishop of Tergeste (Trieste) between 715 and 731. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. viii. 681.) [R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (42), bishop of Anagni, present at the synod of Rome in 721, under Gregory II. (Mansi, xii. 265; Hefele, § 330.) [A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (43), bishop of Porto, present at the Roman synods of 743 and 745. In 747 another Gregorius appears as Orbeventanus. (Mansi, xii. 368, 380; Hefele, §§ 364, 367.) [A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (44), bishop of Silva Candida, present at the Lateran synod in 769 (Mansi, xii. 714; Hefele, § 343). He also signed a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761 to the abbat John, (Mansi, xii. 649; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 195.) [A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (45), ST., archbishop of Salamis (Constantia) in the island of Cyprus, commemorated in the Menaea on March 5 (Basil. Men., in Migne, Patrol. Graec. cxvii.). He is perhaps to be identified with GEORGIVS (30), bishop of the see, who was a strong opponent of the Iconoclastic emperor Constantine Copronymus. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1049; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. i. 368.) [L. D.]

GREGORIUS of Praeneste. [GEORGIUS (32).]

GREGORIUS (46), bishop of Pessinus, the metropolis of Galatia Secunda. He subscribed the condemnation of images by the council of Constantinople of A.D. 754. For this he was called to account at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 787, when he recanted, expressed his regret for what he had done, and subscribed the decrees of that assembly. (Mansi, xii. 723 A, 625 B, 731 D.) [T. W. D.]

GREGORIUS (47) II., bishop of Neocaesarea, present at the council of Nicaea, 787, where in the sixth session he cites the acts of the Constantinopolitan council of 754 against image worship, Epiphanius the deacon refuting them clause by clause, through the session (Mansi, xiii. 207, 382 D; Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 504). It is stated by Ceillier (xiii. 613) that Gregory of Neocaesarea, Theodosius of Ephesus, and Sisinus of Perga were at the head of the bishops who met at Constantinople in 754. But this must be a mistake as regards Gregory. Theophanes mentions only Theodosius of Ephesus and Pastillus of Perga (Theoph. Chronog. A.C. 745, p. 359 in Patr. Gr. cviii. 862). The Acts of the council of 754 are lost, except in so far as they are cited in the sixth session of Nicaea as just stated, and in those proceedings Gregorius is always mentioned with the epithet θεοφιλέστατος. [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (48), the name of several bishops present at the third council of Nicaea in 787, viz. of—

Amastria (Sessamus) in Paphlagonia (Mansi, xii. 1099 c, xiii. 145 d; Le Quien, O. C. i. 563). He is thought to have been also called Georgius. [GEORGIUS (4C).]

Basilinopolis (M. xiii. 146 a, Latin; Georgius in the Greek). [GEORGIUS (37).]

GREGORIUS of Amiens. [GEORGIUS (41).]

GREGORIUS (49), tenth bishop of Nismes, between Casatus or Cosatus and Vintericus, towards the close of the 8th century. His name is said to appear in an ancient breviary and other MSS. of that church. (Gall. Christ. vi. 430; Gams, Series Episc. 586.)

GREGORIUS (50), created first bishop of Mantua by Leo III. c. 804 or 808, and succeeded by Erfulfus, 823. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 928; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xii. 18.)

[R. S. G.]

GREGORIUS (51) I. (called the Great), bishop of Rome from Sept. 3, A.D. 590, to March 12, A.D. 604, between thirteen and fourteen years. He was born at Rome, probably about the year 540, of a wealthy senatorial family, pope Felix II. (or III.) being said to have been his great-grandfather. The family was a religious one. His mother Silvia, and Tarsilla and Aemiliana, the two sisters of his father Gordianus, have been canonized. Under such influences his education is spoken of by his biographer, John the deacon, as having been that of a saint among saints. His intellectual seems not to have fallen short of his moral and religious training. Gregory of Tours, his contemporary, says that in grammar, rhetoric, and logic, he was thought to be second to none in Rome (Hist. x. 1). Conformably to his rank and prospects he studied law, distinguished himself in the senate, and at an early age (certainly before 573, when he would be little more than thirty years old) was recommended by the emperor Justin II. for the post of praetor urbis. The silk attire, the glittering gems, and the purple-striped trabea, with which he walked at this period through the streets of Rome, recurred afterwards to the memory of observers, as in striking contrast to the ecclesiastical garb so soon assumed (Greg. Tur. ib.). For after a public career of credit, it was not long before the religious ideas of his age, with which he was thoroughly imbued, suggested to him the pursuit of a higher vocation; and on his father's death he reserved to himself but a small share of the great wealth that came to him, employing the rest in charitable uses, and especially in founding monasteries, of which he endowed six in Sicily, and one, dedicated to St. Andrew, on the site of his own house, near the church of SS. John and Paul, at Rome. Here he himself became a monk. The date of this, his first retirement from the world, and its duration, are uncertain; as are also the exact dates of subsequent events previous to his accession to the papacy. What appears the most probable order of events will be given. During his seclusion his asceticism is said to have been such as to endanger his life, had he not been prevailed on by friends to abate its rigour; and it may have partly laid the foundation of the bad health from which he afterwards suffered. Gregory Turonensis speaks of his stomach at this time being so enfeebled by fast and vigil that he could hardly stand. His saintly aspirations were interrupted by the pope, Benedict I., who, having ordained him as one of the seven deacons (regionarii) of Rome, sent him as his apocrisiarius to Constantinople, it being customary to employ none but deacons in this capacity. We find him similarly employed, on the death of Benedict in 579, by his successor Pelagius II., who, having been consecrated before the customary confirmation of his election by the emperor had been obtained, found it necessary to send a nuncio to Constantinople to excuse the informality, and at the same time to solicit aid against the Lombards. After this Gregory resided three years in the imperial city. Two noteworthy circumstances are recorded during this stay in Constantinople. The first is his controversy with Eutychius, the patriarch, about the nature of the body at the resurrection. Eutychius had written a book in which he maintained that the risen body would be of an impalpable kind, subtle as air. This view Gregory opposed, urging the palpability of the risen body of Christ. The dispute was terminated by the intervention of the emperor Tiberius, who, having heard the two disputants, decided that Gregory had the best of the argument, and ordered the patriarch's treatise to be burnt (Joh. Diac. Vit. i. 28). John the Deacon adds that the disputants were so exhausted by the long discussion that both had to take to their beds at its close.

The second memorable incident of this period was the commencement at the instigation of Leander, bishop of Seville, who was then at Constantinople, of the famous work called Magna Moralia, of which some account will be given afterwards. Recalled at length by Pelagius to Rome, he was allowed, at his own earnest request, to return to his monastery, where he hoped to pass the remainder of his days, but was still employed as the pope's secretary. During the period of his renewed monastic life, and in his capacity of abbat (to which office he was chosen on the appointment of the previous abbat Maximianus to the see of Syracuse, though whether before or after his stay at Constantinople is uncertain), he was distinguished alike for the strictness of his own life and for the rigour of his discipline. One story which he tells himself leaves the impression of zeal in this regard carried to the extent of almost inhuman harshness. A monk, Julius, who had been a physician, and who had attended Gregory himself, night and day, during a long illness, being himself dangerously ill, confided to a brother that, in violation of monastic rule, he had three pieces of gold concealed in his cell. This confession was overheard, the cell was searched, and the pieces found. Gregory, being made aware of the fact, forbade all to approach the offender, even in the agonies of death, and after death caused his body to be thrown on a dunghill, and with it the pieces of gold, the monks crying aloud, "Thy money perish with thee." (Greg. Dial. lib. iv. c. 55.)

On Feb. 8, 590, pope Pelagius died. The city of Rome was in great straits at the time. Without the gates the Lombards ravaged the country and threatened the city, aid being craved in vain from the distant emperor; within famine and plague were raging. Such, at a time like this, was the general recognition of Gregory's merits that he was at once unanimously chosen by senate, clergy, and people to succeed Pelagius. To him the news of his election was distressing. He at once wrote to the emperor Mauricius (who had succeeded Tiberius in 582) imploring him not to confirm the election. His letter was intercepted by the præfect of Rome, and another sent in its place, in the name of the senate, clergy, and people, earnestly requesting confirmation. It was during the interval before the reply of the emperor reached Rome, that Gregory, in addition to his excitement of the people to repentance by his sermons, instituted the famous processional litany, called Litania septiformis, in connexion with which the story about the origin of the name of the castle of St. Angelo is told; viz. that, as the monument of Hadrian was approached in a concluding processional peregrination of the city, Gregory saw on its summit an angel sheathing his sword in token that the plague was staid. At length an answer came from the emperor, confirming the election of Gregory. He still shrank from the proffered dignity, fled the city in disguise, escaping the guards set to watch the gates, and hid himself in a forest cave. Soon discovered, by means it was said of a supernatural light, he was brought back in triumph, conducted to the church of St. Peter, and immediately ordained on Sept. 3, 590, the see having been vacant since Feb. 8 in the same year (Anastas. Bibliothec. and Martyrol. Roman.). Though the sincerity of many others, in that age and afterwards, who have attempted to escape the episcopal dignity by flight, may well be doubted, there is not the least reason for disputing the reality of the feeling in Gregory's case, arising from his devotion to the monastic life, and a fear (as he himself expresses it) lest "the worldly glory which he had cast away might creep on him under the colour of ecclesiastical government." Subsequently to his ordination he ceased not to lament in his letters and other writings the manifold burdens, anxieties, and temptations of his high office, and to look back with regret to the safer quiet of his former monastic life. (Cf. Ep. i. 5; Ep. ad Leandrum, Lib. de Cur. Pastor. &c.)

After his accession, he continued in heart a monk, surrounding himself with ecclesiastics instead of laymen, and living with them according to monastic rule. In accordance with this plan a synodal decree was made under him in 595, substituting clergy or monks for the boys and secular persons who had formerly waited on the pope in his chamber (Ep. iv. 44). Yet he rose at once to his new position. The period, as has been said, was one of particular trial; and the church shared in the distress and disorganization of the time. The fires of controversy that had for the last two centuries inflamed it were not yet extinct; they still raged in the East. In Istria and Gaul the schism consequent on the question of the three chapters continued. In Africa the Donatists had begun once more to raise themselves aggressively against the Catholics. Spain had but just, and as yet imperfectly, been recovered from Arianism. In Gaul the church was oppressed under its barbarian rulers. In Italy the ferocious Arian Lombards had destroyed churches and monasteries, slain ecclesiastics, violated consecrated virgins, and wasted the land. The clergy were infected with the demoralization of the day. The monastic system which had taken such a wonderful hold on Christendom during the preceding age, was suffering the usual declension from the ardour of a first love, and was now notoriously corrupt. Literature and learning, crushed under the protracted struggle with barbarian hordes, had almost died with Boethius; and all such causes, combined with the temporal calamities and perils of the age, were such as to lead to a prevalent belief, which Gregory shared in and often expressed, that the end of all things was at hand. Nor was the position of the papacy encouraging to one who like Gregory took a high view of the prerogatives of St. Peter's chair. For since the recovery of Italy by Justinian (after the capture of Rome by Belisarius in 536) the popes had been far less independent than even under the Gothic kings. This prince had treated the bishops of Rome as his predecessors had long treated the Eastern patriarchs, regarding them as his creatures, to be appointed, summoned to court and deposed at his pleasure, and subject to the commands of his exarch at Ravenna; and no reigns of popes had been so inglorious as those of Gregory's immediate predecessors, Vigilius, Pelagius I., Benedict, and Pelagius II. His own description of the Roman church at this time was that it was "like an old and violently shattered ship, admitting the waters on all sides, its timbers rotten, shaken by daily storms, and sounding of wreck" (Ep. i.)

We may best obtain a view of the way in which this great pope acquitted himself as pilot of St. Peter's shattered bark, if we review his operations under separate heads, without strict regard to the chronological sequence of events. He will be regarded, first, as a spiritual ruler; secondly, as a temporal administrator and potentate; and lastly, as to his personal character, and as a doctor of the church.

I. Immediately after his accession he sent, according to custom, a confession of his faith to the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, in which he declared his reception of the four first general councils, as of the four gospels, and his condemnation of the three chapters; i.e. the writings of three deceased prelates, Theodorus, Theodoret, and Ibas, supposed to savour of heresy, and already condemned by the emperor Justinian, and by the fifth council called oecumenical. The strong language in which he exalts the authority of the four councils in this confession, as "the square stone on which rests the structure of the faith, the rule of every man's actions and life, which foundation whoever does not hold is out of the building," is significant of his views on the authority of the church at large, while his recognition of the four patriarchs as co-ordinate potentates, to whom he sends an account of his own faith, expresses one aspect of the position in relation to the Eastern churches which then satisfied the Roman pontiffs.

He lost no time in taking measures for the restoration of discipline, the reform of abuses, the repression of heresy, and the establishment of the authority of the Roman see, both in his own metropolitan province, and wherever his influence extended. The definite jurisdiction belonging to the bishop of Rome since the political divisions of the Empire had been reproduced in the metropolitan constitution of the church was threefold; episcopal, metropolitan, and patriarchal. As bishop he had the oversight of the city of Rome; as metropolitan he had the superintendence of the seven suffragan, afterwards called cardinal, bishops of the Roman territory, those of Ostia, Portus, Silva Candida, Sabina, Praeneste, Tusculum, and Albanum; while his patriarchate seems to have originally extended (according to Rufinus, H. E. i. [x.] 6) over the suburban provinces which were under the civil jurisdiction of the vicarius urbis, including Upper Italy, with the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica. But being the only patriarch in the West, he had in fact claimed and exercised jurisdiction as such beyond these original limits, including in his sway all the four vicarines into which the praefecture of Italy was politically divided; not that of Rome only, but those also of northern Italy, with its centre at Milan, western Illyricum, with its capital at Sirmium, and Western Africa, with its capital at Carthage. Further, before the time of Gregory's accession, a still wider authority had been claimed and in part acknowledged. As bishops of the old imperial city, with an acknowledged primacy of honour among the patriarchs, still more as occupants of St. Peter's chair and conservators of his doctrine, and as such from time to time consulted and appealed to by various Western churches, the popes had come to exercise a more or less defined jurisdiction over them all. The power of sending judges to hear on the spot the appeals of condemned bishops, which had been accorded to pope Julius by the Western council of Sardica in 343, had been claimed by his successors as perpetually belonging to the Roman see, and extended so as to involve the summoning of cases to be heard at Rome; and a law had been obtained by Leo I. from the emperor Valentinian (445) by which the pope was made supreme head of the whole Western church, with the power of summoning prelates from all provinces to abide his judgment. On the assumption of such authority Gregory acted, it being one of his fixed principles to abate none of the rights claimed by his predecessors, though scrupulous in respecting and maintaining the existing power of metropolitans, and though in countries under barbarian rulers, when circumstances did not allow the full assertion of his claims, he was wary, and adroit in his proceedings. Of his relation to the Eastern church something will be said hereafter. Instances will first be given of his measures in the West.

In the year of his accession (590) he endeavoured, though without result, to bring over the Istrian bishops, who still refused to condemn the three chapters, and to whom, during the pontificate of Pelagius, in his name as his secretary, he had addressed letters on the subject. With this view he appointed a council to meet at Rome, and obtained an order from the emperor for the attendance of these bishops. They, however, petitioned for exemption, saying that their faith was the same that had been formerly taught them by pope Vigilius, protesting against submission to the bishop of Rome as their judge, and pleading the state of Italy as a reason for granting them respite before satisfying the emperor, as in due time they were prepared to do, of the purity of their faith. The emperor countermanded the order, and Gregory acquiesced. (The letters are given by Baronius, ad ann. 590.) His acquiescence in this case is an early instance of what will appear more distinctly in other cases, his habit of submission to imperial authority, when remonstrance was unavailing.

In the following year (591) his orthodox zeal was directed with more success against the African Donatists. This sect, which had in former days been the object of much persecution, continued to flourish alongside with the Catholics, and lately without conflict or disturbance. It was the custom in Numidia for the senior bishop, whatever his see, to exercise metropolitan authority over the other bishops. Such senior now happened to be a Donatist, and he assumed the customary authority. Gregory therefore wrote to the Catholic bishops of Numidia, and to Gennadius, exarch of Africa, urging them to resist and put an end to the assertion of such a claim; and in his letter to the exarch (couched, as was Gregory's habit in addressing temporal potentates, in complimentary language) intimating pretty plainly his desire that active measures should be taken to suppress the Donatists (Ep. i. 74, 75). He succeeded so far as this, that the Donatist bishop was deposed from his assumed position, but the sect itself continued in Africa as long as Christianity. It may here be observed that this is not the only instance of Gregory, like others of his age, not being averse to persecution as a means of conversion. In Sicily he enjoined rigorous measures (summopere persequi) for the recovery of the Manichaeans to the church (Ep. iv. 6); there, and in Corsica, Sardinia, and Campania, the heathen peasants and slaves on the papal estates were by his order compelled to conform, not only by exactions on such as refused, but also by the imprisonment of freemen, and the corporal castigation ("cerberibus et cruciatibus") of slaves (Ep. iii. 26; vii. Ind. 2, 67), and in France he exhorted Queen Brunichild to similar measures of coercion (Ep. vii. 5).

On the other hand, there are three letters of his, written in the same year with those about the African Donatists, which evince a spirit of unusual toleration towards the Jews. They are addressed to three bishops, Peter of Tarracina, Virgilius of Arles, and Theodorus of Marseilles, of whom the first had driven the Jews from their synagogues, and the two last had effected a number of conversions by offering them the choice of baptism or exile. In these letters he strongly condemns such proceedings, "because conversions wrought by force are never sincere, and such as are thus converted seldom fail to return to their vomit when the force is removed." (Ep. i. 34, i. 45; cf. Ep. vii. ind.

1, 26, vii. ind. 2, 5, vii. 2, 59.) Still, though in these instances averse to forcing them into the fold by persecution, he had no objection to luring them by the prospect of advantage: for in a letter to a deacon Cyprian, who was steward of the papal patrimony in Sicily, he directs him to offer to the Jews a remission of one-third of the taxes due to the Roman church on condition of their becoming Christians, saying, in justification, that though the conversions thus effected might be insincere, yet the children of the converts would be brought up in the bosom of the church (Ep. iv. 6, cf. Ep. xii. 30). In such apparent inconsistencies we may detect the good sense and Christian benevolence of the man in conflict with the impulses of zeal and the notions of his age.

He was no less active, from the very beginning of his reign, in reforming the church itself than in labouring for the conversion of heretics, heathens, and Jews. Mention has already been made of the laxity at that time prevalent among the monks, of which the life of the contemporary Benedict, the founder of the Benedictine order, affords ample evidence. [BENEDICT.] Several of Gregory's letters are addressed to monks who had left their monasteries for the world and marriage. He took especial pains with one Venantius, a distinguished member of the Decian family, who had joined a monastery and quitted it. In this case his remonstrances were in vain. He also issued the following, among other regulations designed for the restoration of monastic discipline; that no monk should be received under eighteen years of age, nor any husband without his wife's consent (in one case he orders a husband, who had entered a monastery, to be restored to his wife [Ep. ix. 44]); that two years of probation should always be required, and three in the case of soldiers; that a professed monk leaving his order should be immured for life; that no monk, though an abbat, should be allowed to leave the precincts of his monastery, except on urgent occasions; that under no pretext should any monk leave his monastery alone, on the ground that "Qui sine teste ambulat non rectè vivit." He also provided for the more complete separation of the monastic and clerical orders, forbidding any monk to remain in his monastery after ordination, and any priest to enter a monastery except for the exercise of clerical functions, or to become a monk without first giving up his clerical office; and further exempting monasteries from the jurisdiction of bishops. This last important provision, made at first in the case of some, was extended to all monasteries by the Lateran synod, held under him in 601.

In 593 his zeal for the monastic life brought him into temporary conflict with the emperor, in the course of which not only such zeal, but also his characteristic traits of boldness in asserting his views, and of submission at the same time to his temporal rulers, were alike conspicuous. Mauricius the emperor had issued an edict forbidding soldiers to become monks during their period of service, which edict the pope was required to publish in the West. Gregory at once complied, though strongly disapproving, and contented himself with sending, through Theodorus, the court physician, a letter to the emperor and his son, in which he earnestly and pathetically remonstrates against the edict, though fully acknowledging the emperor's power to issue it, and his own duty of submission to that power. He concludes thus: "And now I have on both sides discharged my duty: on the one I have yielded obedience to the emperor, and on the other spoken my mind with openness and freedom" (Ep. ii. 62).

He was no less zealous in his correction of the clergy than in his restoration of discipline among the monks. Several bishops under his immediate metropolitan jurisdiction and elsewhere he rebuked or deposed, among whom were Demetrius of Naples, Agatho of Lipari, Paul of Doclea, in Dalmatia, and Andreas of Tarentum, on grounds of incontinency and other crimes. His own nuncio at Constantinople, Laurentius the archdeacon, he recalled and deposed. From the clergy generally he required strict chastity, forbidding them to retain in their houses any women but their mothers, sisters, or wives married before ordination, and with these last prohibiting conjugal intercourse (Ep. i. 50; ix. 64). Bishops he recommends to imitate St. Augustine in banishing from their houses even such female relatives as the canons allow (Ep. vii. ind. 2, 39; xi. 42, 43). In Sicily the obligation to celibacy had, in the year 588, been extended to subdeacons. This rule he upheld by directing the bishops to require a vow of celibacy from all who should in future be ordained subdeacons, but acknowledging its hardship on such as had made no such vow on their ordination, he contented himself with forbidding the advancement to the diaconate of existing subdeacons who had continued conjugal intercourse after the introduction of the rule (Ep. i. ind. ix. 42).

He also set himself resolutely against the prevalent practice of simony, forbidding all bishops and clergy to exact or accept fee or reward for the functions of their office; and he set the example himself by refusing the annual presents which it had been customary for the bishops of Rome to receive from their suffragans, or payment for the pallium sent to metropolitans. Acceptance of payment for the pallium was also forbidden to all future popes by a Roman synod in 595.

In the year 592 began a struggle in reference to discipline with certain bishops of Thessaly and Dalmatia, in the province of Illyricum, where, though dealing with a province long subjected to the jurisdiction of Rome, he encountered, in one instance, resistance, as some of his predecessors had done. Hadrianus of Thebes had been deposed by a provincial synod under his metropolitan the bishop of Larissa, and the sentence had been confirmed by John of Justiniana Prima, the primate of Illyricum, to whom the emperor Mauricius, appealed to by Hadrianus, had referred the matter. The deposed prelate now appealed to Gregory, who, after examining the whole case, declared the past proceedings null, as being uncanonical, absolved the appellant, exempted him in future from the jurisdiction of his metropolitan, and, as to John the primate, ordered him to reinstate Hadrianus, at the same time excommunicating him for thirty days, and threatening severer measures in case of disobedience to the authority of the prince of the apostles (Ep. ii. ind. xi. 6, 7). In the same year (592) he ordered Natalis, bishop of Salona in Dalmatia, and metropolitan, under pain of excommunication and eventual deposition, to reinstate his archdeacon Honoratus whom he had deposed (Ep. ii. ind. x. 14, 15, 16). In both these instances he appears to have been obeyed. Not so, however, in the case of Maximus, who succeeded Natalis as bishop of Salona and metropolitan in the same year. Maximus having been elected in opposition to the aforesaid archdeacon Honoratus, who had been recommended by Gregory, was alleged to be a man of scandalous life, and to have obtained his election by bribes. Gregory accordingly disallowed it, and wrote at the same time to the clergy of Salona forbidding them to choose a bishop without the knowledge and consent of the apostolic see. In the meantime the emperor had confirmed the election. Learning this, Gregory wrote to suspend Maximus and his ordainers till such time as he should be assured of the alleged imperial confirmation, and summoned him to Rome to give an account of himself. The suspension and summons were disregarded, and an order was obtained from the emperor bidding the pope give no further trouble to the bishop of Salona. Gregory now wrote to the emperor in a tone of earnest remonstrance, though with his customary deference to imperial authority, saying that he would rather die than suffer any diminution of the authority of St. Peter's see through his own indolence or neglect. But his remonstrance proving vain, he acquiesced for the present. Soon after, he again summoned Maximus to Rome on the ground of new charges brought against him of simony, sacrilege, and other crimes. He wrote also to Constantinople, this time to the empress, informing her of the state of things in a long complaining letter. Maximus again treated the summons with contempt, alleging as before that, if his conduct called for inquiry, it was on the spot and not at Rome, where, according to the canons, the inquiry should be made, and forwarded to Constantinople counter accusations against Gregory, from which the latter wrote to justify himself. After protracted negotiations, lasting altogether seven years, and in the course of which seventeen letters were written by Gregory, the emperor finally committed the settlement of the dispute to Maximianus, bishop of Ravenna, and the result was that Maximus, having publicly begged pardon of the pope, and cleared himself from the charge of simony by an oath of purgation at the tomb of St. Apollinaris, was at last acknowledged as lawful bishop of Salona (Ep. iii. indict. xii. 15, 20; iv. ind. xiii. 34; v. ind. xiv. 3; vi. ind. xv. 17; vii. ind. i. 1; vii. ind. ii. 81, 82, 83).

In countries of the West beyond the limits of the empire, no less than within those limits, he lost no opportunity of extending the influence of the Roman see, and of advancing and consolidating the church. Reccared, the Visigothic king of Spain, having renounced Arianism for Catholicism at the council of Toledo in 589, the year before Gregory's accession, he received intelligence of this event from Leander, bishop of Seville, whose intimate acquaintance (as has been already said) he had made during his stay at Constantinople. There are three very affectionate letters from Gregory to this prelate, in which, from the midst of distracting cares of office, and of suffering from gout, to which it appears that Leander also had been a victim, he expresses unbounded joy, and exhorts his friend to watch over the royal convert. In one of these letters he replies to a question as to single or triple immersion in baptism. Three immersions were the practice of the Roman church, regarded as symbols (sacramenta, according to the expression of Gregory) either of Christ's three days in the grave, or of the Trinity. The same had been the practice of the Arians in Spain, but not of the orthodox, who had hitherto immersed once only, by way of expressing the consubstantial unity of the Godhead. Gregory, with characteristic judgment, recommends, under the circumstances, the retention of single immersion, notwithstanding the difference of the Roman rite. He also sent Leander a pall, accompanied by the blessing of St. Peter, to be used at mass only. He wrote also to Reccared in a tone of warm congratulation, exhorting him to humility, chastity, and mercy; thanking for presents received, and sending in return a key from the body of St. Peter, in which was some iron from the chain that had bound him, and a cross containing a piece of the true cross, and some hairs of John the Baptist (Canones Eccles. Hispan.).

It is to be remarked that there is no distinct assumption in these letters of jurisdiction over the Spanish church, and that this is the only known instance of a pall having been sent to Spain previously to the Saracen invasion. The ancient Spanish church does not seem to have been noted for its dependence on the Roman see (see Geddes, Tracts, vol. ii. pp. 25, 49; Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 188).

With the Frank rulers of Gaul he carefully cultivated friendly relations, and through them endeavoured to effect his purpose. In 595, at the request of king Childeric, he conferred the pall on Virgilius of Arles, the ancient metropolitan see, whose bishop pope Zosimus had confirmed in his metropolitan right, and made him vicar as early as 417. He wrote also to Virgilius, enjoining the repression of simony and other abuses, and to the clergy of the province, enjoining submission to their metropolitan (Ep. iv. indict. xiii. 51, 52). To Serenus, bishop of Marseilles, he wrote an often quoted letter, blaming him for having destroyed church pictures in his indiscreet zeal against their abuse. "Pictures," said the pope on this occasion, anticipating the position taken by his successors in the subsequent iconoclastic controversy, "are to the unlearned what books are to the learned" (Ep. ii. ind. iii. 111). Not long after he began a correspondence with Queen Brunehild, in the course of which he again and again exhorts her to use her power for the correction of the vices of the clergy and the conversion of the heathen, writing in the complimentary style usual with him in addressing potentates, but which, in this case, jars strangely with the character of the lady addressed. Another royal female correspondent, cultivated and flattered with a similar purpose, and one more worthy of the praise conferred, was Theodelinda, the Lombard queen. To the year 599 is assigned the extensive conversion of the Lombards to Catholicism, brought about after the death of king Antharis through the marriage of this Theodelinda, his widow, with Agilulph, duke of Turin, and the consequent elevation of the latter to the throne. The queen, a daughter of Garibald, king of the Bavarians, being a zealous Catholic, influenced her Arian husband, and his conversion is said to have been followed by that of the majority of his subjects, by the rebuilding of churches and monasteries, and the restoration of Catholic bishops to their sees. With this pious lady Gregory kept up a highly complimentary correspondence, sending her on one occasion a copy of his four books of dialogues; and one of his last acts was to write to her from his death-bed on the occasion of the birth and baptism of her son Adaloaldus, and in reference to a theological question on which she desired enlightenment.

Over the church in Ireland also, which in the time of Gregory was bound by no close tie of allegiance to the see of Rome, he endeavoured to extend his influence. In the year 592 he wrote a long letter to the bishops of that country in reply to one, no longer extant, which he had received from them, in which they appear to have spoken of some persecution under which they suffered, to have maintained against the pope their continued acceptance of the three chapters, and to have attributed the Lombard invasion to divine judgment on the pope for his condemnation of the same. In his reply he commends their patience under trial, warns them against regarding themselves as martyrs, which they could not be as long as they were heretical; but on the other hand attributes the sufferings of himself and his predecessors to fatherly chastisement rather than divine judgment, and finally sends them the letters which he had addressed to the bishops of Istria on the subject of the three chapters (Ep. ii. ind. x. 36). Though Baronius assumes that the Irish were thus reclaimed to orthodoxy, the contrary appears from a letter of St. Columban to pope Boniface IV. in 614 (first published by Archbishop Usher), in which he strongly blames that pope for continuing to condemn the chapters, and, in an ironical vein, cautions him not to forfeit the claim, superciliously insisted on (as all knew) by the popes, to be the keepers of the keys of the kingdom of heaven. The same saint, writing from Burgundy, had previously defended the Irish computation of Easter with equal boldness, and in the same tone of irony that marks his letter to Boniface, against Gregory the Great himself, among other things telling him (in reference to the authority of previous popes being adduced in support of the Roman usage) that a living dog was better than a dead lion, and reminding him of the universal resistance of the Easterns to pope Victor on the earlier Easter question (see Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. div. ii. ch. vi. iii. § 126). There is also among the letters of Gregory a long one to Quiricus, and other Catholic bishops of Iberia, in reply to a request for advice, in which it is directed that Nestorian heretics having been baptized in the name of the Trinity are not to be rebaptized on their reception into the church, and the conditions of their reception are laid down (Opp. lib. ix. indict. iv. ep. 60).

Gregory was not content with thus influencing, consolidating, and reforming the existing churches throughout the Western world; he was also a zealous missionary, and as such the founder of our English, as distinct from the more ancient British, Christianity. Before his accession to the papedom, some time during the reign of Pelagius, had occurred, according to John the deacon, the famous incident in the forum of Rome, which is thus related. Observing there one day some boys with fair skin, comely faces, and bright flowing hair, exposed for sale as slaves, he asked whence they came. Being told "from Britain," he inquired whether the inhabitants of that island were Christians or pagans. Learning that they were pagans, he heaved long sighs, and said, "Alas, that men of such lucid countenance should be possessed by the author of darkness, and that such grace of form should hide minds void of grace within!" Being told further in answer to his inquiries that they were called Angli, "Well so called," said he, "for they have angelic faces, and should be coheirs in heaven with angels. What is the name of the province from which they come?" Being told that they were called Deiri, "Right again," was his reply, "de ira Dei eruti, et ad misericordiam Christi vocati." Lastly, on hearing that the king of that province was called Aella, he exclaimed, "Alleluia! the praises of God the Creator must be sung in those parts." After this he had, we are told, set out in person, together with a few monks of his convent, in order to preach in Britain; but had been brought back to Rome, at the instance of the people, by order of the pope. It was not till the year 597, the eighth of his pontificate, that the thought so long entertained was carried into effect by the mission of Augustine. An account of this memorable mission will be found under AUGUSTINUS. Only such incidents will here be mentioned as serve to illustrate the character and policy of Gregory. Circumstances were now favourable. His previous intercourse with the ruling powers of Gaul favoured the speeding of the mission through that kingdom; and the recent marriage of Ethelbert king of Kent with Bertha daughter of King Charibert of Paris, for whom the free exercise of her religion had been stipulated, and who had already her church and priest at Canterbury, afforded a home and centre for the mission, with the inestimable advantage (such as Gregory was always alive to) of the aid and influence of a Christian queen. Augustine and other monks of St. Andrew's monastery were accordingly sent in 597, Augustine being designed as bishop, should the mission succeed. Arrived in Gaul, they turned faint-hearted, and Augustine returned to Rome to beg exemption from the dangerous enterprise. Gregory required him to proceed, and sent him back with letters of encouragement to his fellow missionaries, and commendatory ones to Virgilius of Arles and other Gallican bishops, as well as to the kings Theodoric and Theodobert and to Queen Brunichild, eleven letters in all. After the well-known successful issue of the mission in Kent, the baptism of King Ethelbert, and the consecration of Augustine (according to Gregory's original intention in the event of success) by the bishop of Arles, the cheering news was sent through Laurentius the presbyter and Peter the monk to Rome, and at the same time answers requested to a series of questions on points about which Augustine was in doubt. The replies sent by Gregory to these questions evince great judgment and enlightenment. The following is an abstract of the most important. Celibacy and coenobitic life, though imposed on persons in holy orders, are not to be insisted on for other clerics; natives who before conversion had married brothers' wives, are not on that account to be debarred communion, however sinful such connexions for persons already Christians; a variety of fancied causes of impurity, about which the monkish missionaries had felt scruples, are not to preclude people from church and communion, some being natural and unavoidable, others falling under no positive law of prohibition, though at the same time persons are not blamed who on such grounds, out of reverence, absent themselves from sacred rites; the presence of three bishops at the consecration of a new one, though proper and in all cases desirable, may be dispensed with where it cannot be had; all assumption of authority over the Gallican church, or interference with the ancient rights of the metropolitan of Arles, is forbidden, though over all bishops in Britain jurisdiction is assigned; and lastly, the usages of other churches, whether in Gaul or elsewhere, though differing from those of the Roman church, are to be freely adopted if in themselves desirable, since (says this enlightened pope) things are not to be loved for places, but places for the good things found in them. Gregory also wrote to the bishop of Arles, desiring him, if requested, to assist Augustine, and to the latter sent a new band of assistants, including Justus, Paulinus, and Rufinianus, together with sacred vessels, vestments, ornaments for churches, relics, and books. He further fortified him in his authority by sending him the pallium, and sketched a plan for the organization of the English church, according to which there were to be two metropolitan sees, each with twelve suffragan bishops, at London and York, of which York was to be subject to London during Augustine's life, but independent after his death, while to him were also subjected all the existing British clergy, as well as such as should be ordained by him or his coadjutors. Afterwards to the abbat Mellitus, whom he had sent to Britain, he addressed a letter of remarkable import with reference to heathen temples and heathen usages. Idols were to be destroyed, but temples preserved and devoted to Christian worship, that so the people might more willingly renounce their errors, resorting to the worship of the true God in their accustomed places. Similarly sacrificial feasts were to be changed into church festivals, holiday being still kept round the old fane, and the same banquets enjoyed as of old, only in honour of God instead of the service of daemons. The introduction into the Mosaic ritual, and the consecration to God's service, of sacrifices to which the people had been used in Egypt, is adduced as a sanction for this system of accommodation to ancient prejudices. Another letter to Augustine himself warns him against elation on the ground of the miracles wrought by him, the reality of which is not questioned. One to King Ethelbert exhorts him to perseverance in his new faith, and to exertions for the extirpation of heathenism, and tells him of the imminence of the end of the world, and of the importance of securing to himself the advantage of Augustine's prayers. In another to Bertha the queen, she is complimented on her own right faith and literary attainments, which she is exhorted to make available in behalf of the king. What has been related may suffice for shewing the unwearied zeal, the Christian temper, and the fine judgment with which Gregory instituted and superintended this important mission. Its final result was the Christianity of our English ancestors, and the eventual dependence of the whole church in these islands on the see of Rome, though the submission of the British and Scottish clergy to the claims then made, owing perhaps in part to Augustine's deficiency in the tact and temper of his master, was for many years delayed. (Cf. Ep. v. indict. xiv. 53-59; ix. ind. iv. 48-60, 63, 71; Joann. Diacon. 2, 34; Bede, de Gestis Angl. 1, 23, &c.)

The events so far referred to have shewn Gregory's attitude and conduct in spiritual matters throughout the West. Instances will now be given illustrating his relations with Constantinople and the Eastern church. The year 593 affords the first example. Having heard of two presbyters, John of Chalcedon and Anastasius of Isauria, having been beaten with cudgels, after conviction on a charge of heresy, under John the Faster, then patriarch of Constantinople, he wrote twice to the patriarch, remonstrating with him for introducing into the church a new and uncanonical punishment, exhorting him to restore the two presbyters or to judge them canonically, and expressing his own readiness to receive them should they come to Rome. The result was that, notwithstanding the patriarch's protest, the presbyters withdrew to Rome, and were there received and absolved by Gregory after examination of their cause (Ep. ii. 52; v. 64). Though the tone of his letters on this occasion was one of brotherly remonstrance rather than of authority, yet his proceeding implied the right of reversing at Rome what had been done at Constantinople, and a power of interference, such as he did undoubtedly claim, as his predecessors had done. For in other letters we find him saying, "With respect to the Constantinopolitan church, who doubts that it is subject to the apostolical see?" and "I know not what bishop is not subject to it, if fault is found in him" (Ep. vii. ind. ii. 64, 65). But the most memorable incidents in this connexion are his remonstrances against the assumption by John the Faster of the title of oecumenical or universal bishop. They began in 595, being provoked by the repeated occurrence of the title in a judgment against an heretical presbyter, which had been sent to Rome. The title was not at that time new. Patriarchs had been so styled by the emperors Leo and Justinian, and it had been confirmed to John the Faster and his successors by a general Eastern synod held at Constantinople in 588, on which occasion pope Pelagius had protested against it. But the occasion now referred to seems to have been the first to excite the indignation of Gregory. He wrote to Sabinianus, his apocrisiarius at Constantinople, desiring him to use his utmost endeavours with the patriarch, the emperor, and the empress, to procure the renunciation of the title. When neither remonstrance nor the withdrawal of Sabinianus from the patriarch's communion proved availing, he wrote himself to patriarch, emperor, and empress in peculiarly strong language. The title he called foolish, proud, pestiferous, profane, wicked, a diabolical usurpation; the ambition of any who assumed it he compares to that of Lucifer; and intimates that its assumption was a sign of the approach of the king of pride, that is Antichrist. His arguments are such as to preclude himself as well as others from assuming the title, though he implies that if any could claim it it would be St. Peter's successor. Peter, he says, was the first of the apostles, yet neither he nor any of the others would assume the title universal, being all members of the church under one head, Christ. He also states (probably in error) that the title had been offered to the bishop of Rome at the council of Chalcedon, and refused. Failing entirely to make an impression at Constantinople, he addressed himself to the Eastern patriarchs. He wrote to Eulogius of Alexandria and Anastasius of Antioch, representing the purpose of their brother of Constantinople as being that of degrading them, and usurping to himself all ecclesiastical power. They, however, were not thus moved to action; they seem to have regarded the title as one of honour only, suitable to the patriarch of the imperial city; and one of them, Anastasius, wrote in reply that the matter seemed to him of little moment. The controversy continued after the death of John the Faster. Cyriacus having succeeded him in 596, Gregory instructed his apocrisarius at Constantinople to demand from the new patriarch, as a condition of intercommunion, the renunciation of the proud and impious title which his predecessor had wickedly assumed. In vain did Cyriacus send a nuncio to Rome in the hope of arranging matters: Gregory was resolute, and in a letter on this occasion to the patriarch affirmed, "I confidently say that whosoever calls himself universal priest, or desires to be so called in his elation, is the forerunner of Antichrist." At this time he seems to have gained a support, if not to his protest, at any rate to the paramount dignity of his own see, in Eulogius of Alexandria, whom he had before addressed without result. For in answer to a letter received from that patriarch, he acknowledges with approval the dignity assigned by him to the see of St. Peter, and expresses adroitly a curious view of his correspondent, as well as the patriarch of Antioch, being a sharer in it. "Who does not know," he says, "that the church was built and established on the firmness of the prince of the apostles, by whose very name is implied a rock? Hence, though there were several apostles, there is but one apostolic see, that of the prince of the apostles, which has acquired great authority; and that see is in three places, in Rome where he died, in Alexandria where it was founded by his disciple St. Mark, and in Antioch where he himself lived seven years. These three, therefore, are but one see, and on that one see sit three bishops, who are but one in Him who said, I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you." But when Eulogius in a second letter proceeded so far as to style the bishop of Rome universal pope, Gregory warmly rejected such a title, saying, "If you give more to me than is due to me, you rob yourself of what is due to you. Nothing can redound to my honour that redounds to the dishonour of my brethren. If you call me universal pope, you thereby own yourself to be no pope. Let no such titles be mentioned or ever heard among us." Gregory was obliged at last to acquiesce in the assumption of the obnoxious title by the Constantinopolitan patriarch; and it may have been by way of contrast that he usually styled himself in his own letters by the title since borne by the bishops of Rome, Servus servorum Dei. It is evident that Gregory and his opponents in this dispute took different views of the import of the title contended for. They represented it as one simply of honour and dignity, while he regarded it as involving the assumption of supreme authority over the church at large, and especially over the see of St. Peter, whence probably in a great measure the vehemence of his remonstrance. It may be observed further that in the different views taken appears the difference of principle on which pre-eminence was in that age thought assignable to sees in the East and West respectively. In the East the dignity of a see was regarded as an appanage of a city's civil importance, on which ground alone could any pre-eminence be claimed for Constantinople. In the West it was the apostolical origin of the see, and the purely ecclesiastical pre-eminence belonging to it from ancient times, to which especial regard was paid. Thus viewed, the struggle of Gregory for the dignity of his own see against that of Constantinople assumes more importance than might at first sight seem due to it, as being a protest against the Erastianism of the East. And it certainly would not have been well for the church had the spiritual authority of the bishops of Rome accrued to the subservient patriarchs of the Eastern capital.

II. As a temporal administrator and potentate, no less than as a spiritual ruler, Gregory evinced great vigour, ability, and zeal, guided by address and judgment.

The see of Rome at this time had large possessions, constituting what was called the patrimony of St. Peter, not only in Italy, Sardinia, and Corsica, but also in more remote parts, including Dalmatia, Illyricum, Gaul, and even Africa and the East. Over all such estates Gregory exercised a vigilant superintendence by means of officers called "rectores patrimonii," and "defensores," to whom his letters remain, prescribing minute regulations for the management of the lands, and guarding especially against any oppression of the peasants. The exact amounts of their payments were fixed, they were to be allowed to pay by instalments, assisted by advances from the church treasury; unfair weights and measures were to be destroyed, and new ones provided; the seigniorial payments on the marriage of serfs were lowered; and legal forms of security (securitatis libelli) were to be furnished to peasants, lest the old abuses should be revived. The families of farmers were also secured in their succession to tenancy, and their rights in other ways guarded. The revenues accruing to the see, thus carefully secured, though with every possible regard to humanity and justice, were expended according to the fourfold division then prevalent in the West, viz. in equal parts for the bishop, for the clergy, for the fabric and services of the church, and for the poor. And to such distribution, publicly made four times in the year, Gregory gave his personal superintendence. His own charities were immense, a large portion of the population of Rome being dependent on them; every day, before he sat down to his meal, a portion was sent to the poor at his door; provision was made for searching out the sick and infirm in every street, and a large volume was kept containing the names, ages, and dwellings of the objects of his bounty.

A field for the exercise of his political abilities was afforded by his position as virtual ruler of Rome at that critical time. Before his accession the Lombards had conquered nearly all Italy, except the exarchate of Ravenna, and had committed ravages even there, no effectual aid against them being afforded by the emperor. In 594 the exarch Romanus, in violation of a treaty with Agilulph, the Lombard king, had seized an opportunity of invading his territory and carrying his booty to Ravenna. Agilulph in return invaded the exarchate, approaching the very gates of Rome, and remained there several months, laying the country waste with fire and sword. Gregory, whose letters and homilies at this time give a lamentable account of the miseries of the country, endeavoured to conclude a peace with Agilulph, who was himself disposed to come to terms. These endeavours were frustrated by the opposition of Romanus, who represented Gregory to the emperor as having been overreached by the crafty enemy. The emperor believed his exarch, and wrote to Gregory in condemnation of his conduct. In vain did Gregory remonstrate in letters both to the emperor and to the empress Constantina, complaining to the latter not so much of the ravages of the Lombards as of the cruelty and exactions of the imperial officers who had been sent to defend the country, but who had, on the contrary, burdened the people with intolerable taxes under pretence of raising funds for the war, in consequence of which the Corsicans especially had been compelled to sell their children, and had gone over in great numbers to the enemy, leaving their island almost depopulated. Further, he attributed the opposition raised to his own endeavours for peace to the fear lest, the war being ended, the excuse for such exactions should cease. At length, in 595, he obtained some relief through his pious friend Theodelinda, the Lombard queen, who, more amenable to influence than the emperor or empress, persuaded her husband to withdraw his troops (Ep. iv. 31, 33, 35, 38, 39; and Hom. 18 in Esca.). This relief, however, was only temporary. Towards the winter of 596, Agilulph, provoked by the exarch's continued resistance to all overtures for peace, again invaded the exarchate, and threatened to besiege Rome. Again Gregory's letters give a deplorable picture of general distress, both within and without the city. But he did more than complain. From his own resources, and through the contributions of bishops and others, both in the West and East, whose sympathy he succeeded in exciting, he expended large sums in the redemption of captives and the relief of distress, and further allowed bishops to sell the sacred vessels of the churches for the same charitable purposes (Ep. v. 29; vi. 13, 21, 23; vii. ind. ii. 13, 14). For several years he continued, unaided, his negotiations with the Lombards, with more or less success. At length, in 600, though at the time he had been for two years confined to his bed by painful illness, he succeeded in concluding a truce from September to the following April. If the results of these protracted efforts were after all but occasional truces with the enemy, and some mitigation of distress through charity, or through Christian influences brought to bear on the invaders, the blame for the smallness of success was entirely due to the emperor and his representatives, who would neither agree to peace nor assist effectually by arms, nor in any way back up the pope's patriotic exertions. Whatever good was done was due to him, and to him alone.

In the year 601 an event occurred which shows Gregory in a less favourable light, with respect to his relations to the powers of the world, than anything else during his career. Phocas, a centurion, was made emperor by the army. He secured his throne by the murder of Mauricius, whose six sons had been first cruelly executed before their father's eyes. He afterwards put to death the empress Constantina and her three daughters, who had been lured out of the asylum of a church under a promise of safety. Numerous persons of all ranks, and in various parts of the empire, are also said to have been put to death with unusual cruelty. The new emperor is painted in very black colours by the historians of the age (Theophylact, Hist. viii. 104; Cedren. Annal. ad An. i. Phocae; Niceph. Hist. xviii. 404; Evagr. v. 23; Theophylact. Inst. Miscell. xvii. 40). Yet to him and to his consort Leontia, who is spoken of as little better than her husband, Gregory wrote congratulatory letters in a style of flattery beyond even what was usual with him in addressing great potentates. He returns thanks to heaven, and calls on both heaven and earth to rejoice at their accession, vilifying at the same time the memory of the murdered Mauricius as a tyrant from whose yoke the church was now blessedly freed (Ep. xi. indict. vi. 38, 45, 46). His motive, doubtless, was in a great measure the hope of obtaining from the new powers the support which Mauricius had not accorded him in his still pending dispute with the Eastern patriarch. This motive appears plainly in one of his letters to Leontia, to whom, rather than to the emperor, with characteristic tact, he intimates his hopes of support to the church of St. Peter, endeavouring to work upon her religious fears. "I should have entreated you," he says, "to take under your particular protection the hitherto afflicted church of St. Peter, but, as I know you love God, I need not ask you to do what you will do of your own accord, for the more you love God, the more you will love His apostle, to whom it was said, 'Thou art Peter,' &c. I, therefore, do not doubt that you will take care to oblige and bind him to you by whom you desire to be loosed from your sins." These motives, and the adulatory style then in vogue towards the emperors, account for, though they cannot be held to excuse, the conduct of Gregory in this, the most glaring, instance of what was indeed his habit in other cases, that of propitiating the rulers of this world by flattering addresses, if so he might enlist them in what he believed to be the cause of God. That he rightly counted on the disposition of Phocas appears from his successor, Boniface III., having "obtained from the emperor Phocas that the Apo-stetic see of St. Peter, that is the Roman church, should be the head of all churches, because the church of Constantinople wrote itself the first of all churches" (Anastas. Biblioth. Vit. Pontif.). The statement, often made, that Boniface had conferred on him, and accepted, the title itself which Gregory had so strongly repudiated for himself, is not supported by evidence, and is in itself improbable.

Gregory lived only sixteen months after the accession of Phocas. He died after protracted suffering from gout on the 12th of March, A.D. 604, and was buried in the basilica of St. Peter.

What occurred immediately after his death reflects small credit on the Roman people of his day. A famine ensued, which the starving multitude attributed to his prodigal expenditure. They were on the point of expressing their feeling towards their deceased benefactor by destroying his library, which was only saved by the interposition of the archdeacon Peter (his interlocutor in the Dialogues), who asserted that he had seen the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove hovering over his head as he wrote. Peter's sudden death in the pulpit, as he was on the point of confirming this assertion with an oath, was curiously taken as a testimony to its truth, and the library was spared (Joann. Diac. Vit. iv. 69). Hence Gregory is represented in art with a dove above his head.

III. The pontificate of Gregory the Great is rightly regarded as second to none in its influence on the future form of Western Christianity. He lived in the period of transition from Christendom under the imperial power to the mediæval papacy, and he laid or consolidated the foundation on which the latter was built. He advanced, indeed, no claims to authority beyond what had been asserted by his predecessors; yet the consistency, firmness, conscientious zeal, as well as address and judgment, with which he maintained it, and, further, the peculiar circumstances of the time, when the waning of the power of the Eastern empire left him the virtual ruler of Rome, and the sole power to whom the Western church turned for support, and whom the Christianised barbarians, founders of the new kingdom of Europe, regarded with reverence; such conduct and such circumstances paved the way to the system of papal absolutism that culminated under Gregory VII. and Innocent III. Nor, it may be remarked, were any of his measures in this regard more pregnant with consequences (probably far beyond his own anticipation) than those which he took for the consolidation of the church and of the authority of Rome in France and England.

Of the purity of his motives, and of the eminence of his character as a Christian, there can be no doubt. If his Christianity was that of a monk among monks, intensely ascetic, tinged with credulity and superstition, and not averse to persecution, it was of the type most highly regarded in his age, and thoroughly sincere. In some cases, as has been seen, he evinced moderation and tolerance beyond that of his age, and it is impossible to read his letters without recognising the tone and spirit of a genuine Christian. The least defensible part of his proceedings was his adulation of Brunichild and Phocas, which ~~was~~ ~~was~~ justified, as has been attempted, ~~by~~ ~~by~~ the ignorance of the true character of the potentates addressed. It is rather to be accounted for by his zeal for what was or seemed to him the cause of God, together with his peculiar turn for diplomacy, prevailing over complete sincerity, and perhaps in part to his view (evident generally in his letters to potentates) of the reverence due to the powers ordained of God. A like politic insincerity is perceived by some in many of the narratives contained in his Book of Dialogues, sent as they were to confirm the faith of Theodelinda, the Lombard queen, though too puerile, it might be thought, for the credence of a man of his own intelligence and culture. It is more charitable to suppose this otherwise enlightened pope to have been himself deeply tinged with the superstitious credulity of his day.

As a writer he was intellectually eminent, and deserves the place assigned to him among the doctors of the church. His learning, indeed, and mental attitude, were again those of his age. As a critic, an expositor, an original thinker, he may not stand high; he knew neither Greek nor Hebrew, and had no deep acquaintance with the Christian fathers; literature for its own sake he set little store by; classical literature, as being heathen, he repudiated. Though the story which we find told first by John of Salisbury in the 12th century (Policrat. i. 26) of his having purposely burnt the Palatine library is probably untrue, yet his feeling with regard to the classics is sufficiently evident from his sharp reproof of Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, for reading the heathen poets with his pupils in grammar (Ep. ix. 48). Yet, notwithstanding all this, as a clear and powerful exponent of the received orthodox doctrine, especially in its practical aspect, as well as of the system of hagiology, demonology, and monastic asceticism, which then formed part of the religion of Christendom, he spoke with a loud and influential voice to many ages after his own, and contributed more than any one person that can be named to fix the form and tone of mediæval religious thought.

He was also influential as a preacher. A great part of his extant works are sermons, expository and hortatory; and we find him regretting that other duties interfered with more constant devotion to that of preaching.

He is no less famous for his influence on the music and liturgy of the church; hence called "magister caeremoniarum." For the cultivation of church singing he instituted a song-school in Rome, called Orphanotrophium, the name of which implies that it had also a charitable purpose. Of it, John the Deacon gives the following account, after speaking of the cento of antiphons which, like Solomon, he had carefully compiled:—"He founded a school of singers, endowed it with some farms, and built for it two habitations, one under the steps of the basilica of St. Peter the Apostle, the other under the house of the Lateran Palace. There to the present day his couch on which he used to recline when singing, and his whip with which he menaced the boys, together with his original antiphonary, are preserved with fitting reverence." (Vit. Gregor. ii. 6.) Cardinal Bona (de Reb. Liturg. i. 25) gives proof of the existence of song-schools in Rome before the time of Gregory, hence concluding that his object was the reform and improvement only of existing church music. The exact nature of his reforms cannot now be determined with certainty. It is generally alleged in the first place that, whereas St. Ambrose had in the latter part of the 4th century introduced at Milan the four authentic modes or scales, called, after those in ancient Greek music that corresponded to them, Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, Mixo-Lydian, St. Gregory added to them the four plagal, or subsidiary, modes called Hypo-Dorian, Hypo-Phrygian, Hypo-Lydian, and Hypo-Mixo-Lydian, thus enlarging the allowed range of ecclesiastical melody. In explanation of these modes it may be observed in passing that the four so-called authentic ones were scales comprising eight notes of our modern diatonic scale, beginning respectively with the notes D, E, F, and G, which were also the finals of each, and having A, C, C, and D, for their dominant or reciting notes; and that the corresponding plagal modes, while retaining the same finals, began each a fourth lower than the authentic one to which it was subsidiary, and had different dominant or reciting notes, viz. F, A, A, and C. Mr. Chappell, however, in his recently published History of Music, maintains that the ecclesiastical scales above described "are not of the early date that has been supposed," and that "the two systems called Ambrosian and Gregorian did not exist at the time of their now supposed founders," adding that Ambrosian music and Gregorian music meant simply music according to the uses of the churches of Milan and of Rome. Apart from the question of the scales used, there can be no doubt that the subsequently well-known and prevalent terms, "cantus Ambrosianus," "cantus Gregorianus," expressed two distinct styles of church singing, which Ambrose and Gregory respectively promoted the use of. Now Ambrose is said, on undoubted authority, not only to have introduced at Milan the antiphonal method of chanting which had originated at Antioch, and thence spread in the East before its introduction in the West (Theodoret, ii. 24; Socrat. vi. 8; Nicetas, Thesaur. Orthodox. fid. v. 30; Augustin. Confess. ix. 7; Paulin. in Vit. Ambros.), but also to have inaugurated in his church a peculiarly pleasing and melodious style of music, which Augustine, though apparently with some scruple at first as to its propriety, confessed himself delighted with. He says, addressing Ambrose, "Verumtamen cum reminiscor lacrimas meas, quas fudi ad cantus ecclesiae tuae, in primordiis recuperatae fidei meae, et nunc ipso quod moveor, non cantu sed rebus quae cantantur, cum liquida voce et convenientissima modulatione cantantur, magnam instituti hujus utilitatem rursus agnosco. Ita fluctuo inter periculum voluptatis et experimentum salubritatis, magisque adducor, non quidem irretractabilem sententiam proferens, cantandi consuetudinem approbare in ecclesia; ut per oblectamenta aurium infirmior animus in affectum pietatis adsurgat." (Confess. x. 33.) The style of singing here alluded to we may suppose to have been melodious congregational hymnody, as distinct from the monotone, varied only by slight inflexions, to which the orthodox (at Alexandria certainly, and probably elsewhere) had hitherto confined themselves. For Augustine tells us that St. Athanasius at Alexandria required the readers of the psalms to use such moderate flexions of the voice that it was more like recitation than singing (Confess. x. 33); and that the African Donatists, who affected exciting hymnody, reproached the Catholics with their dull and sober psalmody (Ep. cxix. ad Januar. c. 18). Ambrose, then, may be credited with having introduced into the Catholic worship of the West, not only the antiphonal system, but also melodious and attractive hymnody, such as seems to have been previously regarded with suspicion by the orthodox. On the other hand the term "Cantus Gregorianus" was ever used after Gregory's time to denote the "cantus planus," or monotone with inflexions on which the psalms were read; and we find this method spoken of as opposed to "Cantus Ambrosianus." "Scribit Leo Marsicanus in Chronic. Casinens. lib. 2, cap. 97, Ambrosianum cantum in ista Casinensi ecclesia cantari penitus interdictum fuisse" (Martene, de Ant. Eccles. Rit. vol. iii. p. 8). And thus it may be concluded that, whatever else Gregory did in the way of addition to the scales and other improvements or reforms, his especial object was to promote and cultivate the old "cantus planus" rather than the less severe style of melodious singing which had become current in the West from Milan; and that here was the most essential difference between the "Cantus Gregorianus" and the "Cantus Ambrosianus." It is in accordance with this view that Gregory is said by subsequent writers to have banished all that was light and theatrical from the music of the church, and also to have confined the singing to the choir, excluding the general congregation. (See on the whole subject Krazer de Liturgiis; Martin Gerbert, de cantu et musica sacra; Bona, de rebus liturgicis; Chappell's Hist. of Music.)

His institution of the Septiform litany immediately before his accession has been already referred to. It was so called from being appointed by him to be sung by the inhabitants of Rome divided into seven companies, viz. of clergy, of laymen, of monks, of virgins, of matrons, of widows, and of poor people and children. These, starting from seven different churches, were to chant through the streets of Rome, and meet at last for common supplication in the church of the Blessed Virgin. He also appointed "the stations," churches at which were to be celebrated solemn services in Lent and at the four great festivals; at which seasons he visited the churches in person, being received there with stately ceremonial, and taking part in the services. Of the share he had in the composition or arrangement of the liturgy something will be said in the notice of his works, which follows.

His extant works of undoubted genuineness, are:—1. Expositio in beatum Job, seu Moralium libri xxxv. In this celebrated work (begun during his stay at Constantinople, before he was pope, and finished afterwards) "the book of Job is expounded in a threefold manner, according to its historic, its moral and its allegorical meaning. For its exposition in the first of these senses his ignorance of any language but Latin, of ancient history, and of Eastern customs, rendered him quite unfit. The moral interpretation may still be read with profit, though rather for the loftiness and purity of its tone than for the justness of the exposition. Of the allegorical interpretation, according to which the book was conceived as containing latently in itself the whole theory of the Christian church and sacraments, and a condemnation of all heresies, it may be said that a similar treatment might deduce almost anything from any book that was ever written. Names of persons, numbers, words, even syllables, are made pregnant with all kinds of mysterious meanings." The above account of the work is extracted from Milman's History of Latin Christianity.

2. Libri duo in Exechielum: viz. 23 Homilies on Ezekiel, which, having been delivered at Rome in a time of distress during the siege of the city by Agilulph, were afterwards revised by himself, and addressed to a bishop Marianus.

3. Libri duo in Evangelia: viz. 40 Homilies on the gospels for the day, preached by himself at various times, and afterwards edited by himself and addressed to a bishop Secundinus. To these is appended a short sermon, called "Oratio ad plebem de mortalitate," delivered during the plague at Rome between his election and consecration. It includes directions for the Septiform litany.

4. Liber Regule Pastoralis, in 4 parts; a treatise on the duties and responsibilities of the pastoral office, addressed (as appears from the preface) to a bishop John with the purpose of explaining and justifying the writer's former reluctance to undertake the burden of the papedom. This work was held in the highest esteem both at the time of its publication and for ages afterwards. Leander of Seville, to whom he sent it, circulated it in Spain; the emperor Maurice had it translated into Greek; Alfred the Great himself translated it into English; a succession of synods in Gaul enjoined a knowledge of it on all bishops; and Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, in the 9th century, says that a copy of it was delivered, together with the book of canons, to bishops at their ordination, with a charge to them to frame their lives according to its precepts (in Præfatione Operum 55 Capitulorum).

5. Dialogorum libri IV. de vita et miraculis patrum / habitorum, et de aternitate animas. The authenticity of this work has been doubted, but apparently without adequate grounds. It is written in the form of dialogue between the author and the archdeacon Peter, and contains accounts of a number of saintly persons, among whom a prominent place is given to Benedict of Nursia, the contemporary founder of the Benedictine order. It abounds in incredible marvels, and relates, among other things, visions of the state of departed souls, which have been a main support, if not a principal foundation, of the mediæval doctrine about purgatory. The Dialogus were translated into Anglo-Saxon by order of Alfred (Amer. Gest. Alf. in Mon. Hist. Brit. 486 c).

6. Registrum Epistolarum, in 14 books, of which the 13th is wanting; a collection of 838 letters to persons of all orders and degrees in arrangement in one volume, with some alterations and additions, of the previous sacramentary of pope Gelasius, which again had been founded on an older one attributed to pope Leo I. What John the deacon says of Gregory's work is, "Sed et Gelasianum codicem, de Misorum solemnibus multa subrahens, paucos convertens, nonnulla superadjiciens, in unius libelli volumine secretavit" (Johan. diacon. de Vita Greg. lib. 2, c. 17; cf. Bode, Hist. Eccles. ii. 1). The changes made by Gregory were principally in the Missa, or variable offices for particular days; in the Ordo Missæ itself only the two following alterations are spoken of as made by him. First, to the part of the canon beginning, "Hanc igitur oblationem," he added the words, "Dignos nostrum in tua pace disposes, atque ab æternæ damnationis eripi et in electorum tuorum jubæis grægis numerari." Secondly, he transferred the Lord's Prayer from its former place, after the breaking of bread, to its present place in the canon (Ep. ad Jann. Syrac. lib. ix. Ep. 18). Whatever uncertainty there may be as to the original text of Gregory's sacramentary as a whole, it is considered certain that the present Roman canon and, with the exception of certain subsequent additions, the ordinarium also are the same as what he left. [See art. SACRAMENTARY in Dict. Chr. Antiq.]

8. Liber Antiphonarum, a collection of antiphons for mass. To what extent this work was original, or founded on a previous collection, and how far it may have been altered or added to since Gregory's time, are matters of some uncertainty.

Of the following works attributed to Gregory, the genuineness is doubtful:—

1. Liber Benedictinorum.
2. Liber Responsarum seu Antiphonarum.
3. Expositio in librum I. Regum.
4. Expositiones super Canticum Cantabrum.
5. Expositio in scriptum Psalmi Psalmodistice.
6. Concordia quorundam testamentorum sacras Scripturas.

There are also nine hymns attributed to him with probability.

Of Gregory's personal appearance an idea may be formed from a description given by John the Deacon of a portrait preserved to his own day (9th century) in St. Andrew's monastery, "in shieldula post fratrum collarium"; which he concludes to have been painted during the pope's life and by his order. There were in the atrium of the same monastery pictures of the father and mother of Gregory (see GORDIANUS), shown by the inscription on one of them to have been painted by his order; and that this was the case also with his own portrait is inferred from the head being surmounted, not by a crown, but by a tabula ("tabulæ similitudinem"), which John says is the mark of a living person, and by the appended inscription:—

as described. The figure is of cell formed; the face a happy so length of his father's and mother's—"most becomingly retain retundity"; the beard, of moderate size, and somewhat middle of his otherwise bald forehead are two neat little curls twisting towards the right; the crown of the head is round and large; dark hair, decently curled, hangs under the middle of the ear; he has a fine forehead; his eyebrows are long and elevated, but slender; the pupils of the eyes are of a yellow tinge, not large, but open, and the under eyelids are full; the nose is slender as it curves down from the eyebrows, broader about the middle, then slightly curved, and expanding at the nostrils; the mouth is ruddy; the lips thick and subdivided; the cheeks regular ("compositae"); the chin rather prominent from the confines of the jaws; the complexion is described as "aquilinus et lividus" (i.e. "vividus"), not "cardiacus," as it became afterwards. There is some uncertainty about the colours intended. "Aquilinus" may be equivalent to "aquilus" (swarthy), and "cardiacus" may denote the colour consequent on stomach disease ("cardiacus morbus"); in which case, if we adopt the reading "vividus" for "lividus," the meaning would seem to be that he had a dark but fresh complexion when his picture was taken, though in later life it acquired an unhealthy hue. (See Du Cange for the probable meaning of the words.) His countenance is mild; his hands good, with taper fingers, were well adapted for writing. His dress is a chestnut-coloured planeta over a dalmatica, which is precisely the same dress as that in which his father is depicted, and therefore not in Gregory's time peculiarly sacerdotal costume. (See GORDIANUS.) But he is distinguished from his father by the pallium, the then form and mode of wearing which are intimated by the description. It is brought from the left shoulder so as to hang carelessly under the breast, and, passing over the right shoulder, is deposited behind the back, the other end being carried straight behind the neck also to the right shoulder, from which it hangs down the side. In the left hand is a book of the Gospels; the right is in the attitude of making the sign of the cross. (Joan. Diac. in Vit. S. Gregor. l. 4, c. 83.) John the Deacon describes also his pallium, woven of white linen and with no marks of the needle in it; his phylactery (or case for relics), of thin silver, and hung from the neck by crimson cloth, and his belt ("baltheus"), only a thumb's breadth wide—which, he says, were preserved and venerated on the saint's anniversary, and which he refers to as evidences of the monastic simplicity of Gregory's attire. (Joan. Diac. in Vit. S. Gregor. l. 4, c. 8.)

Our chief authorities for the life of Gregory are his own writings, especially his letters. Among ancient writers Gregory of Tours (his contemporary), Bede, Paul Warnefried (730), Ado Trevirensis (1070), Simeon Metaphrastes (1300), Isidorus Hispalensis, have detailed notices of him. Paul the deacon in the 8th century, and John the deacon, a monk of Cassino, in the 9th century, wrote lives of him (Greg. Op. ed. Benedict.). The Benedictine edition of his works contains also a fuller life, supplemented from other sources. [J. B.-y.]

GREGORIUS (52) II., bishop of Rome, after Constantine, from May 19, 715, to Feb. 10, 731, for fifteen years eight months and twenty days, during the reigns of the emperors Anastasius, Theodosius, and Leo the Isaurian.

He is said by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vit. Pontif.) to have been a Roman by birth, educated in the Lateran palace under pope Sergius, and a Benedictine monk; also to have accompanied his predecessor, pope Constantine, to Constantinople, where he evinced his learning and abilities by answering certain questions put to him by the emperor Justinian II., the purport of which is not told, to the satisfaction of the latter. The same authority describes him as pure in life, learned in Holy Scripture, eloquent in speech, and of resolute will, of the last of which characteristics the events of his pontificate afford sufficient proof.

The most important incidents of his reign were, first, the conversion, and with it the subjection to the Roman see, of the German races by the English missionary Boniface, and, secondly, the commencement of the Iconoclastic controversy, in which this pope was at issue with the emperor Leo Isauricus. The popes at this period were still subjects of the Eastern emperors, and required to be confirmed in office by the exarchs of Ravenna, though usually left to themselves to defend their Italian possessions against the neighbouring Lombards, who, having in 568 invaded Italy, and having subsequently established the two powerful dukedoms of Spoleto and Benevento, had lately founded, under king Luitprand, a settled kingdom in the district hence called Lombardy. These long dreaded barbarians, though now professing Catholic Christianity, were still objects of fear and aversion; nor did the occasional friendly relations of Luitprand with the pope or with the emperor prevent his watching for every opportunity that might occur for making himself master of the whole of Italy. In the first year of his pontificate Gregory, for security against his troublesome neighbours, began the restoration of the ruined walls of Rome, a task of which subsequent troubles prevented the completion. In the same year (715) he found himself in conflict with them. They had seized and kept possession of the fortress at Cumae (Cumanum castrum). Gregory, having failed to obtain its cession by remonstrance, spiritual menaces, and offers of money, had at length recourse to the arms of John, duke of Naples (still part of the imperial dominion), who was induced by a bribe of seventy pounds of gold to recapture and restore it to him. Before or after this event we read of Luitprand having shewn a more friendly disposition in restoring to the Roman see its patrimony in the Cottian Alps, which had been previously bestowed on it by the Lombard king Aribert (Paul. Diacon., Bede, Anastas. Bibl.)

The year 717 was marked by the accession of Leo III., called Isauricus, on the abdication of Theodosius; on which occasion the new emperor, far from shewing signs of his future religious attitude, sent the pope a confession of his faith, the orthodoxy of which was also attested by the patriarch Germanus; whereupon Gregory sent a cordial letter in reply, alluded to in his subsequent correspondence.

The year 718 was memorable for the first visit to Rome of the English Winfrith, better known as Boniface, who came with a commendatory letter from Daniel, bishop of Winchester, to seek the pope's authority and blessing for missionary work among the Germans, on which his heart had long been set. He had previously attempted a mission in Frisia without much success, having been thwarted by the pagan king Ratbod, who had at that time thrown off the dominion of the Franks, and devastated the churches already founded in his country. Boniface had therefore returned to his English monastery of Nursling, and after a stay there of two years, and refusal to fill the office of abbat, he repaired to Rome, arriving there in the autumn of 718. Gregory (says Boniface's biographer Willibald), on learning his purpose, looked at him "with blithe countenance and smiling eyes," and at length, after frequent colloquies, sent him forth with his blessing, and under the protection of St. Peter, in the May of the year 719, as a missionary at large to the German unbelievers. He carried with him a number of relics given him by the pope, and a letter addressed to himself, in which he was straitly charged to follow the directions of the Roman see, and refer to it for further instructions, if needed. (Othlon. in Vit. Bonif. i. 12; Bonif. Ep. ii. Giles's ed.) Visiting the Lombard king Luitprand on his way, by whom he was honourably received, the missionary proceeded first to Thuringia, a country, it would seem, already in great measure Christianized, where he exerted himself to correct the heresies and irregularities that had crept in among the clergy. Thence he repaired to France, and, having heard of the death of Ratbod and the recovery of Frisia to the dominion of Charles Martel, he prosecuted a successful mission in that country in conjunction with archbishop Willibrord, of Utrecht, who was already at work there. Urged by him to accept the office of bishop, he steadily refused on the ground partly of unworthiness, but especially of the absence of any command or leave from Rome. Having at length obtained the old prelate's consent to his departure, he returned to Germany about the year 722, and after extraordinary success among the Hessians and Saxons, of whom he is said to have baptized thousands, he sent a messenger to apprise the pope and request instructions. The result was a summons to Rome, which he at once obeyed, arriving there accompanied by several Frank and Burgundian disciples in the year 723. It was now that Gregory, having previously demanded of him a confession of his faith, which because of his imperfect knowledge of Latin he requested him to prepare in writing, and, being satisfied therewith, ordained him bishop on St. Andrew's day, A.D. 723; i.e., a general missionary bishop, not one of any particular see. It was on this occasion that the pope is generally said to have given him the name of Boniface, by which, rather than his original one Winfrith, he is best known. Lingard, however (Angl. Sax. Ch. ii. 338), gives reasons for supposing that he had assumed it previously. The memorable oath which he took on this occasion (Othlon. Vit. Bonif. i. ii. c. 1. 14; Bonifac. Concil. ii. Giles's ed.), was to this effect:

"I, Boniface by the grace of God bishop, promise to thee the blessed Peter, prince of the apostles, and to thy vicar, the blessed pope Gregory and his successors, by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the inseparable Trinity, and by this thy most sacred body, to maintain the purity of the holy Catholic faith, and by the help of God, persevere in the unity of the same; in no wise, through anyone's persuasion, to consent to anything against the unity of the common and universal church; but, as I have said, to evince in all respects my faith, and purity, and concurrence with thee, and the interests of thy church, to whom God hath given the power of binding and loosing, and with thy aforesaid vicar and his successors. Whenever I find the conduct of the chief officers of the church contradictory to the ancient ordinances and decrees of the fathers, I will have no fellowship or connexion with them, but will prevent it if I can, or, if not, will at once report it faithfully to my apostolic lord. And should I ever in any way attempt to do anything contrary to the tenour of this my promise, may I be found guilty in the eternal judgment, and incur the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira, who presumed to commit fraud and to say what was false to thee." The taking of this oath, which was substantially the same as the Indiculus Episcopi then exacted by the pope from the bishops of his own patriarchate (Lib. diurnus, c. iii. tit. 8 and 9), was an event of great importance in the history of the church, as being exacted in this instance from the bishop of a German see, outside not only of the hitherto acknowledged patriarchate of Rome, but even of the Roman empire. It was taken afterwards by all bishops of sees constituted by Boniface, and laid in fact the foundation of the close dependence on Rome of the churches of northern Europe. It is interesting to trace back this result to the memorable mission of Augustine to England by Gregory the Great (597), the consequence of which had been the closer connexion with Rome of the English church than of any other in the north, attested among other ways by frequent pilgrimages and not unfrequent appeals to Rome, and resulting in that entire devotion to the apostolic see that marked and directed the career of the apostle of Germany, Boniface. He now resumed the labours of his mission, fortified by various letters from the pope. One addressed to Charles Martel announces the consecration of Boniface as bishop and missionary to the German races and others on the east of the Rhine, and requests Charles' support and protection. Another, to bishops, clergy, dukes, earls, and Christians generally, commends the new bishop and his companions to their hospitality and support, promising in return, through the intercession of the two chief apostles, communion with the holy martyrs, and threatening such as should oppose them with anathema and damnation. In a third, the clergy and laity of Germany are apprised of the instructions now given to Boniface, in accordance with which they are warned to demean themselves; the instructions being such as these; that he should ordain no bigamist, or one who had espoused a wife who was not a virgin, no illiterate person, none who was maimed in any part of his body, no one under the sentence of any court, and no African; the last prohibition being on the ground that some African candidates had been proved to be Manicheans, or re-baptized (i.e. Donatists); that he should strive to increase the possessions of his churches, dividing their revenues into four parts, for himself, for the clergy, for the poor and strangers, and for church-building; that he should hold ordinations only at the fasts of the fourth, seventh, and tenth months, or at the beginning or middle of Lent, or "vespere sabbato sacro" (i.e. Easter eve); and that, except in cases of danger of death, he should administer baptism only at Easter and Pentecost. Another letter, to the chiefs and others among the Thuringians who were Christians, praises them for steadfastness in the faith, exhorts them to prefer death to apostasy, and enjoins obedience to the new bishop. Two more letters, probably sent on this occasion, are addressed to the Thuringians and Alt-Saxons, both Christian and heathen. The Thuringians are exhorted to hearken to, and build a house and churches for, the holy bishop who had been sent among them for no earthly gain, but to win their souls, and lead them on the way to everlasting bliss. The letter addressed to the Alt-Saxons (as the Saxons on the Continent were called in distinction from the English Saxons) is mainly made up of quotations from the epistles of St. Paul. They are told, among other things, that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand, they are warned against any one seducing them "with excellency of speech" to the worship of idols in which the devils dwell, against being spoiled through "philosophy and vain deceit," since the children of darkness are wiser than the children of light. They are finally warned to put no bar in the way of the conversion of any of their people, and to receive Boniface, whom he, Gregory, had sent, his brother and fellow bishop, to deliver them from the devil and number them among the children of God. (Bonif. Epp. v. vi. vii. viii. ix. x. Giles's ed.) The remaining career of Boniface brings him into no further connexion that is known of with Gregory II., except in respect to two subsequent letters, of which mention will be made in the final enumeration of the extant writings of this pope.

Mention may here be made of a visit of St. Corbinianus, bishop of Frisia, to Rome in 724, to beg permission to retire from his see, which he had held for eight years, to a monastery, or to some desert. He was honourably received, and a synod was held in which the desired leave was refused. An account of this is given in the history of Aribio, the successor of St. Corbinianus. One of the noted pilgrimages from England to Rome was made in the next year, 725, when Ina, king of the West Saxons, after reigning thirty-seven years, renounced his kingdom, and visited the tombs of the apostles with Ethelburga his queen. Both spent the remainder of their days at Rome (Bede, H. E. v. 7). Bede speaks of this being at that time a common practice among the English, both noble and ignoble, laity and clergy, men and women. According to Matthew of Westminster, Ina founded at Rome the Saxon school for such of his countrymen as might choose to be educated there, adding a church for their use; to support which, and to provide a subsistence for the English who should dwell there, he imposed a tribute of one penny on each family of his subjects, called Romescot (Matth. Westminster ad ann. 727). William of Malmesbury attributes the foundation of this school to king Offa, who died in 794. This has been supposed (Edm. Polydore Virg.), though without sufficient proof, to be the origin of the Romescot, which, however, is a mistake.

In the year 726 was published the first edict against image-worship by the emperor Leo Isauricus. At this time the veneration of representations of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and the saints, as well as of relics, had become ingrained in Christian devotion, both in the East and West. Not, however, without some protest, not only from Jews and Mahometans, who charged Christians with idolatry, but also from remonstrants within the church. By whatever influences moved, Leo, having reigned for ten years without shewing any disposition to interfere in religious matters, except in the way of persecuting Jews, suddenly set himself the hopeless task of eradicating the prevailing worship. There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his objection to it, which he grounded on the scriptural prohibition of idolatry (Greg. II. Ep. i.), whatever may be thought of the wisdom or justifiableness of his high-handed procedure. His first edict, issued with the sanction of a senatus-consultum, but without the concurrence of the patriarch, merely forbade the worship of images by genuflexions, prostrations, and the like, and ordered them to be placed high on the walls of churches, so as to preclude such alleged abuse of them. It was not till 730, after a series of conflicts, that he issued a second edict requiring their absolute destruction. His first edict was enough to provoke the most violent resistance. The populace of Constantinople, among whom the women and monks are said to have been especially zealous, rose in insurrection, and had to be controlled by armed troops. Similar disturbances ensued in the provinces. The inhabitants of the Cyclades went so far as to proclaim a rival emperor (one Cosmas, a zealous supporter of image-worship), and to equip a fleet with which they sailed for Constantinople with the view of deposing Leo. But they were successfully met, and their fleet destroyed. In Italy (as was to be expected) the resistance was general and violent. Leo had acquainted the pope with the purport of his edict, and was by him strongly remonstrated with by letter. Notwithstanding this, the edict was sent to Scholasticus, exarch of Ravenna, to be published and enforced. The people of Ravenna rose in insurrection, and bloodshed ensued. Luitprand, the Lombard king, now seized the opportunity, such as he had long desired, of making himself master of Ravenna, and afterwards of all the Pentapolis, being received as a deliverer rather than an enemy; and he proceeded to form it into a dukedom under his grandson Hildebrand. But the permanent loss of the exarchate to the empire, which did afterwards ensue, and which these iconoclastic measures of Leo certainly paved the way for, was deferred for the present. Ursus, duke of Venice, solicited by the pope, came to the aid of the exarch, and together they recovered the territory. The next few years in Italy were occupied by a course of insurrection and warfare, of which the following is a summary. Scholasticus the exarch, suspected by the emperor of connivance with the pope, was superseded in 728 by Paul the Patrician, who marched to Rome in order to seize Gregory, but was prevented by a body of Lombards sent by Luitprand, who at this stage of affairs espoused his cause. Paul now, by the emperor's order, required the edict to be published at Rome, and in all the cities of Italy subject to the emperor. The pope excommunicated Paul; the Roman people rose, overpowered the imperial garrison, broke the statue of the emperor, and renounced their allegiance to him. The pope addressed a circular to the Italian cities, to the Lombards and Venetians, exhorting them to continue steadfast in the faith; the people of the Pentapolis now also renounced their allegiance, appointed magistrates of their own provisionally, and were only prevented from proclaiming a rival emperor by the remonstrances of Gregory. Paul, renewing his attempt to enforce the edict in Ravenna, was killed in an insurrection. Exhilaratus also, duke of Naples, having in vain tried to enforce the edict there, and having, it is alleged, employed two persons to assassinate the pope, was torn in pieces by the multitude. The eunuch Eutychius, sent as exarch to Ravenna in the place of Paul, though received by the people there, failed in inducing them to accept the edict; and having, it was said, sent to Rome a letter from the emperor requiring the imperial officers there to compass the pope's death, he was also excommunicated as his predecessor had been, and his messenger only saved from death by the pope's intervention. Eutychius now endeavoured to gain Luitprand to the emperor's side by promising him the cession of the cities that had been seized by him. Such overtures, however, were unavailing till the dukes of Spoleto and Benevento took the advantage of the disturbed state of things to assert their own independence; when Luitprand, having been assisted by the exarch in reducing them to obedience, proceeded with him to besiege Rome. At this crisis Gregory repaired in person to the camp of the Lombard king to implore mercy for the Roman people. The king, according to Anastasius Bibliothecarius, received him with the utmost deference, throwing himself at his feet, and divesting himself in the church of St. Peter of his arms, crown and royal mantle, which, with a silver cross, he placed upon the tomb of the apostle. But, though he granted the required amnesty, he required the pope and the Roman people to acknowledge the authority of the exarch. While the latter was still in Rome, the people of Tuscany proclaimed one Tiberius (who claimed imperial descent) emperor in the place of Leo. Gregory on this occasion supported the imperial authority, persuading the Romans to join the army of the exarch, who, thus aided, defeated the rebels, and sent the head of the usurper to Constantinople. The magnanimity of the pope in this instance is much lauded by his admiring historians. In the course of all these transactions Baronius, taking his facts from Anastasius, counts up six separate attempts on the life of the pope, authorized by the emperor or his officers; but the silence on this head of other early narrators, and of the pope himself in his subsequent letters to Leo, renders such allegations doubtful.

There seems, however, to be no doubt that attempts were made on the one hand to seize the pope and carry him prisoner to Constantinople (this is all that he in his extant letters speaks of as attempted against himself), and on the other hand that the pope, in his resolute defence of the prevailing worship, and, indeed, of the freedom of the church from tyranny, fomented, directly or indirectly, insurrection, though not to the extent of sanctioning the proclamation of a rival emperor, or (as far as we know) encouraging violence.

In 730 was issued the second edict above referred to, after a great council assembled by Leo at Constantinople, in which the absolute destruction of all images, and the whitewashing of the walls of churches, was ordered. This led to the resignation of the patriarch Germanus, and the appointment of Anastasius in his room. It led also to new and still more serious disturbances at Constantinople, especially in connexion with the destruction of an image of Christ called Ἀντιφωνητής (Surety), which stood over the gate of the imperial palace called the Brazen Gate. On this occasion the people are said to have attacked the imperial officers, some of whom were killed, and the women especially to have pulled down the ladder on which a person employed to remove the image was placed, and to have murdered him after his fall; and also to have assailed the new patriarch during divine service in the great church with opprobrious language and with stones. Notwithstanding all resistance, the edict was enforced throughout the East, and sent to the exarch of Ravenna for publication in the West also. The emperor on this occasion wrote twice to the pope, whose replies are extant, though neither his former letters nor any of Leo's are. To the emperor's allegation of the Old Testament prohibition of idolatry in the second commandment Gregory replies that this prohibition extended only to the images of animals and other creatures set up by the heathen in honour of the devil, not to images in honour of God; and he adduces the works done in gold, silver, and brass by Bezaleel and Aholiab, the tables of stone, the ark, the cherubim, and the pot of manna, as sanctioning the veneration of symbols of divine things. He states that pictures of Christ, of James the Lord's brother, of Stephen and other martyrs, had been taken by their contemporaries, and used from the first in the conversion of the heathen; he adduces as a fact the sending of His own portrait by Christ to Agbarus, king of Edessa; and alleges that the six general councils had handed down the tradition of image-worship. On Leo, in reply, asking how it was that these councils had never mentioned the subject, Gregory rejoins that their silence was equivalent to approval, since the practice was known to have been prevalent at the time of the councils, and habitual to the fathers who composed them. Neither, says he, was anything said in these councils about bread and water, whether men ought or ought not to eat and drink. Leo had referred to the destruction of the brazen serpent by Uzziah (meaning Hezekiah) as justifying his own iconoclasm. Gregory, in replying, falls into the same mistake as to the king referred to, and speaks of his act as one of sacrilege. "Truly," he says, "Uzziah was thy brother, and had thy persuasion, and like thee he tyrannized over the priests of his day; for the holy David introduced that serpent with the ark into the temple." The theory of the adoration of images he defends by the usual assertion of the devotion they were the means of kindling, of the instruction they afforded especially to the young and ignorant and of the real objects of all such worship being not the images themselves but the originals represented by them. The tone of the letters towards the emperor himself is contemptuous and insulting: he is addressed as insolent, proud, headstrong, unlearned, stupid, and with a dense military intellect incapable of entering into spiritual things; he is bid to go to an elementary school, and announce himself as a destroyer and persecutor of images, when the children would at once throw their tablets at his head. To the emperor's proposal of a general council to settle the matter of dispute Gregory replies, "Thou art a contumelious persecutor, enemy, and destroyer of images: leave off, and grant us the favour of thy silence, and then the world will enjoy peace, and scandals will cease. When is the Christ-loving and pious emperor to sit in council in the accustomed way, and reward those who speak aright, and dismiss those who babble contrary to the truth, when thou, the emperor, waverest and imitatest barbarians? Only keep quiet, and there is no need of a council." Further, the emperor is reminded of the entire distinction between the functions of emperors and of bishops, and how the former have neither the right nor the capacity to interfere in things proper to the latter. Lastly, significant warnings are given of the possible consequences of the emperor's persistence in his schemes. "I (to this effect writes the pope) have no fear of you. I have only to pass into Campania, and I shall be safe. The whole West venerates St. Peter as a terrestrial god. I purpose visiting the extreme regions of the West, where my missionaries have been requesting my aid in bringing princes to baptism. Naked and unarmed as we are, we call on Christ the prince of the supernatural powers to send a demon upon you, as says the apostle, 'to deliver such a one to Satan,' &c. Consider what may ensue. Already, in the East, women have been found inflamed with zeal, and, emulous of those who brought ointments, who when they had in vain implored your agent to spare the image of the Saviour, pulled away the ladder on which he stood, and killed him with clubs. Already your authority has been disowned, and your statues broken in Italy. Should you send your satellites to Rome to overthrow the image of St. Peter, the Westerns are ready to avenge the Easterns. See, we protest to thee, we are innocent of the blood which they will shed: back on thy neck and thy head will these things fall." A synod afterwards held at Rome is alluded to by pope Hadrian (Ep. 1, ad Car. Magn.), in which, after a speech from the pope setting forth the usual arguments for image-worship, the retention of the practice was decreed, and its impugnors condemned. In return the emperor is said to have confiscated the papal patrimonies in Sicily and Calabria, and subjected these provinces, as well as Eastern Illyricum, to Constantinople instead of Rome. But it is not certain whether the synod referred to was held under Gregory II. or his successor Gregory III., in whose reign the reprisals of the emperor above mentioned seem to have taken place. The Greek historians, Theophanes, Cedrenus, Zonaras, Nicephorus, followed by Baronius, or Bellarmine (de Pont. Rom. v. 8), and on the Protestant side by the Magdeburg Centuriators (Cent. viii.), assert that Gregory II. excommunicated the emperor himself as well as the patriarch Anastasius. But his excommunication of the emperor is not mentioned by Paulus Diaconus, by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, nor by any old Latin writers, and is now generally discredited.

Gregory, besides his activities in the ways that have been detailed, was memorable for his restoration of churches ruined by the Lombard ravages, and his re-establishment of neglected monasteries. Among the churches restored by him are mentioned especially the basilica of St. Paul, and that of St. Laurence without the walls, to which he also conveyed water by pipes. Among the monasteries revived by him, and replenished with monks, were those about the basilica of St. Paul, one called Gerontocomium, behind the apse of St. Mary ad Praesepe, and especially the original Benedictine monastery on Mount Cassino.

He died Feb. 10, 731. He appears as a saint in the Roman Calendar, his day being the 13th of the same month. The following letters of this pope are preserved:—

1. The fragment of one to Turpin, archbishop of Rheims, with respect to a bishop Rigobert, who had been uncanonically deposed by Charles Martel. (Baronius, ad ann. 717.)

2. To Austrobert, archbishop of Vienne, commending Boniface to him, dated prid. Cal. Sept. ann. 3. Leon. imp. (Baron. ad ann. 718.)

3. To Boniface himself (above referred to), giving him commission to preach to the heathen under the authority of, and in subjection to the apostolic see, dated Id. Mai. an. 3 Leon. Imp. (Baron. ad ann. 719; Bonifac. Epist.)

4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. Six letters commendatory of Boniface after his consecration, which have been specified above. (Baron. ad ann. 723; Bonifac. Epist.)

10. To Boniface himself, mentioning among other things that the writer had sent a letter to Charles Martel exhorting him to take measures against a bishop who had neglected to evangelize the Germans, and also to Thuringians and Germans exhorting them to found sees and churches. (Baron. ad ann. 724; Bonifac. Ep. 15 in Giles's edition.)

11. To Boniface in reply to various questions with respect to matters of discipline. In consideration of the barbarity of the people they may be allowed to marry after the fourth degree of consanguinity; a husband whose wife "infirmitate correpta non valuerit debitum tori reddere" may be allowed to marry another, "because here great people are concerned," but must maintain his first wife; an accused presbyter, if the proofs against him are uncertain, may purge himself by his own oath: one cup only is to be used in the celebration of mass, in conformity with the original institution by Christ. St. Paul's rule about not eating things that had been sacrificed to idols is to be observed, even though the sign of the cross had been made over the meats; infants placed by their parents in monasteries are not to be released on coming to years of discretion; persons baptized by adulterous and unworthy priests, and without interrogation as to their faith, are not to be rebaptized if the right form had been observed; children taken from their parents, of whose baptism there is no proof, are to be baptized. No one once confirmed by a bishop is to be confirmed again; faithful lepers, though not to be allowed to eat with others, are not to be debarred from communion; infectious disease in a monastery is to be no excuse for its inmates leaving it; finally, Boniface is not to stretch discipline so far as to refuse social intercourse with vicious priests or bishops, or with vicious nobles whose aid may be valuable. The epistle is dated 10 Kal. Decemb. ann. 10 Leon. Imp. (Bonifac. Ev. 24 in Giles's edition.)

12. Capitulare Gregorii Papae II., given to Martinianus, a bishop, Georgius a presbyter, and Dorotheus a subdeacon, on their being sent into Bavaria, containing directions as to discipline. (Labbe, Concil.)

13. Seventeen anathemas pronounced in a synod held at Rome in 721 against unlawful marriages, then prevalent in Italy, and also against resort to magic and soothsayers, and the wearing of long hair by the clergy. In these marriage is condemned with presbyterae, diaconae, monachae, commatres spirituales, as well as with brothers' wives and blood relations. The presbyterae and diaconae referred to Baronius takes to mean the wives of presbyters and deacons who had been married before ordination, and who had (according to the custom in the west) been put away by their former husbands. (Cf. Bingham, b. ii. ch. xxii. 15.) [Labbe, Concil.; Baron. in ann. 721.]

14. A letter to Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, on the subject of Leo's iconoclasm, preserved in the acts of the seventh (2nd Nicene) council: Act. iv. (Labbe, Concil.)

15. The two letters on the worship of images to the emperor Leo, the contents of which are summarized above. These letters exist only in Greek, and were first published by Baronius, who erroneously refers them to the year 721 instead of 726 (Muratori, Jaffe), or 730 (Pagi). Their genuineness has been questioned, but is generally allowed. (Walch, x. 174; Schröckh, xx. 535. 61.)

Other letters said to have been written by Gregory II. are lost.

The early authorities for his life, besides extant letters, are principally Anastas. Biblioth. in Vit. Pontif.; Paulus Diaconus; Theophanes, Chronograph.; Othlon. in Vit. Bonifac.; Willibald, in ejusd. Vit.; Nicephorus Cpol. Cf. Baron. Annal.; Pagi, Breviar.; Muratori; Jaffé, Regest. Pontif. Rom.; Bower, Lives of the Popes.

[J. B.—y.]

GREGORIUS (53) III., successor of Gregory II., bishop of Rome from March 18, 731, to Nov. 27, 741, during ten years, eight months, and eleven days, and contemporary with Leo the Isaurian. He was a Syrian by birth, and is said by Anastasius Bibliothecarius to have been forcibly seized and placed in the pontifical chair, as through a sudden impulse of the Holy Ghost, by the Roman people, as he was assisting at the obsequies of his predecessor. He was consecrated as soon as the confirmation of the exarch had been obtained, being the last pope whose election was so confirmed, leave to consecrate without waiting for the emperor's confirmation having been first obtained in the time of Benedict II. (683–5). His reign was memorable for the progress of what had marked and had its commencement in that of his predecessor, namely, the ecclesiastical subjection of Germany to Rome through the missionary Boniface, and the disturbed relations between Italy and Constantinople, together with renewed Lombard aggression, consequent on the Iconoclastic controversy. It was further especially noteworthy for the first step taken towards the transference of Rome politically from the suzerainty of the Eastern emperors to that of the Frank rulers of the West.

Immediately after his accession this pope took up the cause of image-worship, in which his predecessor had been so zealous, sending a letter to Leo and to his son Constantinus Copronymus (associated with him in the empire since 720), calling on them to renounce their errors. His messenger, Gregory, a Roman presbyter, having returned to Rome without having had the courage to deliver the letter, and having been again despatched, was arrested in Sicily by the emperor's order, and sent into exile. Gregory had convened a synod at Rome, attended by ninety-three bishops and the clergy generally, the laity being also present, in which image-worship was again established as agreeable to the practice of the Apostles, profaners and blasphemers of sacred images were excommunicated, and a resolution was come to that a new attempt should be made to convert the emperor. Accordingly two more unsuccessful legations were sent to Constantinople. The first was headed by Constantine, defensor of the Roman church, carrying a second letter from the pope: but he was stopped on his road and imprisoned for a year. The second (in 733), headed by Peter the Defensor, was charged not only with letters from the pope both to the emperor and to the patriarch, but also with a memorial from the people of Italy, representing the disturbances that had arisen from the imperial edict against images, and their determination to oppose it. The members of this legation were arrested in Sicily by Sergius, the commander of the imperial troops there, and sent back to Rome. (Anastas. Biblioth.) Next year (734) the emperor sent a fleet under Manes, in the hope of reducing his Italian subjects to obedience. The fleet was wrecked by a storm in the Adriatic, after which all attempts on both sides ceased (Theophan. ad ann. Leon. 17).

The exarch remained powerless at Ravenna, unable even there to enforce the edict, and the Romans once more appointed magistrates of their own, forming a sort of independent republic, under the pope as their head. In the meantime Gregory is said to have expended large sums, amounting to seventy-three pounds weight of gold, and 376 of silver, in filling the churches at Rome with pictures and images, and in collecting relics from various quarters, for the keeping and veneration of which he founded an oratory with an establishment of monks. Peace continued till 740, when the Lombards became the authors of new disturbances. The two dukes of Spoleto and Benevento, who in the time of Gregory II. had rebelled against Luitprand, the Lombard king, and been by him reduced with the exarch's aid, again revolted. Defeated by Luitprand, they took refuge in Rome, where the pope protected them. In the spring of 741 Luitprand invaded and devastated the Roman territory, and having given up to plunder the church of St. Peter without the walls, laid siege to the city. Now it was that Gregory began the overtures to the Franks, which led eventually to such unpoptant results. Charles Martel had now for twenty-six years been the virtual ruler of the Franks, as mayor of the palace, and had a few years before won his memorable victory over the Saracens at Tours. To him, the most powerful magnate of the age, Gregory sent an embassy, carrying, among other valuable presents, keys of St. Peter's tomb, and supposed filings from the chain with which the apostle had been bound in Rome; and imploring protection to the apostle, his church, and people. Charles, though he received the embassy with great respect, and bestowed presents in return, was unmoved by the request. Gregory now addressed to him a most pathetic letter, which is extant (Greg. iii. Ep. 5, Concil.; Baron. ad ann. 740), in which he represents himself as overwhelmed with grief, tears streaming day and night from his eyes, on beholding the church of God abandoned by all her children, even by those in whom she had most reason to confide. He draws a most lamentable picture of the devastation and destitution caused by the Lombard invaders, and attributes their aggression, not to the protection afforded by himself to the rebel dukes, but to the latter having refused to join Luitprand in making war on the church and people of God. Those, he says, who accuse these persecuted dukes of treason and rebellion are guilty of a lie. St. Peter, he declares, is able to defend his own house and people without the aid of mortal man, though, with some apparent inconsistency, he speaks of his whole safety and happiness depending on Charles's answer. Him he endeavours to move by appealing both to his pride and his religious fears, as well as to his compassion and piety. "O that you could but hear the insulting and reproachful language with which they revile us, or rather you! Where is that mighty Charles, say they, whose protection you have implored? Where are those formidable Frank armies? Let them come to deliver you, if they dare, out of our hands!" And, appealing to his religious fears, he implores him, as he regards the salvation of his own soul, to hasten to the relief of St. Peter's church, lest the apostle in his turn should shut the gates of heaven on him; and he, the pope, undertakes, if delivered from the present danger, to pray day and night before the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul for Charles and all his subjects. But neither this nor a second letter had the desired effect; and it was not till a substantial temporal equivalent for the aid demanded was offered that anything was done. Such an equivalent was offered, through a second embassy, in the proposal that the Romans should altogether renounce their allegiance to the emperor, and put themselves under Charles as their protector, on whom the title of Patrician and Consul of Rome was to be conferred, he undertaking to protect them against the Lombards, and against the emperor in case of his molesting them. Charles now sent Grinan, abbat of Corbie, and Sigebert, a monk of St. Denys, as his emissaries to Rome. After their arrival the Lombards withdrew their troops and ceased from hostilities, retaining, however, four cities in the Roman territory which they had captured. The death of Charles Martel on Oct. 22 of the year of this treaty (741), and of Gregory on Nov. 27 of the same year, prevented any farther immediate results. (On this whole transaction, see G. Richter, Annal. d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, 1873, i. 200, and Veltmann, de Patriciatu Karoli Martelli, Münster, 1863.)

On hearing of the accession of Gregory III. Boniface, the apostle of Germany, wrote to him, imploring a continuance of the favour accorded him by the preceding pope, and craving answers to certain questions. In reply Gregory (A.D. 732) sent him the pall, to be worn at mass and the consecration of new bishops, thus giving him the rank and jurisdiction of an archbishop. With it a letter was sent containing replies to the questions asked, which evince, in some respects, a spirit of greater strictness than that of the last pope. More bishops are to be ordained whenever needed; a certain criminal priest under Boniface's jurisdiction, who had represented himself as having been absolved at Rome, is to be corrected; persons baptized by pagans, or by priests who sacrificed to Jupiter or ate things offered in sacrifice to idols, are to be re-baptized; the eating of the flesh of horses, whether wild or tame, is forbidden as unclean and execrable, and to be visited with penance; for Catholics only are eucharistic oblations to be offered; marriages within the seventh degree are prohibited; husbands who have lost their wives are not to marry again more than once, if they can be restrained from doing so; persons who have killed their parents, brothers, or sisters, and such as have sold their slaves to be sacrificed by pagans, are to abstain from flesh during life, to fast on the second, fourth, and sixth days of every week, and be debarred from communion till the last viaticum; finally, the assistance of three bishops is required for the consecration of new ones.

Six years after this (A.D. 738) Boniface visited Rome for the third time, accompanied, we are told, by a crowd of disciples, and was there most honourably received. After remaining there, or in the neighbourhood, for a whole year, visiting shrines and collecting relics, he returned to the scene of his labours, and, on the invitation of Odilo, duke of Bavaria, proceeded to that country, where, with the duke's assistance, he propagated the Catholic faith, restored churches, and corrected irregularities, being especially zealous against heretical seducers of the people, who seem to have got a great hold on the church in those parts. His most memorable work there was his division of the country, with duke Odilo's sanction, and the pope's subsequent approval, into four episcopal sees, those of Salzburg, Freising, Regensburg, and Passau. We have extant four letters from Gregory III. written A.D. 739, the year of Boniface's return, and either taken with him or sent afterwards. 1. To all bishops, priests and abbats, commending Boniface, and enjoining them to hinder none of their ministers from joining him. 2. To the princes of Germany, Thuringia and Hessa, bidding them receive and hearken to Boniface and the clergy ordained by him, and not impede his acts of discipline; exhorting also such as were Christians, to abstain from various heathen usages and superstitions, such as are known to have lingered long in converted nations. 3. To the bishops of Bavaria and Germany, ordering them to attend a synod to be summoned in the pope's name at Cologne, or on the banks of the Danube, or elsewhere at the discretion of Boniface, and to receive him there with due honour, and accept from him the faith and order of the Roman Church, rejecting Britons and all false and heretical priests, as well as lingering rites of heathenism. 4. To Boniface himself in reply to an account he had sent of his proceedings. In Germany he had reported the conversion, with the aid of Charles Martel, of as many as one hundred thousand. In Bavaria, when he had found but one bishop, Vivilius, ordained not long before by the pope, he had announced his establishment, with the assent of duke Odilo, of the four new sees already mentioned. Of this measure the pope approves, urges him not to relax his endeavours to procure entire uniformity to the traditions of the Roman see, directs him to assemble a council on the banks of the Danube, and enjoins him not to stay in one place, but go and ordain bishops, and require uniformity with Rome wherever he can, regardless of difficulties. (Bonif. Ep. 43, 44, 45, 46, Giles's ed.)

It appears from the above summary that the establishment of Roman orthodoxy and order, and of Roman supremacy, was as difficult a part of the work of Boniface, and equally at the heart of his master, as the planting of the cross among unbelievers.

England was not overlooked by Gregory III., who, in 735, sent the pall to Egbert bishop of York, who was the first, according to Bede, since Paulinus who had thus been constituted archbishop of that see (Bede, H. E. Contin.).

To this pope is attributed the institution of the feast of All Saints on Nov. 1, in place of that in honour of the blessed Virgin and all martyrs, which Boniface IV. had appointed for the 13th of May (Anastas. Biblioth.).

Besides the letters above referred to, an extant document is attributed to this pope Excerptum ex patrum dictis et canonum sententiis, about sins and penances, for the use of confessors. Anastasius states that he also left a book of epistles no longer extant. He describes him as learned as well as mild, pious, and charitable, being versed in the Latin and Greek languages, and in holy Scripture; and mentions as a thing then new and unheard of that he knew all the Psalms by heart. He appears as a saint in the Roman calendar, his day being the 28th of November.

For the authorities for his life, see the list appended to the life of Gregory II. [J. B.—y.]

GREGORIUS (54)—Dec. 24. A presbyter and martyr at Spoleto (Spoleto) in the Diocletian persecution. His acts in Surius and Ado are very legendary. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.; Till. Mém. v. 347.) [G. T. S.]

GREGORIUS (55), abbat, fl. 390. He migrated from Palestine to Cyprus. Epiphanius, afterwards bishop of Salamis, appears on arriving in Cyprus to have entered his brotherhood. In one of his letters Gregory calls Epiphanius his son, and exhorts him to greater austerities. The high esteem of the latter for his old abbat is evident from an epistle of Epiphanius addressed to John of Jerusalem, and translated into Latin by St. Jerome. Gregory died before or soon after Epiphanius. He was the author of a Syriac work of unknown title and contents; ten discourses to his monks; and three epistles, one addressed to his disciple Theodore, and two to Epiphanius. (Assem. Biblioth. Orient. i. 170.) [C. J. B.]

GREGORIUS (56), a deacon and monk of Nazianzus, formerly a slave of Gregory Nazianzen, but manumitted by him as a reward for the loyalty of his service. He was one of the executors of Gregory's will, together with Marcellus the deacon and monk, and Eustathius. Gregory made him universal legatee of all his property both real and personal, to hold it for the benefit of the church of Nazianzus and its poor. As a personal legacy Gregory bequeathed him and Eustathius a farm at Arianzus, together with the live-stock, and fifty gold pieces. (Greg. Naz. Testam.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (57), a presbyter and abbat of a monastery near Jerusalem, or perhaps of Epiphanius's own house at Eleutheropolis, who was mixed up with the dispute between Epiphanius and John of Jerusalem, arising from the ordination of Jerome's brother Paulinian. John asserted that he had sent a message through Gregory to Epiphanius forbidding him to ordain any one, which was denied by Gregory (Hieron. Epist. lx.; Rufin. H. E. c. ii. 157). [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (58), abbat of Zeugma on the Euphrates, contemporary with Theodoret in the 5th century. (Theodoret, Philoth. cap. 5.) [C. J. B.]

GREGORIUS (59), presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of Cyprus according to one place in the lists, and in the Latin only. [GEORGIUS (48).] [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (60), ST., a local saint of Alcalá del Rio, on the Guadalquivir, near Seville. His relics were preserved there in a church built by Ferdinand and Isabella in his honour. The epitaph on the tomb in which they were found states that he lived about seventy years, and died in peace on the 9th of September, 542 of the era of the Goths, corresponding to A.D. 504. He is commemorated on the 9th of September. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 368.) [F. D.]

GREGORIUS (61), abbas, presbyter in the coenobium of Scholarea, from whom John Moschus, while residing in Nonus at Alexandria, heard a story about an aged brother of his society. The brother was of such extreme simplicity that he indiscreetly communicated in the Eucharist wherever he chanced to be. One day an angel appeared to him and enquired how he would like to be buried after death, whether according to the manner of the Egyptian monks or the manner of the Jerusalem monks. The old man was unable to say, and the angel gave him three weeks to consider. He consulted one of the brethren as to the answer he should give. "Where do you receive the sacrament?" asked the brother. "Wherever I find it," was the old man's simple reply. "In future then," returned the brother, "never communicate out of the Catholic apostolic church, within which the four holy synods are recognised, the Nicene of 318 fathers, the Constantinopolitan of 150, the first Ephesian of 200, the Chalcedonian of 650. Tell the angel you wish to be buried as the monks of Jerusalem." The angel returned and the old man replied accordingly. "Well, well," said the angel, and the old man immediately died, being thus spared the disaster of having laboured in vain and being buried with heretics. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 145, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 209.)

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (62), archimandrite of the monastery of St. Theodosius in the wilderness of Jerusalem, who told John Moschus the story of Gregorius the Cappadocian (vid. No. 63).

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (63), the CAPPADOCIAN, an anchorite, regarding whom John Moschus was told the following story by Gregorius the archimandrite of the monastery of Theodosius in the wilderness of Jerusalem. Gregory the Cappadocian, a brother of this society, had his duties at Phaselis. On a certain baking-day he had lit the fire, but when he came to clean out the oven the cloth was not to be found, for the brethren had hidden it in order to try his patience; so Gregory got into the oven, swept it out with his own coat, and came out uninjured by the fire. Another day he was feeding swine at Phaselis when two lions approached and tried to carry one of them off. Gregory took a switch and drove the lions down to the Jordan. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 92, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 165.)

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (64), abbas, anchorite, respecting whom John Moschus was informed by one of the anchorites at Theopolis near Mount Amanus. When Gregory, who wandered naked in the desert for thirty-five years, was in the mountains near the monastery of Theodosius in Scopulus, the disciple by whom he was accompanied died. Gregory having no implements for digging a grave, descended to the shore, where he found a party of sailors just arrived and begged them to come and bury the body. They did so, and one of them named Thalaëus remained to take the dead man's place. After a year he found his frame wonderfully invigorated, but in two years and a half more Thalaëus, believing he was going to die, begged Gregory to go with him to Jerusalem, where he might adore the cross before his departure. Thither they went, and after visiting the sacred spots descended to the Jordan, where Thalaëus died and was buried in the monastery of Copratha. Here Gregory himself soon afterwards died and was buried. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 91 in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 164.)

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (65) THE BYZANTINE, abbas, anchorite, respecting whom John Moschus was informed by the anchorites of Raithu, near the Red Sea. This Gregory took up his abode with another anchorite, his disciple, named Gregorius Pharonites, on a neighbouring island whereon there was no water, and water had to be fetched from the mainland in a boat which they kept. One day they had moored the boat to a rock, and let her float, but a storm in the night broke the rope and wrecked the boat. After eight months some monks of Raithu landed on the island and found both of their brethren dead, and on the back of a turtle there was an inscription recording that Gregory Pharonites died after going without water twenty-eight days, and his master had tasted none for thirty-seven days. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spirit. cap. 121, in Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 181.)

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (66), abbat of St. Theodore in the district of Palermo, who by his neglect had caused great harm to his monastery, and was not allowed by Gregory the Great to be restored till after long punishment. (Greg Magn., Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. ep. 12; lib. v. indict. xiii. ep. 6; Migne, lxxvii. 455, 727.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GREGORIUS (67), surnamed DORMITANTIUS (δ νορτάς), a Severian of Alexandria late in the 7th century. He held more than one public disputation in that city with Anastasius Sinaita who in his Hodegus or Vias Dux speaks of him with little respect as in habit of mind a Syraegyptian. (Anastas. Sinait. Vias Dux, cap. 10 in Migne, Patr. Graec. lxxxix. 161, 169 n., 173, 181, 184.)

[T. W. D.]

GREGORIUS (68) (GEORGIUS), presbyter, messenger of pope Gregory III. [GREGORIUS (53), p. 796 b.] (Anastas. Bibliothec. de Vit. Rom. Pontif. num. 191, in Patr. Lat. cxxviii. 1024, the readings vary between Gregorius and Georgius.)

[C. H.]

GREGORIUS (69), Roman presbyters present at Roman councils, and belonging to the following churches:—

St. John and St. Paul, in 721 (Mansi, xii. 265), possibly the Georgius of 745 (M. 381). [GEORGIUS (51).]

St. Clement in 721, 745 (M. 265, 380).

St. Balbina in 745 (M. 381); at council of Paul I. in 761 (M. 649).

St. Anastasia, at council of 761 (M. 650).

Two presbyters of churches unnamed at the council of 743 (M. 367, 368). [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (70), ST., disciple of Boniface, abbat and administrator of the church of Utrecht (Trajectum). His life was written by his disciple St. Liudger, first bishop of Münster. He was born about A.D. 708, at Treves, of a noble Frank family, his father, Albricus, being a grandson of king Dagobert II. St. Boniface, on his way from Frisia to new labours among the Hessians and Thuringians, rested by the way at the convent of Paly (Palatiolum), near Treves, of which Adula or Adela, the grandmother of Gregory, was abbess. The youth, who had just left school, and was fourteen or fifteen years of age, was sent for, at the suggestion of Boniface, to read the Scriptures for the edification of the company at the convent meals. He read well, but Boniface, by his questions, elicited that he did not understand what he had read, so as to render it into his own Teutonic language. Thereupon the saint expounded and commented on the passage so eloquently that the boy's heart was touched, and he announced his intention of accompanying him on his mission. In vain his grandmother remonstrated. Gregory declared that if she would not provide him with a horse, he would go on foot, but go he would. Arrived in Thuringia they found the country desolated and impoverished by war. The labour of their hands provided them with the barest sustenance; and often some outbreak of the heathen compelled them to a hasty, though temporary, flight. Bu:

their labours were rewarded by the gradual conversion of the land.

In time St. Boniface became bishop of Mentz (743), and his disciples were appointed administrators of the neighbouring districts, and among them, St. Gregory of the church of Utrecht, where he was assisted by a coadjutor of English race, named Alubert. He never became bishop, but, though his biographer does not state it in so many words, he seems to have been the abbat of a monastery in that city, for in the Acta of St. Liudger (s. 8; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcix. 773), we are told that the latter discarded his lay habit at the monastery in Utrecht, when he became St. Gregory's disciple.

He accompanied St. Boniface on one of his journeys to Rome, and brought back many sacred volumes, and two boys of English race named Marchelmus and Marcuvinus, who became his disciples.

His biographer dwells on his contempt of money, the simplicity of his food and raiment, his sobriety, his gentleness to enemies and detractors, and his almsgiving. Two of his half-brothers, returning from France to their own country, were set upon and killed by robbers. The murderers, when captured, were brought to Gregory, that he might inflict upon them what death he chose. Disdaining all thought of vengeance, he loosed their bonds, and when they had been tended and fed, dismissed them with exhortations and words of charity.

His disciples were very numerous, and were drawn, we are told, from high-born Franks, the "religiosa gens" of the Angli, the newly converted Frieslanders and Saxons, and even from the Bavarians and Suevi. Many of them rose to high place in the church.

At the age of seventy he was stricken with paralysis of the left side, which for three years, until his death in A.D. 781, rendered him nearly helpless, so that at last he was carried about by his disciples. Feeling his end approaching, he had himself borne to the oratory of St. Salvator, where he breathed his last, and where he was probably buried. He is commemorated Aug. 25. A letter written to him in 752 by Lullus, bishop of Mainz, is extant (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 821). His successor at Utrecht was a kinsman and adopted son named Albricus. (Vita S. Gregorii Abbatis, auct. Ludgero in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcix. 752; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. v. 240; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pars ii. 319 seqq., Paris, 1668-1701.) [S. A. B.]

GREGORIUS (71), the name of the following presbyters at the council of Nicaea in 787:—

Representing the bishop of Smyrna (M. xii. 1096 a).

Representing the bishop of Nicopolis (M. xii. 1096 e). [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (72), the name of the following hegumeni at the council of Nicaea in 787, viz. of Agaurus (Mansi, xiii. 151 E).

Callistratus (ib. 151 D).

Hormisdas (ib. 151 A).

Hyacinthus (ib. 151 B, xii. 1111 E).

Monagrus (xiii. 151 D).

Pega (xii. 1112 E, Latin, Georgius in Greek). [GEORGIUS (70).]

St. Clement (xiii. 156 E).

St. Theotokos (ib. 156 D). [C. H.]

GREGORIUS (73), a soldier, who with two others, Theodorus and Leo, in the time of Constantius, took refuge from the Arian persecution in the island of Cephallonia, where they lived in the ruins of a temple concealed by a thick wood. Their remains are said to have been miraculously revealed to Michael, a rich nobleman of the island, who was a leper, and who was cured by touching them. They are mentioned in the additions to Usuard's Martyrology in the Cologne edition of A.D. 1515 (in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 396). They are commemorated on August 24. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 771.) [F. D.]

GREGORIUS (74), prefect of Italy, A.D. 336 (Cod. Just. v. xxvii. 1, July; Cod. Theod. xi. 1, 3, Oct. Gothofred, n.), and also A.D. 337 (Cod. Theod. iii. i. 2). He was sent by Constantine to suppress the Donatists in Africa, A.D. 345, when Donatus of Bagaia wrote him a scurrilous letter. (Optat. Milev. de Schism. Donat. iii. 3, 10, Op. ed. Du Pin, Monument. p. 297; Du Pin, Hist. Donatist. prefixed to his edition of Optatus, xxvi.; Gothofred. Prosopogr. Cod. Theod. a. a. Gregorius.) [T. W. D.]

GREGORIUS (75), a governor of Cappadocia, to whom shortly after his arrival Gregory Nazianzen wrote in behalf of his niece Alypiana, the widow of Nicobulus, and her children. The recent death of her husband had plunged Alypians in such a sea of troubles that she and her children had no leisure even to bemoan their misery. Gregory earnestly commends the widow and orphans to Gregorius's protection. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 44.) [E. V.]

GREGORIUS (76), prefect of Gaul, at the end of the reign of Gratian (Sulp. Sev. ii. 49). [PRISCILLIANUS.] [M. B. C.]

GREGORIUS (77), Patricius of Africa, 645. He presided at the public disputation which was held in Africa that year between the abbat Maximus and Pyrrhus the exiled bishop of Constantinople (Maxim. Disput. c. Pyrrho, Migne, Patrol. Gr. xci. 287-354). A.D. 647 he revolted, by the aid of the Saracens, and was soon afterwards killed in battle by his allies (Theoph. Chron. a. a.). Joannes Moschus, who praises Gregorius very highly, has a characteristic story about him. He also states that he was a native of the province of Apamea, Syria Secunda (Prot. Spirit. c. 196; Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxvii. 3079; Baronius, s. a. 645, i. iii. vi. xxv. s. a. 646, xxv. s. a. 647, i.; Pagi, s. a. 646). Maximus also calls him GEORGIUS (ep. 18, Migne, u. s. 585). [T. W. D.]

GREGORIUS (78), duke of Benevento (732-739), nephew of Luitprand, by whom he was put into the duchy during the minority of Gisulf, another nephew, son of the former duke Romnald. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 55, 56; Catalogus Regum Langob. et Ducum Ben. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 494; Troya, no. 490, iii. 575.) [A. H. D. A.]

worship, with Maria a patrician lady and others [MARIA].

GREGORIUS (80) DECAPOLITES, lived under Leo V. the Armenian, A.D. 813–820. He took his surname from being born at one of the cities of the Isaurian Decapolia, named Irenopolis. Joseph the Hymnographer was a pupil of his, and was despatched by him to Rome to acquaint pope Leo III. with the unhappy state of the Eastern church under the reigning emperor, who was an ardent adherent of the Iconoclasts, and cruelly persecuted those who took the opposite side. Gregory was a considerable traveller, and visited many foreign countries. On his return to Constantinople he had the grief of finding that Joseph had been apprehended by Leo, and carried prisoner to Crete, where he remained in confinement till the emperor's death in 820. Gregory found another confessor, named Simeon, at Constantinople, suffering on account of his resistance to the Iconoclasts, and visited and comforted him in his prison. He did not long survive the emperor, and Joseph, on his return from Crete, found his old master dead, and erected a monastery to contain his body and that of his fellow pupil John. Gregory is commemorated in the Menaea on Nov. 20, though he is placed by some on April 18. We have extant an historical sermon of his, narrating the conversion of an Arab marauder named Ampelus, who was sacrilegiously profaning a church at the time of the celebration of the Eucharist, by the miraculous appearance of a living child on the paten and blood in the chalice. (Galland. Vit. Patr. Bibl. vol. xiii. p. 13; Migne, Patrol. vol. c. p. 1199; Pagius, ad ann. 721, No. 2, ad ann. 817, No. 18.)

[E. V.]

GRELLAN (GALLAN, GREALLAN, GRILLAN, GRILLAN), (1) the son of Rotan, commemorated April 15 (Mart. Doneg., Mart. Tall.). He has been identified with one of the companions of St. Columba when he came from Ireland to Iona. Reeves and Fordun call him Grillan, and Leslaeus and Boethius, Gallan, but all place him last in the list. On the authority of the last two authors, Dempster and Camerarius tell of Gallanus's piety and labours in the conversion of the Picts and the Scots, saying he flourished in Iona in A.D. 606, and died in A.D. 623. He is named among the reputed authors of Acta S. Columbae, and also wrote Exhortatio ad monachos, lib. i., but if so, his writings are lost. Camerarius commemorates St. Gallanus, monachus et confessor, at Dec. 7, and Dempster at Sept. 11 (and 2, Men. Scot.). (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 470, col. 2, 490 n. 70 et al.; Fordun, Scotichr. iii. c. 26; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 246; Boethius, Hist. Scot. ix. 167; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. 145; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 298; Tanner, Bibl. 307; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 201.)

[J. G.]

(2) Of Craebh Greallain, and patron of the Hy-Many, commemorated Nov. 10. Of this saint there are Lives, written not on vellum but on paper, in one of the Brussels Irish MSS., and in the library of the Royal Irish Academy: extracts are given by Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 206–208), and in a much fuller form by O'Donovan from the Book of Lecan (Tribes and Customs of the Hy-Many, 8–18, Dublin, 1843; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. iii. 485, vii. 372–75). His father was Cuillin or Callinus, son of Cairbre

Cluais-derg, of Leinster, and his mother's name was Eithne or Ethnea. According to the Lives he was born in the time of St. Patrick, but this probably puts him too early: he is more likely to have been a pupil of St. Finnian of Clonard. Yet in the Lives he is represented as having obtained a place called Achadh Fionnabhach from Duach Gallach, king of Connaught, where the saint built a church, before Maine Mor arrived in Connaught: this place was afterwards called Craebh-Greallain, from the Irish Craobh, a branch, the symbol given to Griellan by St. Patrick and king Duach, in token of possession, and is said to have been in the east of Magh Luirg, now the plains of Boyle, co. Roscommon. He also erected a church at Cill-cluain, now Kilclooney, near the town of Ballinasloe, in the barony of Clonmacowen, co. Galway. When Maine Mor came with the Colia-da-Chrioch and displaced Cian with his Firbolgs, St. Griellan espoused the side of the conquerors, and put them under heavy tribute in return for his support. His cathach or battle crozier, which was used as the standard of the tribe of the Hy-Many in the counties of Galway and Roscommon, and with which he is reported to have wrought a miracle by resuscitating the infant Eoghan Sriabh, was up to 1836 preserved in the family of the O'Cronghaile or Cronelly, the ancient comharbas or coarbs of the saint, but is now lost sight of. He probably lived about the end of the 6th century, if he be not regarded as a contemporary with the aged St. Patrick. (Colgan, Acta SS. 252, n. 10, 337, c. 7, 339, n. 20, 396, c. 28, 399, n. 22; Tr. and Cust. Hy-Many, by O'Donovan, ut supra, and p. 81.)

[J. G.]

GRELLOG OEBLECH, of Tamlacht Charna, commemorated July 13. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 195) says Grellog Oeblech, of Tamlacht Charna, in Ui Breasail-airthir, "may be Grealla, sister of Manchán of Liath, and of Greillseach; and Mella was the mother of all three." [MANCHAN.]

[J. G.]

GREPES (Γρέπης, Malal.; Γράπης, Theoph.; Γρέπης, Cedren; GETHES, Paul. Diac.), king of the Heruli, who came with his people to Constantinople, A.D. 521, and requested of the emperor Justinian that he might be made a Christian. He was baptized on the feast of the Epiphany. The emperor, who was his godfather, promised him any assistance he might require. (Jc Malalas, Chronog. lib. xviii. p. 427, ed. GRIBERTUS of Geneva. [GUBERTUS.]

GRICINIANUS, martyr. [GRATIANUS.]

GRICINUS (CRICINUS), bishop of Verona, c. A.D. 356–360. He seems to have been the seventh bishop, and to have succeeded Lucillus and been followed by St. Zeno. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. v. 550; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 744; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. ii. p. 1.)

GRILLAAN, GRILLAN. [GRELLAN (1).]

GRIMO, twenty-seventh archbishop of Rouen, succeeding Ratbertus (A.D. 743), after an interval of nine years, during which the see remained vacant, owing probably to the disturbances of the times. In the same year Boniface archbishop of Mentz is said to have asked the gift of the pall for him. We know nothing more of him, except that in the Acta of the archbishops of Rouen he is praised for his nobility and honour, his care of his flock, and his liberality to the church of St. Mary (Mabillon, Vetera Analecta, p. 223, Paris, 1723); while, on the other hand, in the Chartae Fontanellenses (Spirilegium, ii. 274) he is said to have been ignorant of letters. He was succeeded by Raginfredus. (Gall. Christ. xi. 18.)

GRIMOALDUS (1), son and successor of Pippin of Landen, mayor of the palace in Austrasia, who died 639. The office was not yet hereditary, and the claim of Grimoald, who was personally popular, to succeed his father was stoutly contested by Otto, who had been tutor to the young king Sigebert III., and seems to have commanded the influence of the court. Grimoald, aided by Cunibert archbishop of Cologne, the friend of his father, endeavoured for three years in vain to displace him in the palace. In 640 the rebellion of Radulphus drew Sigebert and his army into Thuringia. Grimoald was present among the generals at the defeat on the Unstrut, which resulted in the virtual independence of Thuringia. The ill-success of this expedition may possibly have contributed to discredit Otto. But Grimoald's success was not complete till 642, when his rival was slain by Leutharius duke of the Alemanni and Grimoald became mayor of the palace without further opposition. His policy seems to have been principally directed towards securing the kingdom against external troubles, and strengthening the central authority; and, no doubt, to him must be ascribed the resolution of Sigebert which forbade the holding of episcopal synods without the king's previous sanction. (See the letter to Desiderius of Cahors, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 264, and cf. Gérard, Hist. des Francs d'Austrasie, i. 359, Paris, 1866.) He does not appear, however, to have been an enemy of the church. When in 647, Sigebert, in his desire for an heir, as it was said, resolved to found twelve monasteries, Grimoald zealously cooperated in his design, and the charters of the two greatest foundations Stavelo and Malmundium, in the Ardennes speak of Grimoald as the builder (Bouquet, iv. 635). The precept, too, which installed St. Remaclus as first abbat of Casaegonguidinense (Cougnon) is addressed to Grimoald (ibid. 634; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 319), and Grimoald himself seems to have made a grant of Germigny to Stavelo (see Bouquet, iii. 693; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 325). For his efforts towards strengthening the position of the throne, see Pertz, Geschichte der Merovingischen Hausmeier, p. 43 seq., and Bonnell, Anfänge des Karol. Hauses, 110. On the death of Sigebert (A.D. 656) Grimoald attempted a measure which more than a century later Pippin, the father of Charles the Great, carried out. Sigebert's son, Dagobert, was but three years of age, and the opportunity seemed favourable for uniting the almost regal power of the mayor of the palace with the regal title. Accordingly Grimoald took possession of the infant king, cut off his long hair, the badge of royalty, and sent him away secretly by Dodo, or Dido, bishop of Poitiers, to Ireland, and had his own son Childebert proclaimed king. The Franks, however, were not yet prepared for this revolution, and the Austrasian nobles rose in rebellion, and, capturing Grimoald by stratagem, delivered him to Clovis king of Neustria, who imprisoned him at Paris, and put him to death with torture (A.D. 656). The annals of the time generally express approval of the sentence. The authorities for Grimoald's life are, besides those mentioned above, the Chronicles in Bouquet, ii. 446, 652; iii. 304, 328, 343, 350-1; Fredegar, Chron. lxxxv. lxxxvii. lxxxviii.; Aimoin, iv. 38; Gesta Reg. Franc. cap. xliii. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 1459; Vita S. Sigeberti, iv. 10-12, v. 14 in Bouquet, ii. 446-7; Ado. Chron. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 117; and for two letters to him from Desiderius (Didier), bishop of Cahors. See Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 249, 251; Bouquet, iv. 37-8; cf. also Richter, Annalen, 164-7.

GRIMOALDUS (2), king of the Lombards, 662-672, youngest son of Gisulf the first duke of Friuli. When Gisulf lost his life in resisting an incursion of the Avars his elder sons were on the point of putting their young brother Grimoald to death, because they thought he was too young to fly with them on horseback. He entreated to be allowed to join them, and succeeded in escaping. His two elder brothers, Tasso and Caco, who jointly inherited their father's duchy, were murdered by the exarch Gregorius, and succeeded by their uncle Grasulf. Radoald, the third brother, and Grimoald went to seek their fortunes at the court of Arighis, duke of Benevento, a friend of their family; or, as Paulus Diaconus says, their former instructor. Arighis, on his death, not considering his own son Aio fit to succeed him, commended the two young sons of the duke of Friuli to his subjects. Aio, however, became duke, and was killed in a year's time, c. 642, fighting against the Slaves. Radoald succeeded him, and on his death, c. 647, Grimoald became duke of Benevento. For fourteen years we know nothing about him; but in 661, the Lombard kingdom having been divided between the two sons of Aripert, one of them, Godepert, sent to Grimoald for help. Garipald, duke of Turin, the royal messenger, intrigued with Grimoald, who, having left his duchy in the hands of his son Romuald, marched northwards with a constantly growing army to take the kingdom. Ultimately, rightly suspecting treachery from Godepert, he killed him with his own hand at Pavia, and became king, and married Godepert's sister. Upon this Godepert's brother Perthari, who ruled in Milan, fled. In 663 Grimoald was summoned to Beneventum by his son Romuald to help him against the emperor Constans, who had landed at Tarentum, and was besieging Beneventum. At the approach of Grimoald, the emperor withdrew to Naples. On his return to the north Grimoald carried matters with a high hand. Lupus, duke of Friuli, had been left in charge at Pavia; but, having betrayed his trust, fled before Grimoald's return to Friuli. Grimoald did not wish for civil war, and so called in the Avars to suppress Lupus, and ultimately had some difficulty in getting rid of them. He caused the daughter of Lupus, Theuderada, to marry his son Romuald, duke of Beneventum. He married his own daughter to Thrasamund, formerly count of Capua, who had helped him to obtain the kingdom, and he made Thrasamund duke of Spoleto. He thus united the kingdom and the two great and independent duchies in his own family. In the early years of his reign he repelled an invasion of the Franks, and c. 675 he made a treaty with Dagobert. (Paulus Diac. v. 32, and note in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 155.) He entirely destroyed the town of Oderzo, where his elder brothers had been treacherously killed. He laid waste also the town of Forlimpopoli, whose inhabitants had impeded him on his way to and from Beneventum, and even slew the deacons who were baptizing children at the font. "Fuit, autem," says Paulus Diaconus, "corpore praevalidus, audacia primus, calvo capite, barba prominenti, non minus consilio quam viribus decoratus." If its later rulers had been as powerful as Grimoald the fate of the Lombard kingdom might have been different. On his death Perthari succeeded to the kingdom, turning out Grimoald's young son Garibald, and the Lombard power was again divided. Grimoald was buried in the basilica of St. Ambrose at Pavia, which he built. He was the first king who added to the Edict of Rotharis. He added nine sections in the year 688, the most important of which deal with the responsibility of masters for their servants' actions, the inheritance of grandchildren, and the protection of married women. (Monum. Germ. Legg. iv. p. 91, ed. Bluhme; Fontes Juris Italici Medii Aevi, Padelletti, 1877, i. p. 171.) The only authority of importance for the life of Grimoald is Paulus Diaconus, lib. iv. 39, 46, 51; lib. v. 1-33. [A. H. D. A.]

GRIMOALDUS (3), duke of Benevento, c. 687-689, son of Romuald and grandson of king Grimoald. He married Wigilinda, the daughter of king Perthari. (Paulus Diaconus, G. L. v. 25; vi. 2; Catalogus Ducum Ben. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 493.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRIPHO (GRIFO, GRIPPO), third son of Charles Martel by Sonihilde or Swanahildis, the niece of Odilo, duke of Bavaria. Shortly before his death Charles called together his nobles and divided his whole principality between Carloman and Pippin, the elder half-brothers of Gripho. But at the last he was prevailed upon by Sonihilde to allot to her son, whose position seems to have been something between that of his two half-brothers and the sons of Charles' concubines, a portion in the centre of his possessions, comprising a part of Neustria, a part of Austrasia and a part of Burgundy. But this arrangement was upset almost immediately after his death (741). The Franks upon these severed portions of territory resented the forcible transfer of their allegiance from those whom they regarded as the rightful heirs, and, rising in arms, put Carloman and Pippin at their head, and marched against Gripho. He took refuge with his mother and a few followers in Laon, but was soon compelled to surrender, and was placed by Carloman under guard at Neuchâtel in the Ardennes, while Sonihilde was shut up in the monastery of Chelles (Cala). Gripho remained in this imprisonment till 747, when Pippin, moved by compassion, released and installed him honourably in his own palace, and gave him a countship with considerable revenues. But Gripho was not long content. Conspiring with some of the younger nobility, he withdrew to the Saxons, the implacable foes of the Frank power. Pippin pursued with an army through Thuringia into Saxony, and found Gripho with his allies encamped on the river Ocker, near where Brunswick now is. But the night before the battle distrust arose, and the Saxons, who seem to have been but half-hearted in his cause, dispersed homewards. Gripho took refuge in Bavaria, whither he was soon followed by Pippin and captured. No thoughts of revenge seem to have actuated the latter, and he gave him the city of Le Mans and twelve counties (749). But Gripho, who, claiming a kingdom, scorned a pension, soon resumed his plots, and secretly repaired to Waifar, duke of Aquitaine, the hereditary foe of Pippin. It seems that about this time Carloman, who had renounced his kingdom and entered an Italian monastery, had prevailed on Pope Zachary to use his good offices towards reconciling the brothers, as appears from a letter of the latter to the bishops of France (see Bouquet, iv. 98, and Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 955). Gripho could not hope to elude Pippin's pursuit long in Aquitaine, and accordingly resolved to join Astolfus, or Haistulfus, the king of Lombardy, and enemy of the papacy and Pippin. But on his way he was met, near Maurienne, by Theodwinus, or Theodonus, count of Vienne, who had been deputed to guard the passes of the Alps, and killed in the combat which ensued (751). There is extant a letter of Boniface to Gripho, in 749, conjuring him, if God should give him the power, to help the clergy in Thuringia, and protect the monks and nuns there against the heathen (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 781; Bouquet, iv. 98). For the history of Gripho see the Annales Einhardi, Annales Mettenses and others in Pertz, i. 135, 137, 139, 327, 330-1, 10, 11, 115-16, and Bouquet, tom. v.; Fredegar. Cont. c. 117, 118; Sismondi, Hist. des Français, ii. 151, 161-4, 201. [S. A. B.]

GRIPPO (GRIPHO), twenty-third archbishop of Rouen, between St. Ansbertus and Radilandus. He is probably the "Gripho episcopus" who subscribed the charter of Agirardus or Ageradus for the monastery of the Blessed Virgin on the Loire, though his see is not appended (A.D. 696). (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1228-31; Gall. Christ. xi. 17.) [S. A. B.]

GRIPPO, bishop of Volterra, c. 715. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 216; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1427.) [A. H. D. A.]

GRISTIOLUS, Welsh saint. [CRISTIOLUS.]

GRISUS, bishop of Trevi (between Spoleto and Foligno), present at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 743. (Mansi, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

GROD (Γροδ, Malal.; Γροδᾶς, Cedren.), king of the Hunni who dwelt near the Cimmerian city of Bosphorus. He came to Constantinople in the reign of Justinian and received Christian baptism. The emperor stood sponsor for him, and dismissed him home with handsome presents that he might guard the Roman interests in his own country and take charge of Bosporus. On his return his people rose against him, and he was put to death by their idolatrous priests, for which atrocity the Hunni were severely punished by Justinian. (Jo. Malalas, lib. xviii. ed. Dindorf, p. 431; Geo. Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ed. Dindorf, vol. i. p. 644.) [T. W. D.]

GROSSUS, bishop of Siena, present at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 743. (Mansi, xii. 368; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

GROTALDUS, ST. (CROTOLDUS), fourth bishop of Worms, between Carolus and Amanus II. (circ. 503). The authors of the Gallia Christiana (v. 661) quote Demochares (De Div. Miss. Sacrif. c. 35), to the effect that he began to build at Worms a noble temple for twelve monks and an abbat, on the walls of which his picture still remained, and where it was believed that he was buried. Le Cointe, quoting from Franciscus Irenicus, says that Grotaldus and his successors were for a time metropolitans of all Germany, until later that dignity was restored to Mentz. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 503, n. iv. tom. i. p. 216.) [S. A. B.]

GRWST, ST. (GORUST, GORWST), the founder of Llanrwst, in Denbigh. His festival has been held on Dec. 1. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 295.) Grwst is the Welsh form of the Irish Drest and Scotch Drust and Drostan (Skene, Celt. Scotl. i. 210.) [C. W. B.]

GUADILA, bishop of Emporias. [GUNDILANUS.]

GUAGHINUS, bishop of Volterra, c. 706. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 216; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1427.) [A. H. D. A.]

GUAIRE (GOAR) (1), bishop in Gobhail, is not commemorated in the Mart. Doneg. but in the Mart. Tallaght on Jan. 25. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 490, n. ⁶⁸, 502) suggests that he may be a disciple of St. Columba, and the Saxon or Anglo-Saxon baker at Hy who is mentioned by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columbae, iii. c. 10). [GENEREUS.] Gobhail, Gabhal, Gowel, is a name of very extensive local use in every part of Ireland, so that we have no means of further identification. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 436; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xiii.) [J. G.]

(2) Beg, commemorated Jan. 9. As traced by Colgan (Acta SS. 223, c. 4) Guaire Beg (Little, in stature or reputation), was son of Lasren, son of Fergus, and in the fifth degree of descent from Colla Uais, monarch of Erin (A.D. 327-331). His church was at Aghadowey, a parish on the west of the Bann, co. Londonderry, and he apparently had a cell at Agivey in the same parish. If he lived in the 7th century, as is commonly said, some steps in his pedigree must have been omitted. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 148-50; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 11; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 330; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 133, n. ^m.) [J. G.]

(3) Mor, of Aghadowey—Jan. 22. Belonging to the same place and family as the preceding,

Guaire Mór (Great) was son of Colmán, son of Fuatage, son of Fergus, and thus sixth in the line of pedigree from Colla Uais. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 400; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 25; alii ut supra.) [J. G.]

(4) Abbat of Glendaloch, co. Wicklow, died A.D. 810. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 805, i. 415; Ann. Ult. A.D. 809.) [J. G.]

(5) Ua Tibraide, abbat of Clonfad, co. Westmeath, died 795. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 790; Ann. Ult. A.D. 794.) [J. G.]

GUALIFERUS was a bishop, or at least used the episcopal title; he accompanied St. Rumbold, the Irish-Scot, to Mechlin, and partook of his labours and martyrdom about A.D. 775, but his nationality is only inferred to have been Scotch or Scoto-Irish from that of his master. Dempster would of course regard him as an Albanic Scot. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 317; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 182, Oct. 29; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 15.) [J. G.]

GUALTARIUS (GUALTERUS), bishop of Firmum (Fermo). A "Gualterus episcopus de Firmo" is mentioned as having been present with other bishops as an assessor at the tribunal of Hildebert, or Hildebrand, Duke of Spoleto, A.D. 777. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 735; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 591.) [R. S. G.]

GUALTERANUS. [GUNTERANUS.]

GUALTERNUS (WALTERNUS), bishop of Geneva, acceded c. A.D. 780, and died A.D. 816. He was present, A.D. 800, at the synod of bishops at Rome, at which Charlemagne was crowned emperor. (Müllinen, Helvet. Sacr. p. 17; Besson, Dioc. de Genève, p. 7.) [R. S. G.]

GUANHUMARA, the wife of Arthur. Geoffrey of Monmouth, ix. 9, says that after Arthur had restored the country to its former prosperity, he married Guanhumara, who was descended from the noble race of the Romans (vi. 5, there is a similar marriage of Constantine), and had been brought up by Cadur duke of Cornwall; and later on that when Guanhumara heard that Modred had entered Winchester, she fled in despair from York to the city of Legions (Caerleon upon Usk), and in the church of Julius the Martyr resolved to become a nun. Her name does not occur in Gildas or Nennius. The Historia Britonum, attributed to Nennius, has been shewn by Paulin Paris to represent the Breton form of the Celtic legends; and in its present shape it contains the results of several recensions, each of which added new matter to it, including legends of Germanus and Patrick, with genealogies and chronological data, and two prologues. The earliest part may date back nearly to the time of Gildas, the latest belongs to the 10th century. The Celtic imagination continually added fresh names and details from other stories; and Geoffrey of Monmouth, whose real basis is Nennius, gives us a much enlarged form of the legend, nor did the assimilating process stop with him. It is curious that his work should have appeared in Henry I's reign, just when Turpin's Chronicle of Charlemagne appeared in France; these two famous legends influenced the spirit of the two great nations that were now forming, opposed in interest and glory to each other. Much of the detail in Geoffrey is invented to account for facts and names which had no existence till long after the English settlement in Britain, and for feudal notions of a still later age; the manners are those of the feudal knights, while knight errantry is not at all a Cymric conception. William of Newburgh at once expressed his disbelief of Geoffrey's story, as did Higden afterwards, but Higden's translator, Trevisa, defends it. The story of Arthur in Nennius, though not authentic history, is founded on the traditions of the struggle between the Romano-Celtic population and the English invaders. That native chiefs who had married Roman wives should have taken the lead in the struggle is probable enough. The names of Arthur's first battles point to North England, where the Roman troops and colonists were settled most thickly along the Great Wall. "The first war was at the mouth of the Glein, the second, third, fourth and fifth on the Douglas in the region of Linnuis, the sixth on the river Bassas, the seventh in the wood of Celidon, the eighth near Castle Guinnion (the name Castellum seems to point to a Roman station), the ninth at the city Leogis, called in British Cair Lion, the tenth on the shore of the river Traht Treuroit, the eleventh on the mountain Breguoin, the twelfth at mount Badon: and in all these wars he was victorious, as were many other British warriors." So the text of the Vatican MS., written in the fifth year of king Edmund, A.D. 946, which Gunn edited, and which Mai reprinted in his "Appendix ad opera edita" (only issued in 1871), without being aware that it was the text of the book commonly assigned to Nennius. But while the earlier battles seem to be in the north, some of the later may be assigned to Wessex, and we know that the earliest settlements of the Saxons were in the north and in Wessex. It is probable that, as usual in legend, the great name has swallowed up the little ones, and that under the name of Arthur are summed up the deeds of several chiefs "perplures militarii Brittones" as the Vatican MS. says; in fact, in the poems attributed to the early Welsh bards the name of Arthur appears very seldom. Thus in Llywarch Hen's Elegy on Geraint ab Erbin, the Devon chief who was killed at the battle of Lloughborth, "at Lloughborth were slain to Arthur valiant men who hewed down with steel; he was the emperor and conductor of the toils of war," where it is worth noting that Arthur is called Ammherawdyr, i.e. emperor; as if, to shew his leadership of the Celtic tribes, he continued the old Roman title which Maximus and other British commanders of the legions had claimed. Dr. Guest would identify him with the son of Aurelius Ambrosius, one of the Roman or Romanised chiefs. The Mabinogion stories place Arthur's palace at Camelot or Gelliwig, both in Cornwall, just as his place of birth is at Tintagel (Stephens' Lit. of Kymry, 319); and put other equally eminent heroes by his side. Since the emigration to Brittany took place largely from Cornwall, this would account for Arthur assuming greater prominence in the Breton tradition, from which we received his legend back again in its expanded form. As the Celts receded before the invaders, they naturally took their legends with them, and relocalized the stories in their new homes. This accounts for the number of Arthurian localities in the various Celtic districts. Similarly in the Historia Britonum, which is the nucleus of Nennius, all the references to Guorthegirn connect him with South England, while in the account of Germanus, which has been inserted at a later time, all the local allusions point to places in Wales. But the story of Arthur was not brought back to Wales till the 11th century. The Arthur of Romance is a creation of the Armorican Kymry, and strange to say the Bretons have not preserved their own romance. It was natural that one form of the story should occur at Glastonbury, the first British church which the English spared. This "island of Avilion" is situated in the midst of peat swamps, extending to the Bristol Channel, from which a boat might even now come up to Glastonbury when the country is flooded with rain, and here in Henry II.'s time was found the tomb of Arthur and Guanhumara, and Giraldus Cambrensis (de Jure Princ. pp. 191-93, Speculum Ecclesiae pp. 47-49) dwells on the fact that her hair crumbled into dust when it was exposed to the air. The amount of literature on Arthur is now so great that particular references in this place are hardly necessary. [C. W. B.]

GUARULFUS, twenty-fifth bishop of Noyon, between Gunduinus and Framengerus. He was present at the translation of St. Lambert, in A.D. 721. (Gall. Christ. ix. 985; Gams, Series Episc. 589.) [S. A. B.]

GUASACHT' (GOSACHUS), bishop, son of Maelchu, in Granard, commemorated Jan. 24. In the Lives of St. Patrick Guasacht is frequently spoken of. He was son of Maelchu or Milchu, whom St. Patrick in youth served as a swineherd. When St. Patrick returned to evangelize Ireland, Guasacht and his two sisters, both named Emeria, became disciples of their former companion, and renounced the world. [EMERIA.] Guasacht became bishop at Granard, in the baronies of Ardagh and Granard, co. Longford, and as such always finds his place in the Irish Kalendars. Beyond his being a contemporary of St. Patrick in the 5th century, we cannot fix a date. (Colgan, Acta SS. 378, n. 22, and Tr. Thaum. pass.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 428; Todd, St. Patrick, 408; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, §§ 1-3; O'Flaherty, Ogygia, ii. pt. iii. c. 85; Ware, Bishop, by Harris, i. 13; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 27.) [J. G.]

GUBA, the seventh of the English abbats of Glastonbury, in the list drawn up by William of Malmesbury (ap. Gale, p. 328), who assigns him a period of two years, 743-744. No such name occurs in the ancient list in MS. Tiberius B. 5; and although William of Malmesbury's list is not a mere fabrication, it is too weak in authority to prove the existence of an abbat otherwise unknown. In another section of his work this writer states that in the year 760 Cynwulf, king of Wessex, gave Guba five hides of land at Sudeton, and that he received other benefactions for the abbey (Ib. p. 314), but does not give copies of the charters on which the statement would depend. In the list given in the Monasticon (i. 2) the names are given in different order, and the date 760 is ascribed to Guba, but all the lists are alike untrustworthy. [S.]

GUBERTUS (GILABERTUS, GALBERTUS, GRIBERTUS, POSTBERTUS), twenty-ninth bishop of Geneva, between Eucherius and Renenbertus in the second half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 384.) [S. A. B.]

GUDA, bishop of Tuccis (Martos) from about A.D. 634 to 646, subscribes the acts of the sixth Council of Toledo, A.D. 648. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 413; Esp. Sagr. xii. 390.) [CAMERINUS.] [M. A. W.]

GUDA, a priest and abbat, who attests the charter of Oethilred to Barking, cir. 693 (Mon. Angl. i. 439; Kemble, C. D. 35): the same name with the title of presbyter appears among the attestations of a somewhat questionable charter of Caedwalha of Wessex, dated 688 (Kemble, C. D. 994). As the former charter is genuine, the occurrence of the name of Guda in the latter may add somewhat to the probability of its genuineness; both are attested by Earconwald, Wilfrid, and Headda. [S.]

GDALUSA, mother of St. Cadocus: more properly called Guladusa, Gladusa and Gwladus (Colgan, Acta SS. 160, c. 2). [GWLADUS.] [J. G.]

GUDDENE—July 18. Virgin and martyr at Carthage, A.D. 203. She suffered by command of the proconsul Rufinus. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.; Till. Mém. iii. 125.) Tillemont, l. c., thinks that Gaudens, or Gaudentius, martyr in Africa, commemorated by St. Augustine, Serm. 294, may be identical with Guddene. (Ruinart, p. 197.) [G. T. S.]

GUDELINA, queen of Theodahadus or Theodatus king of Italy. Among the letters of Cassiodorus are some addressed by her, or in her name, to the emperor Justinian and the empress Theodora. (Cassiod. Var. lib. x. epp. 20, 21, 23, 24, in Patr. Lat. lxi. 811–814.) [C. H.]

GUDEVALUS. [GUDWAL.]

GUDIBRANDUS, duke of Florence, the first certainly known, mentioned in a letter of Hadrian to Charles the Great, asking for the restoration of property to the monastery of Gallata. (Codex Carolinus, Jaffé, no. 90, 784–791; H. Pabst, Forschungen z. d. G. p. 483.) [A. H. D. A.]

GUDILAN, deacon of Toledo, bosom friend of Julian archbishop of Toledo. Their friendship is warmly described by Felix, bishop of Toledo, in his life of Julian, cap. 2. (Patr. Lat. xcvi. 415.) He died in 680. [C. H.]

GUDILIUVA, a Gothic noble mentioned in one of the best known of the Hispano-Gothic inscriptions (Hübner, Inscr. Hisp. Christ. 115). He is described as having built with his own workmen, and at his own cost, the churches of St. Stephen, St. John Baptist, and St. Vincent "in locum Nativola," during the reigns of Leovigild, Recared, and Witteric. "The inscription, evidently put up shortly before the consecration of the church of St. Stephen, by bishop Paulus of Acci (Guadix) under Witteric (603–610)"—says Dr. Mommsen, in a note to one of the reports addressed by Hübner to the Berlin Academy—"mentions at the same time two older consecrations, that of the church of St. John in 577, and that of the church of St. Vincent in 594" (Monatsbericht Berl. Akad. 1861, p. 25). The stone bearing the inscription was found among the foundations of the church of Santa Maria del Alhambra at Granada, in the 16th century, and is now in the southern wall of that church. Nativola, therefore, was evidently the Roman name of Granada, or of a quarter of Granada; and Gams supposes—wrongly—that the name Granada is derived partly from Nata, the shortened form of Nativola (Kirchengeschichte, ii. [2] 22; conf. however, Dozy, Recherches, l. c. i. "Observations géographiques sur quelques anciennes localités de l'Andalousie," p. 336). Hübner thinks that Nativola belonged to the mountain diocese of Acci, and not to the bishopric of Elvira, which he supposes to have been confined to the valley of the Xenil (Monatsberichte Berl. Akad. l. c.); and this is no doubt the true explanation of the parts played in the different consecrations by the bishops Paulus and Lilliolus of Acci. Gams's contrary theory, that Nativola was a suburb of Illiberi, is grounded upon ignorance of the real position of Illiberi, which was placed about six miles to the north-west of Granada (Dozy, Recherches, l. c. p. 328). Who Gudiliuva was is unknown. That portion of the stone which would probably have given us the name of his office or dignity is missing (Hübner, l. c. notes). Prof. Dozy, however, quotes a passage from the Arabic chronicler Ibn-al Khatib which very probably refers to Gudiliuva. "The Christians (of Granada) had a celebrated church two arrow-flights from the town opposite the gate of Elvira. It had been built by a great seigneur of their religion, whom a certain prince had placed at the head 'd'une nombreuse armée de Roum,' and it was unique in beauty of construction and ornament." The term Roum, which, according to Prof. Dozy, is only used by the Arabic authors when speaking of independent Spaniards, points back to a time before the Mussulman conquest, and he is therefore led to identify "the great noble of their religion" with Gudiliuva (whom he calls Gudila, depending on Masdeu and Florez's uncorrected text of the Latin inscription). Who was the prince? One is led to remember the date of the first consecration—597, the eighth year of Leovigild. Was Gudiliuva one of Leovigild's generals in the campaign of 592 against the imperialists (see art. LEOVIGILD), and was Nativola one of the "urbes et castella" then wrested from them by the great Gothic king? (Joannes Biclarensis, Esp. Sagr. vi. p. 377.) [M. A. W.]

GUDINUS, archbishop of Lyons. [GODWINUS.]

GUDLOCUS has his history sketched by Camerarius (de Scot. Fort. 129, April 11), who, however, gives no authority for his statements, Son of Penuald and Tecta, he became famous in the Scotch province of Merchia (Merse) for his piety and miracles; there, among the kinskindred of his parents, he lived fifteen years as a recluse, and was specially tempted by evil spirits, who transformed themselves into lions, bulls, bears, etc., before him. He died about A.D. 716, at the age of 45, and his name has become synonymous with the phrase "good luck." [J. S.]

GUDUDUS, bishop of Ancusa in Byzacene, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 126.) [H. W. P.]

GUDWAL, ST. (GUDUALUS, GUDEVALUS, GUDWAL, GUDWALDUS, GUDWALUS), a saint whose name occurs in the Breton Litany of the 10th century in Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82, 85, "Guoidwale" (see too i. 28, 31, 36, 161). For his life, written in the 12th century, see Acta Sanctorum June 6, i. 729-742; Hardy's Catalogue of Materials, i. 371-373. He was commemorated in Flanders, where he is said to have died, June 6, 403, and the feast of the translation of his body to the monastery of Ghent was celebrated on Dec. 3. A parish in Cornwall, now called Gulval, on Mount's Bay, is dedicated to him, and there is a famous holy well there, but the old oratory has perished. [C. W. B.]

GUDWAL, bishop of St. Malo. [GURVALUS.]

GUENEGANDUS, bishop. [GUENNOC.]

GUENGALOCUS, GUENNOLE, Armorican saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUENNINUS (GUENNIUS, GUINNINUS), ST., an early bishop of Vannes, placed third in the list of the Gallia Christiana, succeeding St. Paternus II. or Mansuetus, if he is to be assigned to this diocese, and followed by St. Modestus. Le Cointe believes that he was consecrated A.D. 618, but nothing trustworthy has come down of him. He is commemorated Aug. 18. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 916; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 618; n. x. tom. ii. Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 662.) [S. A. B.]

GUENNOC (CONOGANUS, GUENEGANDUS, SUENUS, VENECANDUS, VENERANDUS), ST., an early bishop of Quimper, succeeding St. Chorenstinus, and, according to Gams, followed by Albinus. A Venerandus, or Verandus, whose see is not appended, was represented at the first council of Tours (A.D. 461) by Jucundinus, and may possibly be Guennoc. Others, however, identify him with the Albinus, the Latin version of Guennoc, who was present at the Council of Vannes (A.D. 462 or 463). A doubtful list of names is all that remains of his successors till Felix is reached in the 9th century. (Gall. Chr. xiv. 873; Mansi, vii. 947, 955.) [S. A. B.]

GUENOLE, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUERICUS (GOERCIVS), bishop of Ausa (Vich) from about A.D. 643 until after 653. His signature appears twenty-fifth among those of fifty-two bishops at the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Esp. Sagr. xxviii. 60.) [CINIDIUS.] [M. A. W.]

GUERICUS. [GOERICUS.]

GUÉRIN. [GAIRINUS.]

GUERUR, ST., whose chapel in the parish of St. Neot, in Cornwall, is mentioned by Asser as the place where Alfred, while visiting it in a hunting expedition, was cured of his malady. See v. Guierus in Boll. Acta Sanctorum, 4 Apr. i. 377. [C. W. B.]

GUIBERTUS I., seventh bishop of Reate between Tenton and Isermundus I. c. A.D. 770. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 300.) [R. S. G.]

GUIBERTUS II., eleventh bishop of Reate, between Sinualdus and Peter I., A.D. 778. The date is fixed by communications which he had with Hildebrand, duke of Spoleto. He held his see scarcely a year. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 304.) [R. S. G.]

GUIBERTUS III., thirteenth bishop of Reate, between Peter I. and Alefredus A.D. 780. His name and date are known from documents, in which Charlemagne and Hildebrand, duke of Spoleto, are mentioned. He seems to have sat less than two years. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 305.) [R. S. G.]

GUIDO (1) (VIDO), bishop of Volaterra (Viterbo). He succeeded Martianus, c. A.D. 682, held the see sixteen years, and was succeeded by Petrus. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. *333; Ammirato, Vescovi di Fiesole, &c., p. 66.) [R. S. G.]

GUIDO (2) I., twenty-eighth bishop of Noyon, between Hunuanus and St. Eunutius in the first part of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 985.) [S. A. B.]

GUIDO (3) (WIDO), a count, at whose request Alcuin composed his treatise De Virtutibus et Vitiis. Engaged in war he had asked for a short manual of instruction, which Alcuin, as he says, gladly composed and divided into chapters for easier reference in his busy life (Migne, Patr. Lat. ci. 613.) [S. A. B.]

GUIDULPHUS. [GHILLO.]

GUIERUS, Cornish saint. [GUERUR.]

GUIGNER, martyr in Cornwall. [FINGAR.]

GUIGNOLE, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUILAIN, abbat of St. Guislain. [GISLENUS.]

GUILIELMUS (WILLELMUS), ST., duke or count of Aquitaine, founder and monk of the monastery of Gellone, afterwards called St. Guillaume-du-Désert. The story of his life is as follows: He was born in the time of Pippin, of aristocratic parents, Theodoric and Aldana. His father, who was a consul, according to his biographer, has been identified with the count of the same name whom Einhard speaks of as a relation of Charles the Great (Annales ad ann. 782, Pertz, i. 163), but others trace a relationship to that monarch through his mother. He was liberally educated in divinity and philosophy, as well as the martial exercises which belonged to his rank, and in due course was sent to court, where he gained the love of his peers and the respect and affection of Charles, who had now succeeded his father Pippin, and who often had recourse to him for counsel. It happened that the Saracens crossed the Pyrenees, and were devastating the south of France. Charles appointed Guilelmus commander of the expedition sent against them, and created him duke of Aquitaine. Crossing the Rhone into Septimania he gave battle at Orange, where the enemy had established themselves, and recovered the city in a victorious engagement. He pursued his success until they were utterly routed and driven back again into Spain. He then set himself to repair their ravages in the province. The ruined churches were rebuilt and new ones erected, and justice, religion, and charity characterized his rule. Determining to be himself the founder of a monastery he sought a spot in the mountainous district of Lodève, where he reared his buildings and collected monks from the country round, especially from the foundation of St. Benedict of Aniane, about a league distant. To this monastery his own was, by his wish, subservient. His sisters, Albana and Bertana, desirous of taking the veil, applied to him to aid them, and he established them at the church of St. Bartholomew, not far from the monastery. He now returned to his worldly duties, but the desire of embracing the monastic life had also seized him and was daily increasing in strength, when he was summoned to court. Here he made up his mind to become a monk. Charles consented, and he left for his new home, stopping at Brioude to offer his weapons at the shrine of St. Julian the martyr. Arrived at Gellone, he entered the monastery barefooted and clad in sackcloth, laid his gifts upon the altar, and announced his desire of joining the community (A.D. 806). His first work was with the aid of his sons, Bernard and Gancelinus, or Gotcelmus, to complete the building, and render it accessible by cutting a road up the rugged valley. Next he planted gardens and vineyards, and laid out the valley in orchards. Louis, son of Charles, and king of Aquitaine, granted him a charter for his foundation. This done he devoted himself to the routine of the monastic life. Of his own choice he discharged the meanest offices. At the desire of the monks he consented to abandon these servile tasks, and entered upon a life of meditation. The gift of prophecy was vouchsafed to him, and revealed the hour of his death. His end was signalized by an earthquake, which shook the country round (May 28).

The life, of which the foregoing is with slight additions an abridgment, was first published by Stengelius at Augsburg in 1611, and may also be found in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iv. pt. i. p. 70, Paris, 1668-1701, and in the Bollandists' Acta SS. Mai, vi. 811. In the latter it is preceded by a short account of Guilelmus, extracted from the life of St. Benedict of Aniane by his disciple Ardo (Feb. ii. 615), which differs but very slightly from the fuller account, and is followed by a separate account of his miracles. The date of this life is not known, but its style has impressed commentators with respect. It was, at least, written previously to the year 1066, since Ordericus Vitalis against that year relates in his Ecclesiastical History (lib. vi.) that it had lately been shewn to him, and he gives a summary, which, in many cases, preserves the words and phrases of the life as we have it.

In his appendix to the Life (p. 88) Mabillon prints two instruments of gift of Guilelmus, one resembling a will, and the above-mentioned charter of Louis dated in 808 (see also Migne, Patr. Lat. civ. 982).

The life of Louis the Pious states (Bouquet, vi. 88) that Guilelmus succeeded Chorso in the dukedom, who was deposed for misconduct (A.D.

790), and successfully coped with a rising of which his predecessor was the cause. From the same source, and also from the charter or will above-mentioned, we learn something of his relatives, of whom the most famous was his son Bernard, who inherited his rank and married Dodana, whose manual, with an inscription to her son, Guilelm still survives (Migne, Patr. Lat. cvi. 109; cf. Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la Franc. v. 17). Ceillier has a short account of his life, Hist. des Auteurs Sacrés, xiii. 234. [S. A. B.]

GULLERADUS (WILTRETRADUS), bishop of Pistoria and Pratum (Pistoja and Prato), succeeded Joannes A.D. 801. He is mentioned as acting in various affairs in 806 and 812, under the authority of Charlemagne. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iii. 354; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvii. 81.) [R. S. G.]

GUILLOBOLDUS (WILLEBALDUS), twentieth bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, between Ricoarius and Bovo I. or Bono cir. 750. (Gall. Christ. ix. 863.) [S. A. B.]

GUIMILDUS (GUIMILUS). [GUMILDUS.]

GUINALUS, GUINGALOE, GUINGALOEUS, GUINGALOIS, Armorican saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GUINNINUS of Vannes. [GUENNINUS.]

GUINNIUS (GUNNUINUS, GUNUBUI), accompanied St. Padarn from Armorica to Llanbadarn (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 504 sq.), early in the 6th century. In the account of St. Oudoceus's election to the see of Llandaff, "Gunnunus magister," called also Gunubui, and in the translation Cynfyn, was one of the three clerical electors named, with the abbats and laity, and was one of the three legates sent with the bishop-elect to Canterbury. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 124, 372; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. iv. c. 8, p. 324, n. a.) [J. G.]

GUINOCH, GUINOCHÉ, GUINOTH, bishop and confessor; a well-known Scotch saint, April 13. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scott. i. 306) thinks he was a bishop in Ross, A.D. 477, while Camerarius transports his memory to Buchan, and the author of the View of the Diocese of Aberdeen localizes it at Deer. Camerarius supposes that he lived in the time of Kenneth MacAlpin, A.D. 838, and Adam King, in the time of Ethus or Aedh, son of Kenneth, A.D. 875. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 149, 196, 236, 358; Bollandists, Acta SS. 13 Apr. ii. 138; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 130, Apr. 13; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Apr. 13.) [J. G.]

GUIPPER, accompanied St. Padarn from Armorica to Llanbadarn in Cardiganshire, in the 6th century (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 504 sq.). [J. G.]

GUISLEIN, abbat. [GISLENUB.]

GUIGO. [GISO.]

GUISTLIANUS. [GISTLIANUS.]

GUITELIN stands in the lists of bishops at London and at Caer Leon, and Nennius numbers twelve years "a regno Guorthigerni usque ad discordiam Guitolini et Ambrosii," if this be the same person as Guitelin (Mon. Hist. Brit. i. pt. ii. 77). Geoffrey Monm. says he was sent to Armorica for aid against the Saxons. (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 152, 154.) [GWYTHELIN.] [J. G.]

GULFARUS, "magister militum," probably in the district of Istria, where there was a severance from Rome on the subject of the "Three Chapters." Gregory the Great writes to commend him for his zeal in bringing back schismatics to the church. (Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. ep. 93; Migne, lxxvii. 1019.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GULOSUS, bishop of Beneventum, in Proconsular Africa, was banished to Corsica by Huneric after the convention at Carthage, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 100.) [R. S. G.]

GULOSUS, bishop of Pupit or Pudput, in Proconsular Africa, A.D. 646, is said, in the vacancy of the bishopric of Carthage, to have called together the synod held in that year at Carthage, and to have been the first to subscribe the letter against the Monothelites, addressed by the assembled bishops to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 258.)

[R. S. G.]

GUMBERTUS (1), ninth bishop of Térouanne between Adalgerus and Aetherius, in the first half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. x. 1532.)

GUMBERTUS (2) (CUNIBERT), ST., reputed founder and first abbat of the monastery of Ansbach, in Germany, in the 8th century. A life of him was published by the Bollandists from the parchment lectionary of the Franciscan fathers at Würzburg (Acta SS. Jul. iv. 69). At the time when St. Boniface was archbishop of Mentz (743-c. 754), an Englishman named Burchard came to him there, and, after a short stay, went on to Rome. There pope Zachary consecrated him to the episcopate, and sent him back to Boniface, who escorted him to his diocese of Würzburg. The new bishop's fame came to Gumbertus, who was a noble of Eastern France, and a soldier. Making his way to Würzburg, he submitted himself to the commands and instruction of Burchard. Part of his wealth he devoted to enriching the church of St. Kilian, the martyr. The rest he reserved, having it in his mind to found the monastery of Onolsbach, or Ansbach, in the diocese of Würzburg. He readily obtained authority from Charles the Great, then emperor, to build his monastery in any spot he chose. Accordingly, he founded the religious house of Ansbach. The rule of St. Benedict was established, and a large number of monks thronged thither. The monastery church was dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The remainder of his life was devoted to the government of his monks, and on his death (March 11), at an advanced age, he was buried in the church he had built. He is commemorated July 15.

A shorter but almost identical account is found in the life of Burchard by Egilward in the 12th century (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. vi. 588), and it seems not unlikely that the two writers were indebted to a common source.

Two early charters are extant for his monastery, one purporting to be granted by Charles the Great in 786, and the other by Louis the Pious in 837 (printed nos. 3 and 10 in Ussermann's Germania Sacra, tom. i.). In the former he is twice called episcopus, and for this, among other reasons, the document has been generally considered spurious. The whole story of Gumbertus rests upon the very slightest foundation. In addition to the above-mentioned accounts consult Rettberg (Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 338-343) and the authorities there quoted as to his life and the two charters, and the Germania Sacra (tom. i. p. 426 seqq.) [S. A. B.]

GUMBERTUS, martyr [GONDEBERTUS]; bishop of Sens [GUNDELBERTUS]; bishop of Reate [GUIBERTUS].

GUMESINDUS, bishop of Toledo. (Esp. Sagr. v. vi.)

GUMILDUS (GUIMILDUS, GUIMILUS, WIMILDUS), third bishop of Maguelonne between Genesius and Vincentius. He was in possession of the see in 672 or 673. In the former year he joined in the revolt against Wamba king of the Visigoths, and when in the following year the forces of Wamba were closing in upon Maguelonne by sea and land, he fled to Nismes to join Paul, the leader of the rebellion. On the fall of the latter city, which was not long deferred, the bishop with the other rebels obtained their lives, but were subject to the indignity of being shaved and dragged barefoot and ragged in the train of the conqueror, upon his triumphant entry into Toledo some months later. He was not liberated till the fourth year of Ervigius, Wamba's successor. His after history is unknown (S. Juliani, Hist. Rebellionis Pauli, xiii. seq. Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 778 seq.; Gall. Christ. vi. 732.) [S. A. B.]

GUMMARUS (GOMMARIUS, GUNTMARUS), ST., founder of the monastery of Lira (Lier, Lierre), near Malines in Belgium, in the latter part of the 8th century. According to the story which has come down, he was born at Emblehem, about a mile from Lira. Though his parents were of high rank, he was uneducated, and could not even read the Scriptures. But his natural disposition was good, and the practice of fasting and alms-giving was familiar to him even in early years. In opening manhood he was sent to Pippin's court, where he gained the affection of the king and his nobles, though only deference to the wishes of his parents reconciled him to the worldly life. He was soon honoured with high command, and sent on a distant military expedition. During his absence his home was left under the sole control of Guninmaria, the wife whom he had married at Pippin's desire. Her one delight was in cruelty, and against the serfs and dependents of the house she raged, in the words of his biographer, "quādam belluina feritate." After seven years, Gummarus returned from the wars, sternly rebuked his wife, and made amends to all who had been wronged. His thoughts were now bent on a monastic life, and on an island in the river Neta (Nethe), which was called Nivesdum or Nivesdouch (the Bollandists suggest Nieuwdonch), he erected a church in honour of St. Peter. The remainder of his life he passed between his house and the new monastery. St. Rumoldus, an Irishman, was at this time leading a life of devotion and solitude at Malines. The two were drawn to each other, and a meeting-place was found half-way between their respective abodes, which they resolved should be the scene of a yearly assembly and religious services for the country round. At length a mortal disease came upon him, and he died Oct. 11, the day of his commemoration, towards the close of the 8th century.

The foregoing account is from the life written by Theobald, a monk of Lira, and dedicated to Sigerus, the abbat. It was first published by Surius (Oct. xi), but without the dedication, and in part abridged. Later, it was republished in full by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. v. 682), together with an account of miracles performed by the saint's relics about 1475, related by an anonymous but contemporary author. The life itself was written about the middle of the 12th century, and when it is said that the earliest mention of Gummarus is in the Gesta Pontificum Cumeracensium (ii. 48, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 142), written in the 11th century, it may be easily understood that authentic information about him is absolutely wanting. There is now at Lierre a church of St. Gommarius, begun in 1445 and completed in 1557. [S. A. B.]

GUMPERGA, niece of king Luitprand and wife of Romoald, who was duke of Benevento in 706. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 50.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GUNDAMUND (GUNTABUND, GUNTAMUND), king of the Vandals. He was the son of Genzo, the son of Genseric, and succeeded his uncle Hunneric as king, according to the Vandal law of succession [GENSERIC], Dec. 11, 484. He had numerous contests with the Moors, who had revolted in the reign of Hunneric. According to Procopius (Bell. Vand. i. 8) and Theophanes (Chronog. A. M. 6026, p. 159) he cruelly persecuted the Catholics. According to Isidore, however, de Regibus Gothorum (Isid. Opp. vii. 133 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiii. 1079), and the Chronicle of Victor Tununensis (in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 946), on his accession he restored peace to the church and recalled the Catholic exiles. The appendix to the Chronicle of Prosper (in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 606) appears to offer a means of reconciling these conflicting statements. It is there stated that Gundamund, in the third year of his reign, surrendered to the Catholics the cemetery of St. Agileus at Carthage, having already recalled St. Eugenius, bishop of Carthage, from exile. In the tenth year of his reign he opened the Catholic churches which had been closed for ten years and a half, and at the intercession of Eugenius recalled all the exiled bishops and priests. From this it appears that, though Gundamund shewed some favour to the Catholics soon after his accession, the persecution did not wholly cease till the tenth year of his reign. Gundamund died Sept. 24, A.D. 496. (Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, x. 464.) [F. D.]

GUNDEBALD, king. [GUNDOBALD.]

GUNDECAR, king. [GUNDICARIUS.]

GUNDEGESILUS, twelfth archbishop of Bordeaux. According to Gregory of Tours,

Bertram, his predecessor, returning from the second council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) was seized with a fever. Summoning to his bedside a deacon, named Waldo, he nominated him, as far as he was able, as his successor. Upon his death, Waldo, with the consent of the citizens, repaired to the king to obtain his sanction, but this was refused, and orders were given for the consecration of Gundegesilus, surnamed Dodo, a count of Saintes, which took place (Hist. Franc. viii. 22). He took the lead in attempting to quell the disturbances excited by Chrodioldis at the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers [CHRODIELDIS], and his life was endangered by the throng of cutthroats assembled in the church of St. Hilary. In the same connexion he was one of the subscribers of the letter addressed to the bishops, assembled by king Guntram at Poitiers in 590, the rescript to which is given by Gregory (Hist. Franc. ix. 41, x. 15, 16). There is a lacuna of more than 200 years in the series of the Bordeaux archbishops after Gundegesilus. Sicharius is the name of the next known (Gall. Christ. ii. 795). [S. A. B.]

GUNDELBERTUS, ST., supposed archbishop of Sens, and founder and first abbat of the monastery of Senoniae (Senone) in the Vooges. His life, written after the middle of the 13th century by Richerius, a monk of that foundation, in the Chronicon Senoniense (lib. i.) may be found in the Spicilegium, ii. 604, and with previous observations in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. p. 468, Paris, 1668-1701. The story he relates is that Gundelbert, a Gaul of noble birth, in the year 720 was archbishop of Sens, and filled that office with great honour, but aiming at higher sanctity resolved to seek the desert. Accordingly, relinquishing the wealth and honours of the archbishopric, but retaining the office, that he might be able to consecrate churches and ordain ministers in the wilderness, he penetrated, with a few disciples, into the country of the Vooges. His biographer describes the scene from personal acquaintance. It is a land full of lofty mountains crowded with savage rocks. The valleys between are profound, and rendered doubly dark and dreadful by the gloom of their pine forests. Wild beasts abound, and men shun it as they would a labyrinth. One of these valleys was the spot where St. Gundelbert rested, selecting for his abode the most remote and uninviting part of it. A grant was readily obtained from Childeric, at whose court he had once been familiar. A church soon rose, and on the warning of a vision was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and close by it he built his monastery in honour of St. Peter and the Apostles. The rule of St. Benedict was enacted, and under it his biographer was still living. The scene of his death and burial are alike unknown, though the former did not take place at the monastery.

The difficulties in this story are very great. Mabillon (see the observationes practicae) would reject the date of 720, and suggests the substitution of 670 for it. He considers that St. Gundelbert must be placed earlier than Emmo, the twenty-fifth archbishop of Sens who held the see from about 658 to 675. It seems clear that he must be distinguished from Guntbertus, who, according to all the MSS. and authors (Gall. Christ. xii. 14) was the thirty-fifth archbishop, and lived about

779-786. In short, it seems very doubtful whether he ever belonged to Sens at all. In the praeceptum of Childeric A.D. 661 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1287), and the privilegium of Otto (949) no see is appended to his name. And Mabillon himself in his Annales (ad an. 661 n. xv. tom. i. p. 462) seems to suggest that he was possibly a chorepiscopus only. Gams omits him from his Series, recognising only the later Gombertus (p. 629). It might easily happen that the connexion with Sens was suggested by the name of his monastery. His day of commemoration is Feb. 21. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 262.)

GUNDEMAR, king. [GUNTIMAR.]

GUNDEMAR, bishop of Viseo (of Gothic descent apparently), signs the disputed Decretum Gundemari (A.D. 610?). [GUNTIMAR.] (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 314; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324.) [REMBOL.] [M. A. W.]

GUNDERIC (1), son of Godegisilus king of the Vandals, succeeding him jointly with his illegitimate brother Genseric. According to Renatus, quoted by Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. ii. 61 (in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxi. 205), Godegisilus was killed in a great battle by the Franks soon after the Vandals had crossed the Rhine, which occurred on the 31st Dec. A.D. 406 (Prosper, Chronicon, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 590); but according to Procopius (de Bello Vandalico, i. 3) it was under his leadership that the Vandals invaded Spain, which took place in September or October, A.D. 409 (Idatius, Chronicon, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 876), and the expression of Isidore (Historia de Regibus Gothorum, Isidori Opera, vii. 131, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiii. 1099), "Primus autem in Hispania Gundericus Rex, Vandalorum successit," appears to support the statement of Procopius. The first attacks of the Vandals, Alani, and Suevi were repulsed by two wealthy young men of high rank, named Didymus and Verinianus, who armed their slaves, and occupied the passes of the Pyrenees. This obstacle was however removed by the usurper Constantine, who put these brothers to death, and the hosts of barbarians then poured into Spain, and ravaged the country cruelly. (Orosius, Hist. vii. 40, 577, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxi. 1166.)

About A.D. 411 however they became quieter, and made a kind of partition of Spain. Galicia was occupied by the Suevi and the Vandals, Lusitania and the province of Carthage by the Alani, and the tribe of the Vandals, known as Selingui, after ravaging the Balearic Islands, took possession of the province of Baetica. In the language of Orosius (Hist. vii. 41, 579), they turned their swords into ploughshares, and treated the remnant of the Romans as their friends and allies. This calm however was but a short one. The Goths, under Wallia, invaded Spain in A.D. 416, and carried on war for two years against the Vandals and their allies. He destroyed the tribe of the Selingui, and defeated the Alans with great slaughter, their king Ataces being among the slain. The remnant of the Alans then united themselves with the Vandals of Galicia under Gunderic, and they disappear from history as a separate tribe. In A.D. 418, after the retreat of Wallia into Gaul, a quarrel broke out between the Vandals and the Suevi, who were blockaded by the former in the mountains of Nerbasa, or Erbasa, between Oviedo and Leon. The blockade was however raised by Assterius, the count of the Spains, and the Vandals retired into Baetica, where they were attacked, in A.D. 421, by Castinus, who had been sent against them by the emperor Honorius. Castinus refused to allow count Boniface to join the expedition, and after reducing the Vandals to great straits by blockade, imprudently offered battle, was defeated, and obliged to fly to Tarragona. The infuriated Vandals, in A.D. 424, ravaged the coasts of Mauritania and the Balearic Islands, and took and plundered Carthage and Seville, and devastated the whole of Spain. Gunderic died in A.D. 428. According to Idatius and Isidore, his death was a punishment for having put forth his hands against the church of St. Vincent at Seville. According to Procopius, however, his brother Genseric was the cause of his death. From the praises bestowed on him by the Catholic Dracontius, the statements of Isidore and Idatius that Genseric was originally a Catholic, and the language of Orosius, who says that the mercy of God was to be praised for having by the invasion of the barbarians led them to a knowledge of the true faith, it appears probable that Gunderic was, at least originally, a Catholic, and not an Arian. For an account of his character, and his relations with the poet Dracontius, see DRACONTIUS. His name is variously spelt Gundericus, Gontharis, Guntharis, and Guntharius.

GUNDERIC, king. [GUNDEUCUS.]

GUNDERIC (2) (GANGRIC, GAUGERIC), twenty-seventh archbishop of Treves, succeeding St. Magnericus and followed by St. Sebaudus, at the close of the 6th century. He was supposed by some to have been identical with Gaugerius of Cambray, and to have been elevated from that diocese to the archiepiscopal see of Treves, but the theory appears to be without authority. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vi. 172, 173; Gall. Christ. xiii. 384; Gams, Series Episc. 318.) [S. A. B.]

GUNDERIC (3), bishop of Segontia (Signenza), from about A.D. 685 till after 693. He appears at the sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333; Esp. Sagr. viii. 126.) [PROTOGENES.] [M. A. W.]

GUNDERIC (4), 36th bishop of Toledo and metropolitan, cir. 700-710. He is but briefly mentioned by Isidorus Pacensis (Chron. § 30, in Pat. Lat. xcvi. 1262 B), and Roderic of Toledo (De Reb. Hisp. lib. iii. cap. 15 in Lorenzana, Patr. Toletan. t. iii. p. 62), who record that he was a man of great sanctity and reputation. He is thought to have presided in the 18th council of Toledo, A.D. 701 (Mansi, xii. 163; Florez, Esp. Sag. v. 301; Baron. A. E. ann. 701, xv.).

[C. H.]

GUNDEUCHUS (GUNDERIC, GUNDIACUS, GUNDIUCUS; French, GONDIOC, GONDERIC), a king of the Burgundians, one of the two sons of Gundicar. According to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 28), he was of the family of Athanaric, king of the Visigoths. This statement, if not an error, must probably refer to the fact that he had married the sister of Rich-mer, the patrician, who was a grandchild, on the mother's side, of Wallia, king of the Visigoths. (Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Miscell. lib. xv.; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 968; Mascou, Hist. of the Ancient Germans, ii. 358.) He succeeded his father about 437 in the straitened territory, which the victories of Aetius and the Huns had left to the Burgundians. In A.D. 443 probably, Sabaudia, nearly coincident with the modern Savoy, was given up to him and his people. In 455, when Avitus in Gaul usurped the throne of the West, Gundeuchus, and his brother Chilperic, with the greater part of Gaul, declared for him, and joined the force of Theodoric, the Visigoth, which, at his desire, marched into Spain to quell the Suevi (Jornandes, c. xlv.) In the confusion of these events the Burgundians seem to have found an opportunity for extending their territory in Gaul, sharing the lands encroached upon with the resident Gallic senators (Marius Avent. Chron. Joanne et Varane Cos. 456; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 793). Pagi considers their territory to have embraced in this year the Prima Lugdunensis, the Maxima Sequanorum, the Viennensis, the Alpes Graiae et Penninae and the Provincia cis Druentiam (Baron. Pag. an. 456, n. xiii.) Lyons, however, seems to have been afterwards forcibly recovered by Majorian, who was too much occupied at first to resist these encroachments. (Sidon. Apoll. carm. v., Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 675.) From a letter of pope Hilary to Leontius, archbishop of Arles, we learn that Gundeuchus held the rank of magister militum. (Ep. ix., Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 27; Bar. an. 463, n. iv.) And, from the terms of respect and affection in which he is spoken of in this letter, we may conclude that the family had not yet been perverted to Arianism. He left four sons, Gundobald, Godegesil, Chilperic and Godemar (Greg. Tur. ut supr.). [S. A. B.]

GUNDICARIUS (GUNTIARIUS, French, GONDICAIRE), the first of the Hendins, or chiefs, of the Burgundians who attained to royal power.

The Burgundians were one of the nations of Germany, though they themselves, like other races, claimed an heroic origin. Their own account, suggested probably by their name, was that they were the descendants of the Roman soldiers of Tiberius and Drusus left to garrison the burg-festen on the German frontier (Orosius, vii. 32; Ammianus Marcellinus, xxviii. 5). Their name first occurs in Pliny, who treats them as one of the component races of the Vandals (Hist. Nat. iv. 28), and their original position seems to have been between the Oder and the Vistula (Procopius, de Bello Goth. i. 12). From scattered notices in Jordanes, Zosimus, Claudius Mamertinus, Ammianus Marcellinus and Orosius, we learn that amid various vicissitudes, like the other German nations, they gravitated towards the Gallic border. At the earliest period of which we have information they were governed by a Hendinos, or chief, apparently elective, and liable to be deposed for failure in war, or even on account of a bad season. Their high priest, called Sinistus, on the other hand, was irremovable from office (Ammianus Marcellinus, xxviii. 5). Although their warriors passed the Rhine before, it was not till 406 that they finally made good their footing in Gaul. In that year a part of the nation crossed the Rhine in company with Vandals, Suevi and Alani (Orosius, vii. 40; Hieronymi Epist. cxxiii. § 16, Migne, Patr. Lat. xxii. 1057). Whether they had been converted to Christianity at this time is somewhat doubtful. If we may credit the account of Socrates (Hist. Eccl. vii. 30), they had been zealous Christians for some years. His story is that at some time, probably about 392, while they were still on the east of the Rhine, and, according to him, led a peaceful life, being for the most part artisans (τέκτονες), they were harassed by the incursions of the Huns. Distrusting human aid, they resolved to put themselves under the protection of some god, and having reflected that the deity of the Romans was a God of might, they resolved to embrace the Christian faith. Accordingly they approached one of the Gallic cities (Treves is suggested), and asked the bishop to baptize them. This he did after first ordaining a fast of seven days and instructing them in the elements of the faith (τὴν πίστιν κατήχησας). On their return they marched against the Huns, whom they attacked the day after the death of their king Optar from surfeit, and defeated, 10,000 of the enemy falling before 3000 Burgundians. Henceforth they were zealous Christians (ἐξ ἐκείνου τὸ ἔθος διαύπως ἐχριστιάνισεν). On the other hand Orosius, writing in 417, says, "By the providence of God all have lately become Christians and Catholics, thanks to the care of our clergy whom they have welcomed. They treat the Gauls as brothers in Christianity, and lead lawful and innocent lives" (Orosius, vii. c. 32). Revillout (De l'Arianisme des Peuples Germaniques, 65-6) thinks they were converted to Arianism by missionaries from the Visigoths, who appear under Euric to have subdued them (Chron. Sigeb. Gemblac, and Jornandes in Bouquet iii. 336, 684). But see Pétigny (Études sur l'époque Mérovingienne, tom. ii. 50), who distrusts Orosius, and believes the Burgundians to have been Arians at the time they entered Gaul, though, unlike the Goths and Vandals, never propagandists or persecutors. In 413 Gundicar and his people espoused the cause of Jovinus the usurper, who assumed the purple at Mainz in 411 (Olympiodorus, Bouquet, i. 600). Jovinus was killed in 413, but the emperor made peace with the Burgundians, and settled them on a portion of territory bordering on the Rhine, with Worms for its capital (Prosper. Chron. ad Lucian. Cons. Patr. Lat. li. 591; Cassiodorus, Chron. Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1243; Richter, Annalen, p. 19). In 435 or 436 Gundicar revolted against the Roman power, but was defeated by Aetius, with the loss of 20,000 men, and compelled to sue for peace (Idatius, Chron. ad Ann. Valent. xii. and xiii.; Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 880; Prosper, Chron. ad An. Theodos. xv., Valent. iv. Cos. (435) Patr. Lat. li. 596-7; Cassiodorus ad eund. An. Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1244). If we may believe the panegyric of Avitus by Sidonius Apollinaris (carm. vii. 230, Patr. Lat. lviii. 687), there were on this occasion Huns, Sarmatians, Heruli and Franks fighting on the Burgundian side. A little later, perhaps in 437, Gundicar and a great part of the Burgundian race were annihilated by an army of Huns, who were probably for the time being in the pay of Aetius (Idatius ut supr.; Prosper. Chron. Bouquet, i. 631; Richter, Annalen, 21-2). [S. A. B.]

GUNDILANUS (GUADILA), bishop of Emporias (Ampurias) before A.D. 683. "Segarius abbas" represents him at C. Tol. xiii., but he attended the fifteenth and sixteenth councils, 688, 693, in person. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287, 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. xlii. 273.)

GUNDIPERGA, daughter of Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, and her second husband Agilulf. She married Arioald, who succeeded her brother Adaloald as king in 626. (Fredegar, Chronic. cap. 49; Migne, lxxi. 637; Paulus Diaconus is wrong, cf. note Hist. Lang. in Monumenta Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 136.) She was imprisoned for three years on false suspicion of crime by Arioald, and ultimately reinstated. Fredegar says that she afterwards married Rotharis, who became king in 636. She built the basilica of St. John the Baptist in Pavia. (Paulus Diac. iv. 47; Fredegar, Chronic. cap. 51; Migne, lxxi. 638; Pabst, Forschungen c. d. G. ii. 428.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GUNDLAEUS, GUNDLEUS, GUND-LIOU, Welsh king. [GWYNLLYW.]

GUNDOALDUS, bishop. [GONDOALDUS.]

GUNDOBALD (GUNDOBADUS, GUNDOBA-SAUDUS), fourth king of the Burgundians. His father, Gundeuchus, died about 470, leaving four sons, Gundobald, Godegiselus, Chilperic and Godomar (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 28.) In 472, on the death of his uncle Ricimer, Olybrius created him patrician and magister militum (Paulus Diac. Hist. Miscell. lib. xv.; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 968). In the same year Olybrius died, and Gundobald took part with Glycerius, who assumed the purple at Ravenna (Cassiodorus, Chron., Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1246). According to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 28) Gundobald murdered his brother Chilperic, the father of Clotilda, and drowned his wife. But the statement is open to grave doubt. It rests solely on the authority of Gregory, who wrote about a century after the alleged murders, was a Catholic writing of an Arian, and was the personal friend of Guntram, the French king who reigned over the territory usurped from the Burgundian kings. The Epitomata, xvii., the Gesta Regum Francorum, xi., the Chronicon of Ado (Bouquet, ii. 666), &c., are mere reproductions of Gregory on this point. On the other hand Avitus, archbishop of Vienne, could scarcely have written "Flebatis quondam pietate ineffabili funera germanorum," &c. (Ep. v.; Patr. Lat. lix. 223), if he was addressing the murderer of one of those brothers. The manner and date of Chilperic's death, therefore, remain unknown, as also that of his brother Godomar, whom he is said to have burnt alive. About A.D. 492 Clovis was brought into close relation with the Burgundians by his marriage with Clotilda, Chilperic's daughter (Greg. Tur. ii. 28; Epitomata, xviii.; but the details of Clovis's betrothal are not historic, Richter, Annalen, 35). At this time, Chilperic and Godomar being dead, the kingdom of the Burgundians, which extended from the Vosges to the Durance and from the Alps to the Loire, was divided between the two surviving brothers, Gundobald and Godegiselus, the former having Lyons for his capital, the latter Geneva (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 32; Ennodius, Vita S. Epiphani, 50-4; Boll. Jan. ii. 374-5; cf. Mascon, Hist. of the Ancient Germans, xi. 10, 31, and Annotation iv.). In the year 493, Gundobald, accompanied apparently by Godegiselus, made an expedition across the Alps into the territory of Theodoric, reduced Turin, and brought back a great number of captives (Ennodius ut supr.). In 500, Clovis with the aid of Godegiselus, who fought against his brother, conquered Gundobald in a battle at Dijon, and imposed a tribute. But on Clovis's departure he soon recovered his strength, renounced his allegiance, and besieged and killed his brother, who had triumphantly entered Vienne. Henceforth till his death he ruled the whole of the Burgundian territory. (Marius Avent. Chron., Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 795-6; Greg. Tur. ii. 32, 33; Epitomata, xxii. xxiii. xxiv. The details of the two latter sources are probably not trustworthy Richter, Annalen, 37-8.)

About the same time was held at Lyons a conference between the Catholics and Arians under the presidency of Gundobald, Avitus being the champion of the former, Boniface of the latter. According to the account of it which survives, written of course by a Catholic, the heretics were utterly confounded by the orthodox reasoning, and had recourse to abuse and insult, while Gundobald was ashamed of his bishops, and some Arians were convinced and baptized a few days after. The narrative is to be found in the Spicilegium, iii. 304, Paris, 1723, Mansi, viii. 242, and excerpts from it in Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1154. From 507 to 510 Gundobald was engaged in a war against the Visigoths in alliance with Clovis, in which he defeated Gesalic, their king, at Narbonne. (Isidorus Hisp. Hist. Goth. in Bouquet, ii. 702; Chronologia Rerum Gothorum, xi. Bouquet, ii. 704.) He died in 516, leaving his son, the Catholic Sigismund, as his successor.

In spite of the unfavourable testimony of the Catholic writers, there are many indications that Gundobald was for his time an enlightened and humane king. For his eloquence, see Ennodius, Vita S. Epiphani, 53, Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 375, "fando locuples, et ex eloquentia dives opibus et facundus assertor," and Avitus, ep. xxviii, Patr. Lat. lix. 246, and for his quickness and invention, Heraclius, ep. ad Avitum, ep. xlviii. Patr. Lat. lix. 265, "praecllentissimus princeps, . . . ad inveniendum igneus, proflus ad dicendum," etc., and for his humanity, the Vita S. Epiphani, 50-4. The wisdom and equity of his government are also evidenced by the Loi Gombette, the Burgundian code, called after him, which, though it probably did not take its present shape entirely till the reign of his son, was enacted by him. Its provisions in favour of the Roman, or old Gallic inhabitants, whom in most respects it put on an equality with the conquerors, entitles it to be called the best barbarian code which had yet appeared (Greg. Tur. ii. 33; Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 83 seqq.; L'Art de vérifier les Dates, x. 365, Paris, 1818). The retention in it of the ordeal of battle, though only with a view to checking perjury, was its chief blemish, and called forth a bitter letter or treatise from Agobardus, archbishop of Lyons, to Louis the Pious, about three centuries later (Adversus Legem Gundobadi, in Migne, Patr. Lat. civ. 113).

seq.) This code may be found in Bouquet, iv. 257 seq., and Pertz, Leges, iii. 497 seq.

Though he professed Arianism, he did not persecute, but on the contrary secured the Catholics in the possession of their endowments. Avitus writes to him, "Quidquid habet ecclesiola mea, imo omnes ecclesiae nostrae, vestrum est, de substantia quam vel servastis hactenus vel donastis." (Ep. xxxix. Patr. Lat. lix. 256.) The circumstances relied on by Revillout (De l'Arianisme des Peuples Germaniques, 180, 181), who takes the opposite view, are trivial, compared with the testimony of Avitus and the silence of Gregory.

His whole correspondence with Avitus and the conference of Lyons demonstrate both the interest he took in religious subjects and his tolerance of orthodoxy. Several of the bishop's letters survive, addressed to him in answer to enquiries on various points of doctrine on which he had asked for explanations, for instance, on the Eutychian heresy (Epp. 3 and 4), repentance in articulo mortis, and justification by faith or works (Ep. 5). One only of Gundobald's remains (Ep. 19), asking an explanation of Isai. ii. 3, 4, 5, and Micah iv. 4. These letters may be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lix. 199, 202, 210, 219, 223, 236, 244, 255, and are commented on in Ceillier's Hist. générale des Auteurs sacrés, x. 554 seqq. He probably died an Arian, but it is not quite certain. According to Gregory he was convinced and begged Avitus to baptize him in secret, fearing his subjects, but Avitus refused, and he perished in his heresy (Hist. Franc. ii. 34, cf. iii. prologue). On the other hand there are two passages in Avitus's letters, (Ep. v. sub fin. Patr. Lat. lix. 224, "unde cum laetitiam—orbitatem," and Ep. ii. sub init. Patr. Lat. lix. 202, "Unicum simul—principaliter de tuenda catholicae partis veritate curetis") which seem almost to imply that he was then a Catholic. See too Gregory's story of the piety of his queen (De Mirac. S. Juliani, ii. 8). [S. A. B.]

GUNDOVALDUS, surnamed BALLOMER, or Pretender, was the son of a concubine of Clotaire I., though disowned by that monarch. By his mother's care he was well educated, and brought, while still a boy, to Childebert, the childless brother of Clotaire, and committed to his protection. Clotaire soon heard of it, and sent for him, but on his arrival vowed that he was no son of his, and ordered his flowing locks, the insignia of royalty among the Franks, to be cut off. Upon Clotaire's death (A.D. 561), his son Charibert received him, but another son, Sigebert, to whose court he was summoned, again cut off his hair, and sent him into exile at Cologne. He seems to have suffered considerable hardship, and at one time to have earned his living as a fresco painter (Greg. Tur. vii. 36). From Cologne he made his escape to Narses, then ruler of Italy. Here he married, and had children, and after the death of his wife migrated to Constantinople, where he was well received by the emperor Maurice, and lived prosperously for many years. But towards the close of 579 or beginning of 580, Guntram Boso, a duke of the Austrasian Franks, sought him out at Constantinople, and invited him to France, in the name of the nobles of Childebert's kingdom, who, in their struggle against the power of the monarchy, probably expected assistance from a contest for the crown. Boso gave the most solemn assurances of the successful issue of the expedition. Accordingly, in 582, he landed at Marseilles, where the bishop Theodorus was favourable to the design, and furnished him with a body of cavalry to escort him to Avignon, where Mummolus, the ablest general of France, who had abandoned the service of king Guntram, and joined the conspiracy, was settled. But the sight of the great treasure with which the emperor had supplied Gundovald for the expedition soon excited the avarice of Guntram Boso, who stole as much of it as he could, and deserted Gundovald. This defection was so serious that Gundovald retired to an island, the name of which we are not told, to await the progress of events (583). The following year, however, he returned to Avignon, and with Mummolus, Desiderius, a duke of Chilperic's kingdom, Sagittarius, bishop of Gap, and a considerable body of followers, marched towards Limoges, and on the way at Brives-la-Gaillarde was raised on the shield and proclaimed king (Dec. 584). From the neighbouring cities, amongst others, Angoulême, Périgueux and Toulouse, he exacted oaths of allegiance, to himself in the case of those which had belonged to Chilperic or Guntram, but to Childebert, where they had been included in the portion of his father, Sigebert. Meanwhile Guntram's army, led by Leudegisilus, Count of the Stable, and Aegilanus, a patrician, arrived at Poitiers, and pressed Gundovald's forces southward. For a time he remained in Bordeaux, where the bishop Bertchramnus was his warm adherent, but afterwards retired across the Garonne, almost to the Pyrenees, and seized the town of Comminges. Here he was besieged for fifteen days without avail, but his cause was now seen to be hopeless by Mummolus and his other followers, who were induced by the promise of their lives to betray their chief. Deceived outside the city gates, he was treacherously and cruelly murdered by Guntram Boso and Ollon, one of the leaders of Guntram's army, a short distance from the town. His betrayers, including Mummolus, for the most part forfeited their lives also a little later (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 24, 26; vii. 10, 14, 26–38; Epitomata, lxxxix.; Fredegar. Chronicon, ii.; Fauriel, Hist. de la Gaule Mérid. c. xvi. tom. ii. 222–307; Richter, Annalen, pp. 83–7). [S. A. B.]

GUNDRADA was sister of Adalhard and Wala, abbats of Corbie, and granddaughter of Charles Martel. She lived at the court of Charlemagne, her cousin, where she bore the name of Eulalia. Two of Alcuin's letters are addressed to her. One of them (Ep. 243, Jaffé, Monum. Alcuin, p. 780) contains Alcuin's treatise on the nature of the soul, written at Gundrada's request (cf. Vita Alcu. c. 12, Jaffé, p. 28). It generally appears (e. g. ap. Froben and Migne, Patrol. 101, col. 639 sqq.) as a separate treatise under that title. The other (Ep. 199, Jaffé, 184, Froben) is a letter of exhortation and commendation upon chastity and purity. The praises bestowed upon Gundrada in this letter and in the Vita Adalhardi (quoted by Jaffé, and in Pertz, Sc. ii. 527) give a very dark picture of the morals of the palace.

GUNDULPHUS, a supposed bishop of Milan, about the middle of the 6th century. (Boll. Acta SS. 17 Jun. 378.)

[R. S. G.]

GUNDVALDUS, son of Garipald, duke of Bavaria, accompanied to Italy his sister Theodelinda, who married first, king Autharis, and afterwards king Agilulf. He was made duke of Asti, and died c. 612 by an arrow from an unknown hand. His son Aripert became king of the Lombards in 653. (Origo Gentis, 6; Paulus Diaconus, iii. 30; iv. 41, 48; Fredegar, Chronic. cap. 34; Migne, lxxi. 623.)

GUNIBALD, saint. [WINIBALD.]

GUNIFORT, martyr. [GUNIBALD.]

GUNLEUS, GUNLYN. [GWYNLLYW.]

GUNNUINUS, GUNUBUL. [GUINNUS.]

GUNTASIUS, Donatist bishop of Benefa, or Benesa, in proconsular Africa, present at the Maximianist council of Cabarsussis, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Ps. 36, 20.)

[H. W. P.]

GUNTBERTUS (GOMBERTUS), thirty-fifth archbishop of Sens, succeeding Godescalcus and followed by Petrus I. (circ. 779-786). The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xii. 14) quote a MS. of the monastery of St. Peter to the effect that he died in the seventh year of his episcopate, and was buried in the church of that foundation. His day of commemoration is March 1. He is not to be confused with St. Gundelbertus, the reputed archbishop of Sens, who founded the monastery of Senoniae in the Vosges in the preceding century.

GUNTBERTUS, martyr. [GONDEBERTUS.]

GUNTCHRAMNUS. [GUNTAMNUS.]

GUNTERANUS (or GUALTERANUS), c. 670, bishop of Siena. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xvii. 374; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iii. 528.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GUNTFRIDUS (GODEFRIDUS, GAUFRIDUS), thirteenth bishop of Cambay, between Trauardus, or Trawardus, and Albricus. He subscribed the charter of Etho bishop of Strasbourg, for the foundation of the monastery of Schwarzachum (Arnulfi-Augia), in Lower Alsace (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1314). He is said to have translated the remains of St. Landelinus, founder of the monastery of Lobbes, on June 15, 770 (Usuard. Jun. xv. Auct. Molani, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 159; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 1062). He died probably soon after that date. (Gesta Pontificum Cameracensium, lib. i. 37; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxlix. 49; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 750, n. xliii. tom. v. p. 254; Gall. Christ. iii. 9.)

GUNTAMUND. [GUNDAMUND.]

GUNTIMAR (GUNDEMAR), king of Gothic Spain from Oct. 610 to Aug. 614. From the Hist. Gothorum only two facts are to be learnt of his short reign, that he carried through a successful expedition against the rebellious Vascones, and that he besieged—unsuccessfully?—some of the remaining Byzantine strongholds of the peninsula (“alia [expeditione] militem Romanum obsedit”—Isid.). Besides these two statements of Isidore’s, however, we have various documents which relate or profess to relate to Gunthimar, and which have been and are still disputed. It will be necessary to notice briefly: I. The letters of the comes Bulgaranus; II. The so-called synod of Carthaginensian bishops held at Toledo in 610, and the Decretum Gundemari attached to it—two famous documents, upon which the much disputed primacy of Toledo was practically built up; III. The church laws which, in the 15th century, Alfonso of Cartagena first attributed to Gunthimar.

I. Three out of the seven letters of the Comes Bulgara or Bulgchramn were published for the first time in the excellent Valencian edition of Mariana’s History, 1792, vol. ii. app. One more, a letter of consolation to Gunthimar on the death of his queen, Hilduara, was partially printed by Florez in his Reynas de España, vol. i. Three others—one addressed “Domino sancto ac Beatissimo et Apostolicis meritis equando, meoque semper praeclaro Domno Agapio epo. Bulgar.”; the second, “cujus supra ad eundem de Galliis”; and the third, “quidam ad Agapium,” which may not, of course, be a letter of the comes at all—remain unpublished. They are extant in the 16th century copy taken by Morales, and now in the Madrid Library, of the famous Codex Ovetensis (see art. FROILA (3), note). Morales speaks of another still older MS. of them at Alcalá (Hist. de España, vi.), of which, however, so far as we know, no modern mention has been made. On the strength of the three barbarous and all but unintelligible letters published in the appendix to Mariana, and well known in MS. to earlier scholars, it was commonly asserted by older authors—Morales, Mariana and Ferreras, for instance—that Gunthimar had paid tribute to Theuderic of Burgundy, the son of Childebert II. and grandson of Brunichild, possibly in return for services rendered him by Theuderic in the palace revolution which overthrew his predecessor Witteric (Mariana, lib. vi. cap. ii.); a theory still further developed by Helfferich, who regards the revolution as a church conspiracy, and Gunthimar as the clerical and Frankish instrument (Entstehung und Geschichte des Westgothen-Rechts, p. 50). Dahn has already refuted the tribute theory; but his explanation of the real bearing of the letters is still somewhat incomplete (Könige der Germanen, v. 176). A careful examination of them gives the following results. In the year 611, when the final and successful campaign of Brunichild and Theuderic against Theudibert of Austrasia (Fredegar, cap. 37, 38) was about to begin, it was rumoured in Gothic Gaul, of which Bulgara was the governor (conf. "in hac provincia—ad ordinationem nostram pertinente," ep. ii.), that Brunichild and her grandson were exciting the heathen Avars against Theudibert. Bulgara writes for information to a bishop of Theudibert's kingdom (Theudibert is spoken of in the second letter as "filius vester Dominus Theudibertus," and again as "gloriosus Rex Theud."), promising that, if a report so hateful to Catholic ears should turn out to be true, solemn fasts and prayers shall be held throughout Septimania for the success of the "orthodox prince" Theudibert against so disgraceful a conspiracy. At the same time the comes refers (ep. i.) to negotiations already going on between Theudibert and Gunthimar, and asks the bishop for news as to whether the letters sent have reached Theudibert, and whether the Missi have returned "[ut] certius sciamus—quomodo aut ubi, pecunia praeparatur." In the second letter ("cujus supra ad episcopum Franciae directa") reference is again made, not only to Theudibert's present negotiations with the Goths, but to his relations with past Gothic princes ("decidentibus principibus"—an evident allusion to the alliance between Witteric, Theudibert, and the Lombard Agiulf against Theuderic—Dahn, l. c. 174), and it is explained that Theudibert had promised to furnish Gunthimar with troops ("numerus gentis Francorum—impertire") in return for a sum of money ("merito pecuniae"). The bishop is implored to further the execution of this compact, and is, moreover, again asked for news as to Theudibert's war with the Avars. Evidently Bulgara and Gunthimar are mainly anxious about this latter matter because it may prevent the performance of Theudibert's promise. What the Frankish troops were wanted for is of course unknown to us, unless we may suppose that they were to be used in the expedition against the Vascones of which Isidore speaks. Whether this were so or no, neither troops nor money ever reached their destination. Bulgara's third letter ("delectissimo atque in Christo reverendiss. Patri Epo. Bulg.")—which may be dated 612 with great probability—is one of angry remonstrance addressed to a bishop, not of Theudibert's kingdom, but of Theuderic's (conf. "cartas gloriosissimorum Regum—vestrorum Brunichildes Reginae et TheudERICI Regis"). The comes complains that noble Gothic legates, Totila and Gunthimar by name, have been unjustly captured by the bishop's sovereign, imprisoned by the bishop, and made to suffer "the disgrace of exile together with the shame of destitution." On account of these proceedings the king and people of the Goths have a large money claim against the bishop's masters ("non exigua sed magna pecuniae repetitio"), and until the legates are reinstated, Bulgara refuses to allow Frankish legates permission to enter Spain, or to give up to Brunichild the towns of Lubinianum (Juviñac) and Cornelianum (Corneilhan), which she claimed as a cession from Recared, but which the comes declared were only ceded by Recared for the confirmation of that peace which the Goths and Franks which she and

It appears tolerably clear then that the money sent to Theudibert by the Goths was captured by his cousin and rival Theuderic in the same year which saw the downfall of the former at the hands of the latter; that Gunthimar did not reverse, but rather carried out, the Frankish policy of his predecessor, Witteric; that therefore there is no ground for supposing a combination of Gunthimar and the Franks against Witteric for which an alliance between Gunthimar and Theuderic, not between Gunthimar and Theudibert, would be necessary; that there is no sign of any church action in the matter, and that the tributestory, on which Helfferich builds so much, is quite untenable.

In the fourth letter of the comes (unpublished), addressed to the bishop Agapius, and probably written after the death of Gunthimar, he describes his sufferings at the hands of one Atebo, or Azebo, whom he calls "tyrannus," and who seems to have been the head of some revolt at Narbonne. He was released from the prison into which he had been thrown, he tells his correspondent, by the good offices of the metropolitan Sergius of Narbonne. We shall find the mention of this bishop's name of importance in the investigation of our second point.

II. The so-called synod of 610, and the Decretum Gundemari. The Constitutio Carthaginensis Sacerdotum and the Decretum Gundemari were first published by Loaysa in 1590. Since then they have been generally treated as at least open to question by the various council editors (conf. Mansi, x. 511; Harduin, iii. 546), and of late the German scholar Dahn has pronounced decisively against them (Äbnige der Germanen, vi. 439). They are found in only three out of the nine council MSS. used by the latest editors of the Spanish Codex Canonum, but two of these at least, the Codex Aemilianensis and the Codex Vigilanus, rank as the best and fullest of the extant MSS. (see description of them in Florez, iii. app., and Tejada y Ramiro, Coll. de Can. l. c. i. pref.). The Decretum and Constitutio follow immediately upon the acts of the twelfth council of Toledo, held under ERVIG (7. c.), in which the famous sixth canon secures to the king and the metropolitan of Toledo the right of appointment to bishoprics all over Spain. After this canon, which raised the bishop of Toledo to the position of primate of Spain, the earlier documents, which conferred upon Toledo the metropolitan authority over the whole of Carthaginensis, seem to have been added, honestly or dishonestly, as tending to illustrate the history and enhance the dignity of the royal see. The Constitutio which is signed by fifteen bishops of Carthaginensis confesses that the see of Toledo has metropolitan authority ("metropolitani nominis habere auctoritatem"), and that it precedes the other churches of Carthaginensis, "et honoris potestate et meritis." Nor are its honours in any way of recent creation. They are declared by "the synodal sentence 'antiquorum patrum'" in the council held under bishop Montanus (A.D. 527; MONTANUS), and are now reiterated lest at any future time any of the comprovincial bishops should venture to despise the primacy of the Toledan church, and to appoint bishops without regard to the rights of the Toledan see ("remota hujus sedis potestate") as had been hitherto done. Deposition and excommunication are threatened in case of any such presumption in future. The synod is dated the 23rd of October in the first year of the most pious and glorious Gundemar era, 648 (A.D. 610). The fifteen signatures, headed by that of Protophenes of Segontia (Sigüenza), follow.

The Decretum Gundemari, which, although it precedes the synod in the MSS., has always been considered as confirmatory of the synodal acts (Dahn, l. c.; Helfferich, l. c. p. 52; Esp. Sagr. vi. 158), is an extremely curious and interesting document, whether forged or genuine. It is addressed to "our venerable fathers the bishops of Carthaginensis," and announces at the outset the king's desire to glorify his reign not only by due care for and arrangement of secular matters, but also of matters pertaining to divinity and religion. The passage which follows is almost unintelligible. "Nonnullam enim in disciplinis ecclesiasticis contra canonum auctoritatem per moras praecedentium [Florez has "mores procedentium," vi. 333] temporum licentiam sibi de usurpatione praeteriti principes [Florez, "praeteriti Principis"] fecerunt: ita ut quidam episcoporum Carthaginensis Provinciae non reverentur contra canonicae ecclesiae potestatem, per quasdam fratras et conspirationes inexploratae vitae omnes (? homines) episcopali officio provehi atque hanc ipsam praefatae ecclesiae dignitatem imperii nostri solio sublimatam contemnere." As to the historical meaning of these sentences, we shall have a few words of suggestion to offer presently. The king goes on to declare that nothing of this kind is to be allowed in future, but that the honour of the primacy over all the churches of Carthaginensis is to be conceded to the church of Toledo, which excels the rest in dignity of name and office. Nor is it to be suffered that the province of Carthaginensis should be split up into two parts with two different metropolitans, which may lead to schism, to the overthrow of faith, and the destruction of unity. As for the signature of the venerable bishop Euphemius in the general synod of the Toledan council (C. Tol. III. A.D. 589; EUPHEMIUS), where he calls himself metropolitan of the province of Carpetania, the king corrects, "eiusdem ignorantiae sententiam," since the "regio" of Carpetania is not a province, but part of the province of Carthaginensis, as ancient documents declare. As Baetica, Lusitania, and Tarraconensis are separate provinces with separate metropolitans, so Carthaginensis is one province, and must obey one primate. Let not the bishops then venture to do again such presumptuous things as have been done. Indulgence is to be accorded to past transgressions, but if any disobey in the future, they are to be visited with degradation, excommunication and "nostrae severitatis censuram."

The king signs first, "propria manu." Then follow Isidore of Seville: "dum in urbem Toletanam pro occursum Regio advenissem agnitis his constitutionibus adsensum praebui atque subscripsi"; Innocentius of Merida, id.; Eusebius of Tarraco, Sergius of Narbonne, and, among the suffragans, the two historians Joannes of Gerona [JOANNES BICLARENSIS] and MAXIMUS of Saragossa, and Isidore's brother, Fulgentius of Astigi. There are twenty-six signatures, of which four are metropolitan.

CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

Arguments for and against the Synod and Decretum.—Dahn's objections, based wholly on internal evidence, are—(1) the unusually good Latin of the documents, especially of the Constitutio, compared with that of other contemporary specimens, with the acts of C. Hisp. II. for instance, which we know to have been drawn up by Isidore himself; (2) the use of the title "majestas nostra," which we find nowhere else applied to a Gothic king, and of the word fratria, also unknown according to Dahn in the Latin of that time and country; (3) the sharp definitions of the words regio and provincia, the meaning of which varied greatly in official and public use; and (4) the absence of the name of the bishop of Toledo from the list of signatures (Könige der Germanen, vi. 439).

To these objections of detail we may add the generally suspicious character of these documents relating to metropolitan privileges (conf. the acts of the so-called council of Oviedo, in 811, and the supposed councils of Lugo, Esp. Sagr. iv. 141 and xxvii. app.); and we may point to the avowed connexion between these documents and the synod of Montanus, another doubtful matter in the eyes of some scholars, though the grounds for rejecting it are as yet far from convincing (MONTANUS).

On the other hand, it may be urged—(1) that the Latin of the Constitutio is no better than, if as good as, the Latin of the second synod of Barcelona, held in 599, the acts of which were possibly drawn up by the historian Joannes Biclarensis, as the Constitutio and Decretum may have been at least partially drawn up by the learned Isidore (Gama, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. 2, 27); (2) that the definitions of regio and provincia exactly correspond with the definitions given in Isidore's Etymologiae, xiv. 5 "Item regiones sunt partes provinciae, sicut in Phrygia Troia, sicut in Gallacia Cantabria et Asturia"; (3) that, although the title "majestas nostra" cannot be matched elsewhere, the expression "regia majestas" was perfectly familiar to Isidore and to the time generally (Etymol. x. 238 and Lex Visig. tit. i. 5), and may very well have suggested the use of "majestas nostra" to the scribe, whether Isidore or another, while the word fratria does occur in a contemporary Spanish document, i.e. the judgment delivered at C. Tol. vi. (638) in the case of the rival bishops of Astigi, Marcianus and Habencius (Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 329); (4) that the signature of Aurasius of Toledo is wanting because "he could not appear as judge in his own cause" (l. c. p. 487).

Again, a careful cross-examination of the signatures both of the Constitutio and Decretum yields results certainly favourable to their authenticity. In the first place, we have the signatures of two bishops of Castulo (Cazlona), the first, Theodorus, among the signatures to the Constitutio, the second, Venerius, among the signatures to the Decretum, where he appears as the only Carthaginensis bishop. The obvious explanation of this is that Theodorus of Castulo, whose signature is found among those of the third council of Toledo, twenty-one years before the accession of Gunthimar, died shortly after the promulgation of the Constitutio, that he was succeeded by Venerius, who was made to sign the subsequent Decretum, having not signed the Constitutio. "The signature of Venustus," says Reifferscheidt, "speaks very much in favour of the Decretum—a forger would hardly have taken notice of such a point." Among the whole forty-one signatures to the documents, there is not one against which a charge of anachronism or impossibility can be brought, while several are unexpectedly illustrated by contemporary documents. For instance, Sergius of Narbonne is known to us from the synods of Toledo, 589, and Narbonne, in the same year, only as Sergius of Carcassonne, but the fourth letter of Bulgarians (unpublished; see above) shows him to us as advanced to the metropolitan see of Narbonne; Innocentius of Merida does not appear in any other synod of the time, but his life among the biographies of the bishops of Merida, current under the name of Paulus Emeritensis (a work of the first half of the 7th century), proves that an Innocentius was bishop of Merida just at this date. Eusebius of Tarraco is known to us from a letter of Brulio to Isidore (Ep. v.; Ep. Supr. xii. 326) and from the well-known letter addressed to him by king Sisobut (Epist. 85), and he may possibly be identified with the Eusebius signing the council of Egara in 614. In general it may be said that we are able to identify most of the bishops signing the Decretum, who belong to the provinces of Tarracensis, Narbonensis, and Bactica. This is only because we have synods in 589, 592, 599, and 619 held in these provinces, whereas we have no Gallician or Lusitanian synod between the third and fourth councils of Toledo, and also no synod besides the synod of Gunthimar in which the names of Carthaginensian bishops appear, between 589 or 597, if we except the doubtful synod of Recared (Gama, K.-G. ii. 2, 25; Ep. Supr. vi. 154) and 683. This explains how it is that only one of the Lusitanian, none of the Gallician, and very few of the Carthaginensian names can be substantiated from outside, but as the names that can be checked are right, it is at least probable that those which cannot are so also.

One of two alternatives, therefore, must be the case, either the documents are genuine, or they are the work of an extremely clever forger extraordinarily well versed in the ecclesiastical history of the time. On the latter supposition, three separate suggestions may be made: (i.) that they are connected with the synod of Montanus, that both are forgeries of the time of Eugenius II., and that Ildefonsus consciously or unconsciously made use of the deception; (ii.) that the Constitutio and Decretum are forgeries of the time of the ambitious Julian, to whose initiation was owing C. Tol. xii. 8, and during whose episcopate the see of Toledo assumed a position it had never attained before, and never equalled again until the time of archbishop Bernard and Alfonso VI. (conf. Gama, K.-G. ii. 271-210); (iii.) that the forgers of these Toledan metropolitan rank, and to play the part of the heir of Toledo in things ecclesiastical as it had become the heir of the Gothic capital in civil status. This latter suggestion would require a careful re-examination and comparison of MSS. before it could be proved or finally refuted. Compare however the mention made of Toledan supremacy over Carthaginensis in the acts of the so-called council of Oviedo in 811 (Sup. Supr. xxi. vii. app.).

On the other hand, if the documents are genuine, we are in possession of the key to the ecclesiastical history of Carthaginensis in the first half of the 7th century. Between the modest signature of Euphemius in 589 as "metropolitan of Carystania" and the glorification of the see of Toledo as the illustrious and privileged head of Carthaginensis which we find in Ildefonsus (conf. the de Vr. II. passim, but especially the preface), and see realized in Julian's career (JULIAN), the synod and Decretum would then occupy a middle and explanatory place. A glance at the history of the time throws some light on such an ecclesiastical attempt as these documents, if authentic, represent. In 589, many of the older bishoprics, certainly most of the maritime bishoprics of Carthaginensis and Bactica were in the hands of the Byzantines. The sees of Cartagena, Malaga, Urci, and Amidenis at least were in their possession, and possibly, as Gams suggests, Ilici, Dianium, and Bastabis also. The two letters of Gregory the Great to the Defensor Joannes (Epist. i. 13, ep. 45, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii.) imply the existence of a considerable but indefinite number of bishoprics within the Byzantine boundaries.

Euphemius then, at a time when several of the suffragan bishoprics of Carthaginensis, including Cartagena itself, up to 425 at least—as we can scarcely doubt notwithstanding the scanty nature of the evidence—not only the ancient civil but the undisputed ecclesiastical head of the province, were in the possession of the Eastern empire, could not truthfully assume the title of metropolitan of Carthaginensis, even if such a rank had formerly at any time belonged undisputedly to Toledo. And it was less possible at that moment than it would have been later, for the bishop of Toledo to assume the title without possessing the reality because of the existence of the distinguished Licinian of Cartagena, the friend of Gregory the Great, who undoubtedly, as his letters show, possessed and exercised metropolitan powers either over the whole of the Spanish territory within the Greek borders, together with the Balearic Isles, or over a portion of it (Ep. i. ad S. Greg. Pap. and ii. ad Vincentium Ep. Rhodense Insule; Ep. Supr. v. 431, 435).

But after the death of Licinian of Cartagena (about A.D. 600), to whom we know of no successor, although he may have had one, and during the vacancy resulting therefrom, the see of Carthaginensis was vacant.

such as we know Aurasius to have been (Ildes. Vir. Illustr. cap. v.) might with some plausibility have claimed the ecclesiastical headship. In or about 615 Cartagena itself was destroyed (conf. Fredegar. Chron. c. 33 with Etymol. xv. 1, 67), and no possible rival remained to dispute the pretensions of the "nrbs regia." At a time, therefore, when the Gothic power was rapidly advancing towards this conclusion, Aurasius may have made his attempt, just as Montanus may have made an earlier attempt in the same direction, when Cartagena, the ancient civil and ecclesiastical metropolis [see art. HILARIUS], was still suffering from the ruin and destruction wrought by the Vandals in 425 (Idat. ad an.), and before her restoration by the imperialists. (The Byzantines entered Spain in 554 at the invitation of Athanagild.) After Toledo became under Leovigild the seat of the Gothic government, the aggrandisement of the see was assured. If the synod and Decretum Gundemari are genuine, then we are in possession of the steps which led from the position of Euphemius to the position of Julian. If not, we are in the dark.

Among the exciting causes of the synod and Decretum may very well have been the obscure proceedings in the south-eastern corner of Spain revealed to us by Gregory's letters to the Defensor Johannes, and by the sententia or judgment of Johannes upon the causes he was sent to investigate. The words in the Decretum, "licentiam sibi de usurpatione praeteriti principis fecerunt," refer possibly not to Witteric, as Dahn supposes, but to Justinian or Maurice, and allude to the split of some bishops within the Greek borders from the rest of Carthaginensis, perhaps to the doubtful cases where part of the bishopric had fallen into Byzantine hands, and the bishop had taken advantage of the fact to separate himself from the Carthaginensian synod. Space fails us to dwell on the question, but the more those letters are studied, the more probable will it appear that the synod and Decretum of Gunthimar were in great measure an answer to the papal proceeding represented by them. The pope says that one of the bishops—of unknown see—whose cause is to be tried seems to have no metropolitan or patriarch. Therefore Rome takes up the matter and the Defensor Joannes is sent out. Toledo replies about six years later by claiming the whole of Carthaginensis, and sharply denouncing those who had tampered with her metropolitan privileges in the matter of appointment to bishoprics. Marked jealousy of the claims of Rome is shewn by Toledo throughout the 7th century. (See art. JULIAN; Gams, K.-G. ii. [2] 222–238.) The synod and Decretum of Gunthimar are not improbably one of the first symptoms of it.

III. On the subject of the supposed church laws of Gunthimar, see Helfferich (Westgothen-Recht, p. 53), who supposes that the four anonymous laws on the right of asylum in the Lex Frib. ix. 3, may with some probability be traced back to Gunthimar. Dahn, however, is of a contrary opinion (Könige der Germanen, v. 175, p. 6).

GUNTHRANNUS. [GUNTRAMNUS.]

GUNTHSUENTHA. [GOISVINTHA.]

GUNTIARIUS, king. [GUNDICARIUS.]

GUNTMARUS of Lira. [GUMMARUS.]

GUNTRAMNUS (1) BOSO, a duke of the Austrasian Franks in the latter half of the 6th century, is a representative instance of the high-born adventurer of Merovingian times. His career, as far as we know it, was made up of murders, robberies, treachery, sacrilege, and abject superstition, with scarcely a redeeming feature. He first appears as one of Sigebert's generals, and the reputed slayer of Chilperic's son, Theodebert, in A.D. 575. Two years later a refugee from the vengeance of the father, he had settled himself with his two daughters in the sanctuary of St. Martin at Tours. Hither he invited Meroveus, another son of Chilperic, who had been in arms against his father, and a little later, seduced by the promise of a bribe, betrayed him to his stepmother Fredegund, and was credited by report with his murder. His next exploit was to go to Constantinople and invite Gundovald, the disavowed son of Clotaire, to come to France and contest the crown of Austrasia. At twelve separate shrines he pledged his oath that he might come securely, and received rich gifts from him, but when he had arrived, Boso first stole part of the treasure he had brought to assist his enterprise, and then betrayed him to king Guntram. Finally, when the pretender's cause appeared hopeless, he murdered him, with every circumstance of treachery and brutality, not omitting to carry off as much as he could lay his hands on of the remaining treasure (A.D. 585). In the same year he broke into the church of Metz, and robbed the body of one of his wife's relations, his cupidity being tempted by the gold and jewels in which she had been buried. For this he was tried before Childebert and his nobles, and compelled to return the treasure with shame. His end, however, was not far off. Amongst his other enemies was the queen-mother Brunichilde, whose hatred he had incurred by his reckless and outrageous calumnies. At her desire, Childebert had commanded his capture and death. He fled to the sanctuary of the church at Verdun, where he hoped to obtain safety through the mediation of Agericus, the bishop, who was Childebert's godfather. His intercession, however, could only obtain a promise that Boso's fate should rest upon the decision of king Guntram, at the approaching conference of the two kings at Andelot. This verdict condemned him to death. Boso, when he heard it, fled to the lodging of Magnericus bishop of Treves, who was in attendance on Childebert, and was godfather of his son, and barring the door swore that if he was to die, the bishop should die with him. From his durance the latter sent appealing messages to his master, but the two kings were inexorable, and the order had been given to fire the house and burn them both, when the bishop's attendant clergy burst in the door and dragged him out. Boso, driven out by the flames, was struck down on the threshold, and perished with his people, pierced with lances so thickly that his body stood upright. The large treasure which he had accumulated in a life of rapine, for the most part hidden in the earth to provide against all contingencies, was forfeited to the crown.

Gregory's estimate of him is curious evidence of the desperate lawlessness of the times. Though himself the chronicler of all his crimes, it is his perjuries only which impressed him, and those apart, he admits that Guntram had good qualities (alias sane bonus), though avaricious and greedy of others' goods. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 51; v. 4, 14, 19, 25, 26; vi. 26; vii. 14, 32, 36, 38; viii. 21, ix. 8, 10, 23; De Mirac. S. Martini, ii. 17; Epitomata, lxxx.; Fredegar, Chron. viii.; Thierry, Récits des Temps mérovingiens, iii. iv.)

GUNTRAMNUS (2) (GUNTCHRAMNUS, GUNTHRANNUS, GONTRAN), ST., king of Burgundy, son of Clotaire I., and Ingundis (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 3). Upon his father's death in 561, Guntram's half-brother Chilperic seized the royal treasure at Braine, and entering Paris with the Franks, whose support it enabled him to purchase, endeavoured to usurp the government of the whole kingdom. Thereupon Guntram, Sigebert and Charibert, having united their forces, drove him out, and proceeded to make a just division of the kingdom by lot. To Guntram fell the territory which had been the share of his uncle Chlodomer, viz., the kingdom of Burgundy, which at this time extended from the Vosges to the Durance, and from the Alps to the Loire. (For the territories of the sons of Clotaire, see Bönnell, Die Anfänge des Karolingischen Hauses, sub fin.) Orleans was his nominal capital, but in fact he made his ordinary residence at Châlon-sur-Saône (iv. 21, 22). The external history of his reign, owing to his pacific and unenterprising disposition, is uneventful. His wars were almost all defensive, and on one occasion only did he take the field in person. Upon Charibert's death, about A.D. 567, his kingdom was distributed between the three surviving brothers, the city of Paris with its territory being divided equally among them, and a compact was entered into to the effect that entry into the city by any of them should be followed by the forfeiture of the offender's share, an agreement under which Guntram later on claimed his two brothers' portions (vii. 6, 14). Sigebert soon broke the peace by endeavouring to deprive Guntram of Arles, but his expedition was defeated and he lost Avignon to Guntram's generals, though it was restored to him again out of good nature (iv. 30). In 571, and the following year, the Lombards broke into France from Italy. On the former occasion Guntram's general, Amatus, was defeated and slain with a terrible massacre of his Burgundian army, but on their return the superior generalship of Mummolus triumphed, and the Lombards were annihilated or driven back across the Alps (iv. 42). About this time broke out the civil war between Sigebert and Chilperic, which only ended with the former's murder in 575. Guntram at first joined Sigebert, and through Mummolus recovered for him Tours and Poitiers, which Chilperic had wrongfully usurped (iv. 46). But he would gladly have held aloof altogether, and in 573 he assembled all the bishops of his realm at Paris, that they might decide upon the pretensions of the two brothers, but without avail, for they refused to listen (iv. 48). In 577, all his four sons having died he solemnly adopted Childebert, the infant son of Sigebert, and declared him his heir (v. 18). In 584 Chilperic was murdered, and at Fredegund's request Guntram went with a force to Paris, and protected her and her infant son, Clotaire II., against the nobles of Childebert's kingdom (vii. 5). Here too he undid some of the wrongs committed by Chilperic, restoring the property which his followers had taken, and reviving the wills of pious donors which had been disregarded (vii. 7). Meanwhile, though he voluntarily relinquished Marseilles (vi. 46), he upheld his title, in spite of the remonstrances of Childebert, and the Austrasian nobles, to the part of Charibert's territory which had been inherited by Sigebert and Chilperic, on the ground that they had forfeited their shares by entering Paris (vii. 6, 12, 13, 14). In 584 Tours and Poitiers, which had formerly belonged to Sigebert, revolted from Guntram to Childebert, the former's son, but were speedily subdued, their territories being devastated with fire and sword (vii. 12, 13). In 585 Poitiers revolted again, and Guntram in person led an army against it, which pillaged, burned and murdered in the surrounding country till the city submitted. His soldiers afterwards did the same in Touraine, though loyal (vii. 24). In 582 there had arrived at Marseilles a pretender to a share in the kingdom of the Franks, in the person of Gundovald, a son of one of Clotaire's concubines, but disavowed by Clotaire himself. Induced by Guntram Boso and Mummolus, who had for some reason deserted Guntram, to leave Constantinople, where he had latterly lived, on the solemn assurance that the nobles of Childebert's kingdom were eager to espouse his cause, he found himself, after a time, betrayed and plundered by those who had invited him, and after a hopeless struggle was treacherously murdered at Comminges in A.D. 585 (vii. 14, 28, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38). At this time, induced perhaps by the need of an ally against Gundovald, Guntram restored to Childebert the territory he held which had formerly belonged to Sigebert, and again solemnly made him his heir (vii. 33). In 586 he sent an army against the Visigoths in Septimania, to avenge the injuries of Ingondis, his niece, and the death of her husband, St. Hermenegild, but the expedition, accompanied by more than the usual devastation and sacrilege, broke up and failed. Reprisals followed almost immediately in the invasion of the territory of Toulouse and Arles by Richaredus, Leuvichilde's son (viii. 30). Hostilities were continued at intervals till Guntram's death, and, influenced presumably by the hatred of his clerical advisers towards Arianism, he uniformly refused to listen to the frequent overtures for peace, made to him by the Goths (viii. 35, 38, 45; ix. 1, 16). In Nov. 587, Guntram, Childebert, and Brunehilde, met at Andelot, and by the treaty there signed, the text of which we have in full, composed the differences which had always smouldered, and often broken out into open war, since the murder of Galsuintha in A.D. 567 (ix. 10, 11). The main provisions of it were that so much of Charibert's kingdom, as upon his death had fallen to Sigebert, i.e., one-third of Paris and its territory, Châteaudun, Vendôme, part of Étampes and Chartres were assigned to Guntram, while Meaux, Sens, Sensis, Tours, Poitiers, Avranches, Avic, Conserans, Bayonne, and Albi were given to Childebert. In the event of either dying without leaving a son, the other was to take the whole. As to the towns which had belonged to Galsuintha as dower or morgengabe, viz., Bordeaux, Limoges, Cahors, Lescar and Tarbes, they were to be held by Guntram for life, and then belong to Brunehilde, except Cahors, which should become hers at once (ix. 20). About the same time he became involved in a wearisome Breton war on his borders, which though settled for the time broke out again later (ix. 18; x. 9). In 589 he sustained a severe defeat from the Goths in Septimania, losing 5000 men (ix. 31). In 591, at Fredegund's request, he was present at the baptism of her son Clotaire II., and received him from the font. He died in 593, in the thirty-third year of his reign, on the 28th March, on which day the church commemorates him as a saint, and was buried in the monastery church of St. Marcellus, his own foundation at Châlons. The Martyrologies, both ancient and modern, make mention of him on this day. See Hieronymus, Bede, Wandalbert, Usuard. The assertion in the last that he retired from the world and gave his wealth to the poor, is legendary. (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 881.) The Bollandists under this date give a life of him extracted from Gregory of Tours and Fredegarius. (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 721.)

Though the church has canonized Guntram, it is perhaps doubtful whether his virtues would stand out brightly on any other background than the utter darkness of Merovingian times. His chief merit seems to have lain in the avoidance of the terrible excesses which characterized some of his family, and for this the feebleness of his nature was perhaps as much to be thanked as any positive inclination towards well-doing. Even his clerical eulogists admit that in the matter of women his morals were by no means scrupulous (Aimoin, iii. 3, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 693). His concubine, Veneranda, originally the servant of one of his people, he discarded to marry Marcatrudis, whom in turn he repudiated in favour of Austrechildis (Greg. Tur. iv. 25, v. 17). Upon Charibert's death he entertained the proposals of marriage made to him by his widow, Theudechildis. "Let her come without fear," said he, "and bring her treasure with her." But no sooner was she in his power than he appropriated her riches, and shut her up in a monastery at Arles, where she soon after died (iv. 26).

In the absence of provocation or panic he was mild, and even merciful, in temper, but on occasion he readily committed the barbarities of his age. The two brothers of the forsaken Marcatrudis, who, in resentment at their sister's injuries, spoke against her successor, were put to death, and their goods confiscated (v. 17). He did not hesitate to beat, imprison and torture the ambassadors of Gundovald, though one of them was an abbat, and Mummolus and the rest of the pretender's generals were put to death in breach of the condition of their surrender (vii. 28, 32, 38). His chamberlain, Chundo, being accused of killing a wild bull in one of the royal forests, was sentenced, despite his protestations of innocence, to the ordeal by combat, and when his champion fell at the same moment with his opponent, was tied to a stake, and stoned to death (x. 10).

The merest suspicion or accusation connected with his personal safety was sufficient to throw him into a panic, when torture was freely applied to obtain confessions. Assassination was the haunting fear of his life, and to guard against it he always wore arms, and continually strengthened the escort by which he was attended everywhere, except in church (vii. 8, 18, viii. 11, 44). The murder of Chilperic made a deep impression on him, and when Fredegund denounced Eberulfus as the assassin, he swore before his nobles that he would kill not only him but his posterity to the ninth generation "to stay this impious practice of killing kings" (vii. 21). Childebert's ambassadors played upon this fear, when they assured him to his face that "the axe which had dashed out his brother's brains had not lost its edge" (vii. 14).

His apprehension at times took an almost comic aspect. Gregory tells us that one Sunday at church in Paris, when the deacon had enjoined silence for the mass, Guntram turned to the people, and said, "I beseech you, men and women who are present, do not break your faith to me, but forbear to kill me as you killed my brothers. At least, let me live three years, that I may rear up the nephews whom I have adopted, lest mayhap, which God forbid, you perish together with those little ones when I am dead, and there is no strong man of our race to defend you" (vii. 8, cf. Michelet, Hist. de France, i. 231, "Ce bon homme semble chargé de la partie comique dans le drame terrible de l'histoire mérovingienne").

But on one occasion, at least, he had not the excuse of either rage or fear for his cruelty. His wife, Austrechildis, on her death-bed, expressed a wish that her two physicians should die with her, and though they were in no way responsible for her death, Guntram commanded their execution as she desired (v. 36).

On the other hand, the mere abstinence from wanton wrong-doing and aggression must be counted for a virtue in his family and age. For the crowning evil of the time, the incessant civil wars which devastated France, he was in no way responsible. Indeed, he seems to have cherished a genuine affection for his relations, though it was generally ill-repaid (vii. 5; viii. 10, 37; ix. 11, 20). Though frequently in combat, it was always to repel the aggression of others, except in the case of his Gothic wars, which probably assumed in his mind the character of crusades against the heretics. And the profuse almsgiving which he practised (e.g. vii. 40) showed a real, if mistaken, desire for the good of his subjects.

But it was his attitude to the church and the clergy which procured him admission to the ranks of the saints. He was a warm friend to the church (vii. 7, 40). St. Benignus of Dijon, St. Symphorian of Autun and St. Marcellus of Châlon-sur-Saône, were founded or enriched by him, and in the last he established and provided for perpetual psalmody after the model of St. Sigismund's foundation at St. Maurice (Fredegar. Chron. xv.; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. iii. 81, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 751). Bishops were his constant advisers, and his favourite solution of all complications was an episcopal council (v. 28; vii. 16; viii. 13, 20, 27). He commended himself to them, also by his respect for the ceremonies of the church, and the frequency and regularity of his attendance at all religious services, and especially by the freedom and condescension with which he ate, drank and conversed with them (vii. 29; viii. 1-7, 9, 10; ix. 3, 20, 21; x. 28). Gregory says, "You would have thought him a priest as well as a king" (ix. 21). "With priests he was like a priest," says Fredegarius (Chron. i.), and "he showed himself humble to the priests of Christ," says Aimoin (Hist. Franc. iii. 81, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 751). Chilperic once intercepted the letter of a bishop, in which it was written that the transition from Guntram's sway to his was like passing from paradise to hell (Greg. Tur. vi. 22).

In estimating Guntram's character, therefore, it must always be borne in mind that the authors on whom we depend for our information belong to this favoured class. Especially is this true in the case of Gregory of Tours, who was on very friendly terms with him (viii. 2-7, 13; ix. 20, 21), and who goes so far as to ascribe miracles to his sanctity during his lifetime (ix. 21; cf. too Paulus Diaconus, de Gest. Langob. iii. 33, Migne, Patr. Lat. xcv. 535, and Aimoin. iii. 3, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 693).

There is extant an edict of Guntram addressed to the bishops and judges of his realm, commanding the observance of the Sabbath and holy days, in conformity with the canon of the second council of Mâcon. It is dated Nov. 10, 585, and is to be found in Mansi ix. 962, and in Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 720; cf. Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 369, seq.

Several authors relate of Guntram the following story, which Valesius (Gest. Vet. Fr. lib. xv. 452) takes pains seriously to refute. One day, weary with hunting, he was resting on the bosom of his esquire by the bank of a rivulet, and the esquire saw a little reptile issue from his mouth and vainly attempt to cross the water. The esquire held his sword across, and the creature passed over upon it, returned and re-entered the king's mouth. Guntram awoke in agitation, and said he had been dreaming that he had crossed a great river by an iron bridge, and in a cavern beneath a mountain discovered a vast treasure. Advancing beyond the stream he came to the treasure, which he devoted to the service of the church. (Paul. Diac. Gest. Langob. lib. iv. cap. 33; Aimoin. Monach. Floriac. lib. iii. cap. 2; Sigebert, Chron. ann. 585; Regino, Chron. in Pat. Lat. cxxxii. 81; Wendover, tom. i. p. 98, ed. Coxe.) [S. A. B.]

GUNTRAMNUS (3) I. (GUNTARIUS), seventeenth archbishop of Tours following St. Baldus or Baudinus, and succeeded by St. Eufronius. Gregory of Tours says that he was abbat of the monastery of St. Venantius in the same city, whence he was raised to the episcopate. Before his elevation he was a man of wisdom, and a trusted ambassador of the French kings, but after it he became addicted to wine to such an extent that he grew stupid, and was unable to recognise his fellow-revellers, whom he cursed with unseemly abuse. He sat two years, ten months, and twenty-two days, circ. A.D. 552-554, and on his death was buried in the church of St. Martin. Gregory also relates the miraculous refusal of the bishop's horse to pass an oratory of St. Martin, where as abbat he had been wont to pray, until the duty had been performed

GUNTRAMNUS (4) II., 36th archbishop of Tours, succeeding Ibbo and followed by Dido. According to the Chronicon Turonense Magnus (Salmon, Recueil de Chroniques de Touraine, pp. 91-2), he sat from 730 to 742. He may have been identical with the third abbat of St. Martin's (Gall. Christ. xiv. 32, 160.) [S. A. B.]

GUNTRUTA, daughter of Teutpert, duke of the Bavarians, became the wife of Luitprand, king of the Lombards (713-744). Paulus Diaconus, vi. 43. [A. H. D. A.]

GUNWALLUS, saint. [WINWALLUS]

GUODLOIU, GUODOLIU, suffragan bishop of Llandaff. [GWODLOEW and GWYDDLOX.]

GUOZBERTUS of Poitiers. [GAUSBERTUS.]

GURAM, the first of the race of the Bagratides who ascended the throne of Georgia towards the end of the 6th century of our era. He was the adopted son of Stephen, last Georgian king of the house of the Sassanides. The dynasty of the Bagratides claimed to be descended from David king of Israel, emblazoning on their arms the sling that served to kill Goliath, David's harp, a pair of scales as emblem of Solomon's wisdom, a lion on which rested Solomon's throne, our Lord's coat, and St. George slaying the dragon. All round this device was the verse: "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it: of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne" (Ps. cxxxii. 11). Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Administr. Imp. cap. 45) tells us that the kings of Georgia are descended from the prophet David, and that they quitted Jerusalem about the year 500 of the Christian era. (Malan, Hist. of Georgian Church, p. 15.) [G. T. S.]

GUREBERTUS of Reate. [GUREBERTUS.]

GURGEN king of Georgia, about the time of the emperor Justinian. He was persecuted by the Persians on account of his faith. (Malan, Hist. of Georgian Ch. p. 81.) [G. T. S.]

GURHEL, Welsh saint. [GWRHAL.]

GURIAS, Nov. 15 (Cal. Byz.); in the Armenian Calendar, Nov. 14; presbyter and martyr with another presbyter, Samonas or Shamuna, in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 306, at the city of Edessa, where a magnificent church was raised to their memory, which the Mahometans afterwards turned into a mosque. Their acts were written by Aretas, bishop of Caesarea in the 6th century. The deacon Habibus is usually joined with them in commemoration, but he suffered some years after under Licinius. (Bas. Menol.; Asseman. Mart. Orient. i. 226; Cureton, Act. Syriac. Docum. p. 72; Wright's Syr. Mart.) [G. T. S.]

GURMAET, ST., a companion of St. Teilo after his return from Brittany to Wales, and the saint of a church corresponding to Llandilo'r Fân, in Brecknock, which was bestowed by Rhydderch, king of Wales, on the bishopric of Llandaff. It is called Languruaet in the grant.

GURNERTH [GWRNERTH.]

GURNIN (GUIRMINN), virgin, daughter of Cughaela or Conghail, is commemorated in Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tall. on Feb. 22, and is given as Garnimia among the Praetermissi of the Bollandists. (Acta SS. 22 Feb. iii. 280; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 670.) [J. G.]

GURNUEU (GURNVEN, GURVAN), bishop of Menevia about the beginning of the 9th century. (Giraldus Cambr. Itin. Kambr. ii. c. i. wks. vi. 105; Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 155; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 622.) [J. G.]

GURON, ST., a hermit, probably Irish, who had settled at Bodmin, in Cornwall, before the arrival of St. Petrock from Ireland. (Leland, Collect. i. 75.) William of Worcester (p. 107) says, "St. Woronus confessor die 7 Aprilis." A chapel is dedicated to him in St. John's parish on the part of Cornwall which projects out into Plymouth Sound. The parish of Gorran is on Mevagissey Bay further west, and the episcopal estate there is called Polgorran. See Dugdale's Monasticon, i. 213. [C. W. B.]

GURVALUS (GUDWAL, GURWAL), ST., said to have been one of the early bishops of St. Malo in the first half of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 995.) [S. A. B.]

GURVAN, bishop of Menevia. [GURNUEU.]

GUTARD (GUTTARDUS), the thirteenth abbat of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, who ruled according to the Chronologia Augustinensis, from 787 to 803. (Elmhams, pp. 12, 13, 335, 340.) According to the Canterbury historiana, he was blessed by archbishop Jaenberht. (Thorn, c. 1, 75; Elmh. p. 335.) Although he was abbat during a most stirring period of Kentish history, nothing is recorded of his acts. [S.]

GUTHAGON, commemorated July 3; according to tradition a Scoto-Irish prince, who went with his sister Macra, and his servant or companion Ghillo [GHILLO], into Flanders, and, after a life of penitence and piety at Oostkerk, near Bruges, died there in the year 299, aged fifty-one, according to Dempster. (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 314-16; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 314-15; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, July 3, p. 97; Butler, Lives of the Saints, July 3, Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 204, 213.) [J. G.]

GUTHLAC, ST., presbyter and hermit of Crowland or Croyland (699-714). He is known through a Latin Life by Felix, whose information was derived from the saint's intimate associates, the abbat Wilfrid and the presbyters Cissa (§ 2) and Bettelin (§ 35). It has been printed with notes and comments by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 11 Apr. ii. 37) and by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. iii. 256 or 263). A free Anglo-Saxon version from the Latin was made at some period unknown, and now exists in a Cottonian manuscript executed, it is believed, soon after the conquest. This version was edited in 1848 with an English translation by Mr C. W. Goodwin.

Felix must have written about thirty-four years after Guthlac's death, since he dedicates to Elfwald king of the East-Angles (747-749). The work is thus of much interest, as it carries on Anglo-Saxon historical literature a step in immediate succession to Bede. Bede's Life of Cuthbert and Felix's Life of Guthlac may be regarded as companion memoirs of early-English saints. In one respect Felix's memoir is even of more interest than Bede's, as containing much less of the marvellous in its details, and giving more reality to the saint. It is not known who Felix was. Of course he could not have been the bishop of Dunwich, which some have called him. He says of himself that he is a domestic (vernaculus) of a "catholic congregation," the latter phrase apparently indicating a monastery which adhered to Roman usages in a period when Roman and Celtic rivalries were yet in memory and possibly still alive. "Vernaculus" might further import that he was bred on the estate of the monastery, like Bede at Jarrow, a kind of foster child of the house, receiving perhaps his Latin name from the monks. An unsupported reading in one manuscript makes him a monk of Jarrow. The objection to assigning him to Crowland is that Elfwald was his lord and Crowland was a Mercian house. It is more natural to suppose that he was a monk somewhere in East Anglia, in which kingdom there had then been founded the monasteries of Cnobheresburg, Betrichesworth, Soham, and Ely.

Guthlac's father Penwall or Penwald, who resided among the Middle Angles, was descended from the Iclings, a noble race of Mercia, and belonged to the tribe of the Guthlacings, after whom the son was called (§ 8). His mother Tecta or Tetta also belonged to a family of rank. The birth of their son is not dated. Felix interprets the name Guth-lac as meaning belli-munus, an augury of the reward he was to obtain for contending against evil. A later interpretation (Capgrave's) is belli-donum in the sense of bonum donum. Goodlake has been suggested as the modern representative of the name. Guthlac was baptized in infancy. His earliest manhood was fired with the ambition of rivalling the heroes of ancient story, and taking up the profession of arms he collected a band of followers, at whose head he "wreaked his grudges on his enemies, burned their city, ravaged their towns, and wildly through the land made much slaughter, and took from men their goods" (Goodw. p. 15). The biographer seems to exaggerate the exploits, but he evidently does not regard Guthlac as a brigand, for he notes that "by a divine admonition" he restored to the vanquished one-third of the spoil. In another place (Felix, § 20) it is incidentally stated that Guthlac had once lived in exile among the Britons, and had learned their tongue. His enemies are called his "persecutors." It may be supposed then that his hostilities were undertaken against the hereditary British foe, from whom the lands of his family or tribe had received special wrong. The case of Hereric appears to have been somewhat parallel. After eight or nine years thus spent, Guthlac suddenly one night, in a fit of reflection, and apparently with a presentiment that his life would not prove a long one, resolved to devote the rest of his days to religion. Promptly in the morning, having signed himself with the cross, he bade adieu to his comrades and repaired to the monastery of Repton in the Middle Angles. The little that is known of Repton during the heptarchal period is almost all contained in the pages of Felix. It is in Guthlac's Life we become aware of the existence of the house, and learn the names of two of its abbesses (Monast. Angl. vi. 429). The burial of the etheling Cynehard at Repton in 755 rests solely upon the statement of Rudborne (Angl. Sac. i. 196) against every other authority. The lady presiding over Repton was Oelfrid or Aelfthrytha [ELFTHRITHA (1), ELFRIDA (1)], and under her Guthlac received St. Peter's tonsure. Repton was a "Catholic congregation," as Felix elsewhere (§ 15) expressly calls it. Guthlac was then in his twenty-fourth year (§ 11 fin.). Florence of Worcester (in M. H. B. 539 B) records the date as 697, so that 674 is the computed year of Guthlac's birth. This is the year before Ethelred became king of Mercia, whereas Felix in opening his story within the reign of Ethelred appears to contradict our reckoning. Felix, however, plainly was ignorant of the precise time, or he would have recorded it; for when he thought he knew a date, that of his saint's death, he gave it; the period of his birth he wraps up in vague and general language. The discipline of Repton under abbess Elfrida is illustrated by the unpopularity which Guthlac incurred by abstaining from strong drink (§ 12). After a time, however, his worth was discerned, and he became a favourite. He was then in his manly prime, tall and handsome, modest, patient, wise, chaste, and "with divine love burning in his soul" (§ 12). The lives of early solitaries were recited at Repton, and they made Guthlac ardent for a new adventure in imitation of them. Cuthbert's life at Farne island (cir. 676-686) might have helped to kindle the enthusiasm, though Bede's account of it was not then written, Bede being a young man of Guthlac's own age. In two years he had learnt the psalms, canticles, hymns, and prayers after the ecclesiastical order, and thus spiritually equipped, with the sanction of the elders he departed from Repton (§ 13). The one spot named from which his route can be ascertained is Gronte, Granta, or Grantchester (§ 14; Goodw. 21), near Cambridge. The Roman road from Repton, then Watling Street, then Iknield Street, would have brought him into that neighbourhood. At Grantchester he found himself near the border of the great fen country, which Felix describes as stretching far to the north, with now a black pool of water, now foul running streams, many islands also, and reeds, and hillocks, and thickets, with manifold windings wide and long. From Tatwine, one of the inhabitants of Grantchester, Guthlac heard of Crowland, the most desolate island of the waste, and known to very few besides Tatwine himself. Crowland therefore he resolved to reach, with Tatwine for a guide. We know that they embarked in a fishing skiff, but again the route is left to conjecture. They could, however, have dropped down the Cam in the direction of Ely monastery, then up the Ouse to where Erith now stands at the threshold of a long northerly stretch of true fen occupying east Huntingdonshire. Pursuing that direction, and thus skirting the western edge of the great marsh land, they could doubtless have threaded their way through streams and pools and meres up to Medeshamstede (Peterborough), and there gain the Nene, which would carry them to Crowland in the extreme south of Lincolnshire. The charter of the foundation of Crowland abbey dated 716 (Hist. Ingulph. Gale, i. 3; Kemble, C. D. 66; Gough, Hist. Croyl. 1783, p. 4, app. p. 1) is spurious, but its delimitation of the ground need not be rejected. Here we find the island extending four "leucæ" by three and bounded by the Shepishee on the east, the Nene on the west, Asendyke on the north, Southee on the south. These waters but partially survive in the modern map of the locality. Orderic, who describes (ut infr.) the original estate of Crowland Abbey as extending about 8 "miliaria" by 5, places Asendyke on the east, and calls it a fossa, an artificial work, which indeed its name implies. Roman engineers had by no means in their day neglected the drainage and embankment of the fen country. Guthlac's Crowland must have been a wilder one than that of Camden's days, when it was described as lying among the deepest fens and waters stagnating off muddy lands, so shut in and environed as to be inaccessible on all sides except the north and east, and that only by narrow causeways (Camd. Brit. ed. Gough, ii. 224). Guthlac certainly found no causeway; the spot was accessible by water only, and the language of Felix, "umbrosa nemora" (§ 14), "inter nubilosos lucos" (§ 15), suggest nothing better than a marsh jungle. A few days were spent in examining the capabilities of the spot, and Guthlac then went back to take final leave of Repton. In ninety days he returned, bringing with him two youths as servants, and arrived once more at Crowland on Aug. 24, the day of St. Bartholomew, Guthlac's chosen saint (§ 15).

For a Christian station Crowland was an advanced post into an unoccupied tract. Its monastic neighbour was Medeshamstede, about twelve miles in the west, while southwards, nearer to him, on the spot where Thorney Abbey afterwards rose, was Ancarig, a hermit settlement like his own, planted by Medeshamstede (Monast. Angl. ii. 593); but neither Medeshamstede nor Ancarig, nor yet Ely, are named by Felix. As he looked northwards into Lincolnshire Guthlac could see no monastery below the parallel of Lincoln, upon which line there lay Bardney and Partney eastward towards the sea. Beyond Lincoln there was only Barwe, somewhere by the Humber. It has been conjectured, however, with much plausibility (M. H. B. 1000; C. H. Pearson, Hist. Maps of Engl. p. 68), that the minster built by St. Botolph in 654 (A. S. C. s. a.) was Boston or Botolphstone, and this minster would then have been, as far as can now be known, Guthlac's nearest neighbour in Lincolnshire.

In a cistern-like hollow (§ 16), upon the slope of a hillock thrown up in earlier times by diggers for hidden treasure, as Felix supposed, but more probably one of those ancient British barrows which are not uncommon in those parts (cf. Stukeley, Itin. Curios. p. 5, ed. 1776), Guthlac made his dwelling. He clothed himself with skins, and at sunset he took his single daily meal of barley-bread and water (ib.). A man of his energy and resource would soon have made the spot habitable and productive. The worst hardships of his lot were those horrors which solitaries everywhere have experienced—temptations, the consciousness of sin, and an imagination haunted by demons. His temptations were to an excessive rigour. Stings of conscience, which had not driven him into solitude, came to him there (§ 17). But his fame more particularly rested on his conflict with demon powers, which caused him to be represented in mediæval art in the form of a monk wielding a scourge with a dragon or evil spirit at his feet (Parker, Angl. Ch. Cal. p. 242, engr.). Felix describes how in the stillness of the night his tormentors would flock about him, with their great heads, long necks, lean visages, squalid beards, rough ears, ugly faces, horse teeth, grating voices, crooked shanks, big knees (§ 19). One night he heard the accursed host speaking in the British tongue, for, adds Felix, many were the conflicts between the British and Mercians in those days when Coenred was king (§ 20). Was it that Guthlac's memory was haunted with the British of his warrior days? Or were the fens themselves held by a British remnant reduced by malaria to types of demoniacal ugliness? The devils of Crowland, as they have been called, were misshapen humanity to the view, wild cattle to the ear, and the natural tenants of those desolate swamps could have furnished his imagination with both. That he once, after a night's hard conflict with the enemy of mankind, had a waking view in the morning watch of St. Bartholomew in his celestial splendour, is one of the embellishments of Felix's story. The relief he really found was described by himself in his last illness, when Beccel begged to know who that invisible being was with whom he had seen his master conversing every night and morning. "The second year after I dwelt in this wilderness," replied Guthlac, "at even and at daybreak God himself sent His angel of my comfort to me, who opened to me the heavenly mysteries which it is not lawful for man to tell, and the hardness of my conflict he quite softened with heavenly angelic discourses" (§ 35; Goodw. 87). This may be taken as a description of his daily devotional hours and the alleviation he found in them. But in addition to solitary prayer there before long commenced an intercourse with the outer world (§ 31), which must have rendered life more interesting to him and more tolerable. Guthlac was not one of the class that sought absolute isolation. A distinction has been drawn between an anchoret who lived so and a hermit, according to which view Guthlac was a hermit. Felix uses this word of him (§ 17; cap. 2, heading); but he also calls Guthlac's companion Egbert an anchoret (§ 35, p. 49 E). Some later writers call Guthlac hermit (Hen. Hunt., Matt. West., Jo. Tinmouth in Smith's Catalogue ut infr.); the Anglo-Saxon uses the word "ernan" (Goodw. 87); others style him anchoret (Orderic, Flor. Wig., Sim. Dun., Higden). Whether hermit or anchoret, Guthlac was none the less a missionary; but instead of itinerating to seek a flock, he attracted one to his own ground and taught them there, for prophets of the desert have always drawn out crowds. Guthlac's domain was ample for their entertainment, and an incidental mention of "harvest" implies that he and his two Repton servants, and Tatwine, and Beccel, and Cissa, and Egbert, as they successively joined him, were no idlers. Occupying their several cots, they gave the island a home-like and a farm-like appearance, and became the pioneers of a larger settlement. The island had its one entrance from the river, and its stated landing-place, where a recognised signal-sound brought Guthlac down to receive his visitors (§§ 26, 27). These visitors were "men of divers conditions, nobles, bishops, abbats, poor, rich, from Mercia and all Britain" (Goodw. 67). Among the visitors came his bishop, Hedda of Lichfield, and accompanying him was Wigfrith, a man of books and learning. Wigfrith had "long dwelt among the Scotch people," and had his suspicions whether Guthlac were a true man of God or a pretender. While they were conversing together, Guthlac shewed himself so mighty in the Scriptures that the bishop urged him to accept of holy orders, and Guthlac was ordained a priest. The year of this occurrence is not mentioned, but it was five days before St. Bartholomew's day. "The hallowing of the island of Crowland and also of the blessed man Guthlac took place at harvest time" (§ 32; Goodw. 75). Crowland, which had always been shunned as demon-haunted (§ 14), had now its priest, its chapel and its altar (§ 35); the bad spell was broken, the island was under the church's wing, and Guthlac's celebrity was increased if not originated; instead of demoniacal human shapes were flocks of human pilgrims, and the demoniacs were dispossessed (§ 27); instead of demon sounds distracting his devotions were swallows singing on his shoulders or nestling in his bosom as he turned the page of holy writ. "Who hath led his life after God's will," remarked Guthlac to one of his visitors, "the wild beasts and wild birds have become more intimate with him, and the man who will pass his life apart from worldly men, to him the angels approach nearer" (§ 25; Goodw. 53). The visitor to whom this was said was the abbat Wilfrid, "a venerable brother, who had been of old united with him in spiritual friendship" (§§ 2, 25), and Holy Scripture is mentioned as a subject of their conversation (§ 29). Of what monastery Wilfrid was abbat Felix does not say. His Bollandist editor suggests Medeshamstede or Bardney. Their intimacy was evidently close and of long standing. It was from Wilfrid that Felix obtained material for his memoir. Wilfrid introduced another important visitor, Ethelbald the exiled heir of Mercia. This nobleman, then persecuted and hunted by king Ceolred (§ 34), frequently resorted to Crowland, where he found both security and sympathy. Guthlac predicted his ultimate succession, and one of Ethelbald's earliest acts after becoming king was the foundation of the monastery at Crowland. The supposed gift of prophecy gained Guthlac much credit; and he was thought besides to have the faculty of revealing the secret. It was in vain that two brethren "from a certain monastery" had hidden their flasks under the turf before landing on the island (§ 30) and two others who had been carousing at a widow's house found themselves in confusion before him (§ 29).

Guthlac's connexion with Repton was never completely broken until his death, and hardly even then. Another abbess, Ecgburh [EADBURGA (3)], daughter of king Aldulf, sent him a leaden sarcophagus and a linen winding-sheet, requesting to know whom he should designate as his suc-cease-. Repton seemed still to regard itself as the patron of the Croyland settlement. Guthlac replied that his successor, meaning Cissa, had not yet been baptized. His death therefore did not appear imminent. He was seized with his last illness on a Wednesday before Easter, and on Easter Wednesday he died (§ 35). Felix gives the year 715 (ibid. sub fin.), but as the day of commemoration was April 11, which was Easter Wednesday in 714, the latter appears to be the true year, and it is the one given by the Saxon Chronicle, Ethelwerd, Florence, Huntingdon, Gaimar (in M. H. B. 326, 507, 540, 725, 784). At the time of his death his fellow-hermits on the island were his old guide Tatwine, and the presbyters Beccel, Cissa, Egbert, the last being the sharer of his heart and confidences. In the neighbourhood, but not on the island, was his sister Pega, who was living as a hermitess in her own cell, four "leucæ" westward of his (§ 20; Hist. Ingulph. Gale, i. 4). If he was, as he appears to have been, the first child of his parents, his sister was under 40. He had declined seeing her until they should meet in heaven, and her first visit to Crowland was after his death, when she came, as he had requested, to place his corpse in the sarcophagus (§ 36). The body was interred in the oratory, and Felix states that when it was exhumed at the end of a year it was found uncorrupted, and was not reinterred, but enshrined in the oratory (§ 37). According to the Historia Ingulphi Guthlac left among his relics a psalter and a scourge of St. Bartholomew. When Felix wrote, the site of his cell and oratory had been already covered by king Ethelbald with "manifold buildings" (§ 37).

Other lives of Guthlac, founded on that of Felix, were subsequently written (see Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 805). One occurs in Ordericus Vitalis (iv. 20), another in John of Tinmouth's Sanctilogium (No. 39, vid. Smith's Cat. MSS. Cott. p. 28), adopted by Capgrave (Nov. Leg. ff. 169), and reprinted by Surius (de Prob. SS. Hist. Apr. p. 37) with verbal alterations and the omission of the latter part, about one-third of the whole. Ingulf abbat of Crowland is said to have written a book De Vita et Miraculis S. Guthlaci, now unknown (Gale, Scr. t. i. Lectori, p. 1; Hardy, Cat. i. 407). Two other lost lives are recorded, one attributed to William of Ramsey an abbat of Crowland, and one by Petrus Blesensis archdeacon of Bath, in an extant catalogue of whose works (see Patr. Lat. ccvii. proleg. p. xviii.) occurs a Life of Guthlac. Mabillon could ascertain nothing of these two (l. c. Obs. Praev. p. 256), and nothing has been forthcoming since. For manuscript Lives see Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 404. Brief accounts of Guthlac occur in Malmesbury (G. P. i. 321, ed. Hamilton), in Matthew of Westminster (p. 260), in Brompton (Twys. 797), in the so-called Historia of Ingulph abbat of Crowland, in Higden, and in Wallingford (Gale, i. 2, iii. 243, 246, 527, 528). Passing notices are found in the Saxon Chronicle (ann. 714), Asser (Gale, iii. 151), Simeon of Durham (G. R. A., Twysd. 104), besides the writers in the Mon. Hist. Brit. already cited. In spite however of all this popularity, Guthlac was not placed in any of the ancient Martyrologies. An Anglo-Saxon Calendarium or Menologium among the Cotton MSS. (Jul. A. x. pp. 70-80) gives him a brief account under April 11, but he is not named in the present English Calendar.

GUTTARDUS, abbat. [GUTARD.]

GUTTHEARD, a Mercian abbat who attests a charter of 777 granted by Offa to Aldred the ealdorman of the Hwicci (Kemble, C. D. 131; Mon. Angl. i. 587). The same charter is printed by Hickee, Thesaurus, i. 171, with the date 775. Kemble's date, however, is right. It is just possible, supposing the chronology of the abbats of St. Augustine's to be erroneous, that, as Kent had fallen under the rule of Offa in 774, the person here denoted may be identical with Guttard, abbat of St. Augustine's. [GUTARD.] [S.]

GUYNLLEU, Welsh saint. [GWYNLLAU.]

GUYNNAUC, GWYNNAWG, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOG.]

GWAEDNERTH (GUEDNERTH, GUIDNERTH), called king, in reality prince or chieftain, of Glamorgan, in the 7th century. He killed his brother Merchion in a contest for the chieftaincy, and was excommunicated for three years by bishop Oudocus of Llandaff; in addition he was directed to go on pilgrimage for a year to the archbishop of Cornouaille, in Brittany, who was also a Welshman. But as Gwaedneth returned within the year, Berthgwyn, who had succeeded Oudocus, refused absolution. On the earnest entreaty, however, of kings Morcant and Gwaedneth with many elders, and a solemn promise by the latter that he would make satisfaction with alms, fasting, and prayers, he was duly absolved, and gave to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, as satisfaction for his sin, Llann Catgualatyr or Llangadwaladr, now Bishton or Bishopston, near Caerleon, co. Monmouth. (Wilkins, Concilia, i. 18; Lib. Landav. by Rees, 430-2.) [J. G.]

GWALCHES, named with Barruc, Baruch or Barocus, as accompanying St. Cadoc from the island of Echni, now the Holmes, to the island of Barry; he was buried on the island of Echni, and the stone found in Flatholme, off the coast of Glamorgan, in the Bristol Channel, and marked with a plain cross, may perhaps have marked his grave. [BARROCUS.] (Rees, Cambro-Brit. 357; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xx. c. 18; Rees, Welsh Saints, 304.) [J. G.]

GWALCHMAI, son of Gwyar, one of the heroes of the Arthurian cycle, better known under the name of Gawaine, which comes from the Latinized forms Walganus and Walweyn. He is called one of the four sons of king Lot of Lothian and of Orkney, and of Morgawsa, Arthur's sister, and is the type of courtesy, just as Arthur's seneschal Sir Kai is of discourtesy. William of Malmesbury (iii. § 287) says that in 1086 the tomb of Walwen was discovered on the sea-shore in a certain province of Wales called Ros; still known by the same name in Pembroke, where there is a district called in

Welsh Castell Gwalchmai, and in English Walwyn's Castle. The pedigree runs thus:

See Geoffrey of Monmouth, ix. 9, 11, xi. 1, and Guest's Mabinogion, ii. 122. Geoffrey says "Walvanus filius Lot duodecim annorum juvenis, obsequio Sulpicii papae ab avunculo traditus, a quo arma recepit." By Sulpicius may be meant Simplicius. [C. W. B.]

GWALLONIR, clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff, Trychan and Cadward being the bishops. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 455-66.) [J. G.]

GWARDOGWY (GWORDDOGWY) (1), disciple of St. Dubricius, and clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishops Dubricius and Teilo (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 318 sq. 358-9).

(2) Abbat of Llandewi. [GWORDOG (1).] [J. G.]

GWARHAFEU. [GWRHAFWY.]

GWAROG, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GWARTHAN, Welsh saint, son of Dunawd, Dnaod or Dinothus, whom he assisted in establishing the famous monastery or college at Bangor Iscoed, Flintshire, in the 6th century. [DINOTHUS.] (Rees, Welsh Saints, 103, 206, 260.) [J. G.]

GWAWR, daughter or granddaughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, wife of Elidyr Lydanwyn, and mother of the celebrated bard, Llywarch Hên; she is classed among the Welsh saints of the 5th century, and Rees (Cambro-Brit. Saints, 605 sq.) suggests that she may be the same as Gwenddydd and Goleuddydd. (Myv. Arch. ii. 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 147; Camb. Quart. Mag. iv. 366, n.^{2a}; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600, 605 sq.) [J. G.]

GWAWRDDYDD (GWENDDYDD), daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog in the fifth century, wife of Cadell Deyrnllug, and ancestor of many Welsh saints; she was buried at Towyn or Tywyn, co. Merioneth. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 137, 149, 161; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 191.) [J. G.]

GWDDIN, Welsh saint of the fifth century, patron of Llanwddyn, on the borders of Montgomeryshire and Denbighshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 145, 333.) [J. G.]

GWEITH, clerical witness to the grant of Trelech, Monmouthshire, to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff, about the beginning of the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 452, 453.) [J. G.]

GWELVARCH. [GWYDDUARCH.]

GWEN (1), wife of Brychan, Brachan, or Frachan, and mother of St. Winwaloe, in Armorica, where she and her husband went from Wales, and were accounted saints. Malebranche (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. ix. c. 10) translates her name A'ba. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 606.) [J. G.]

GWEN (2), ST., granddaughter of Brychan, in the 5th century. She founded the church of Talgarth, in Brecon, where she is said to have been murdered by the pagan Saxons. She is also called Gwendeline. (Myv. Arch. ii. 44; Rees, Welsh Saints, 150; Williams, Iolo MSS. 520.) [C. W. B.]

GWEN (3), daughter of Caer Gawch, mother of St. Cybi, and aunt of St. David (Rees, Welsh Saints, 162, 266.) [J. G.]

GWEN (4), Welsh saint. [GWENTEIRBRON.]

GWENAFWY (GWENAVWY), Welsh saint, daughter of Caw, but without church dedication. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 230.) [J. G.]

GWENAN, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOG.]

GWENASETH, Welsh saint, daughter of Rhufon ab Cunedda Wledig, and wife of Pabo Post Prydain. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 111, 166 sq., 265.) [J. G.]

GWENDDYDD, Welsh saint, supposed to be the same as Gwawrddydd (Rees, Welsh Saints, 149.) [GWAWRDDYDD.] [J. G.]

GWENDELINE, Welsh saint. [GWEN (2).]

GWENDOLEU (GWENDDOLAU), son of Ceidio ab Garthwys, was educated with his brothers, Coŵ and Nudd, at St. Illtyd's College, Llantwit Major, and the three are numbered with the Welsh saints. He was a distinguished chieftain of North Britain, and in the Triads is called one of the "bulls of battle of the island of Prydain;" he was patron of the bard Myrddin the Caledonian, and fell in the battle of Arderdydd, A.D. 577. (Myv. Arch. 4, 7, 60, 70; Rees, Welsh Saints 103, 208.) [J. G.]

GWENFAEN, ST., a daughter of Paul Hen, in the 6th century. She was the foundress of Rhoscolyn in Anglesey, anciently called Llanwenfaen. Her festival is Nov. 5. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 237.) [C. W. B.]

GWENFREWI, Welsh saint. [WINEFRED.]

GWENFYL, ST., a daughter or descendant of Brychan in the sixth century. She founded a chapel called Capel Gwenvyl, now extinct, subject to Llanddewi Brefi, in Cardigan. Her feast day is Nov. 1. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 153.) [C. W. B.]

GWENGAD is associated with bishop Oudoceus, the abbats of Llancarvan, Dochou or Docunni, and Llanilltyd, and other clerics, as a witness to the restoration of Lannmergusall (now Bishopston or Llan-deilo-Vernalt, co. Glamorgan), by Morgan, king of Glamorgan, to the see of Llandaff, and to the grant of Llewes, co. Radnor, by king Meurig to bishop Oudoceus and the same see. He is in the first called "prince of Lanncynuur" (now Llangunnor, co. Carmarthen), and in the second "prince of Penaly" (now Penally, co. Pembroke). As distinct from abbat he must have been coarb or erenach, and he flourished in the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 387, 388, 392, 393.) [J. G.]

GWENGALEU, clerical witness to a grant by king Rhys ab Ithael to bishop Cadward (Catgwaret) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 465.) [J. G.]

GWENGARTH, clerical witness to grants by Awst, king of Brecknock, to bishop Oudoceus and the see of Llandaff in the end of the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 388-9, 397-8.) [J. G.]

GWENGENYW, priest, witnesses grants by two kings, Iddig and Cynan, to bishop Oudoceus and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 393-4.) [J. G.]

GWENGOLLE, GWENHOLLE. [WINWALLUS.]

GWENLLIW, GWENLLIU, granddaughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, by his daughter Corth, wife of Brynach Wyddel, but sometimes included among Brychan's children; she was sister of St. Gerwyn, and had two sisters, Mwynen and Gwennan. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 142, 151.) [J. G.]

GWENLLWYFO, ST., who gave name to Llanwenllwyfo in Anglesey in the 7th century. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 307.) [C. W. B.]

GWENNAN, ST. [BERWYN.]

GWENNY, GWEUNO, GWIGUOLEU, GWINGALAIS, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GWENOG, ST., a virgin saint of the 7th century, after whom Llanwenog in Cardigan is named. Her day is Jan. 3. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 307.) [C. W. B.]

GWENOG, clerical witness of grants to bishop Berthgwyn, and the see of Llandaff, in the reign of Ithael ab Morgan, king of Glamorgan, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 435, 436.) [J. G.]

GWENONWY, daughter of Meurig ab Tewdrig, king of Morganawg and Ghent in the 6th century, was married to Gwyndaf Hên ab Emyr Llydaw, and became mother of St. Meugan. She and Gwyndaf have given their name and patronage to Undy or Nondy, near Chepstow, co. Monmouth. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, append. p. 15.) [J. G.]

GWENRIW, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600.) [J. G.]

GWENTEIRBRON, ST., the mother of St. Cadfan. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 215.) [C. W. B.]

GWENVAEN, Welsh saint. [GWENFAEN.]

GWENVYL, Welsh saint. [GWENFYL.]

GWENWOR, abbat of Langarthbenni, and witness to the grant of Lann Loudon, in Eryng, by Gwrgan, king of Eryng, to bishop Lunapeus and the see of Llandaff in the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 408-410.) [J. G.]

GWERN, clerical witness to a grant of Mafurn by king Cynfyn ab Pebiau to bishop Aidan and the see of Llandaff, about the beginning of the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 408.) [J. G.]

GWERNABWY, disciple of St. Dubricius, and clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishops Dubricius and Comereg; but it was probably another Gwernabwy who was witness in the time of bishop Cadwared (Catgwaret). (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 321, 324, 411-12, 460.) [J. G.]

GWERYDD, ST., a Welsh saint of the 5th century, who founded the church of Llanwerydd in Glamorgan, which is now called St. Donata. (R. Williams, Enwogion Cymru, 195.) [C. W. B.]

GWESLAN, Welsh bishop. [GISTLIANUS.]

GWHARAFEU (GWRAFEU), clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff, under bishops Trychan and Cadwared (Catgwaret), or more probably different persons under the two prelates. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 455, 463.) [J. G.]

GWINEAR, ST. [FINGAR.]

GWINOCUS, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOC.]

GWLADUS (GWLADIS, GWLDDYS, GLADUSA, GULADUSA), called daughter, but more probably granddaughter of Brychan, of Brycheiniog, it not the daughter of another Brychan, who went to Armorica, and was father of St. Winwaloc. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 606.) She was wife of Gwynllyw Filwr, mother of St. Cadoc (Cattwg), and flourished about the middle of the 5th century. (Myv. Arch. ii. 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 137, 146, 170.) [J. G.]

GWLECED, clerical witness to grant of Merthyr Tecmed (probably Llandegwedd, co. Monmouth) to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff, about the beginning of the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 452.) [J. G.]

GWMYN, disciple of St. Dubricius at Hentland, co. Hereford, in the study of divine and human wisdom. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 324.) [J. G.]

GWNFYW (GWNNYW), reader, clerical witness to grants to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 430-2, 439.) [J. G.]

GWNNOG, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOC.]

GWNNYW, reader. [GWNFYW.]

GWODLOEW, GWODLOYW (GUODLOU, GUODOLOIN, GWYDDLON), son of Glywys Cerniw ab Gwynllyw Filwr, was first a teacher at St. Cadoc's school at Llancarvan, and then became a suffragan bishop of Llandaff, standing in the deeds of grants as Gwyddlon. With Glywys, his father, he founded Coedkernew, co. Monmouth, and flourished in the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 415, 625; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 623; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 156.) But Rees (Welsh Saints, 114, 268) is of opinion that Guodloiu, bishop of Llandaff, must have lived at an age too late for being the son of Glywys Cerniw, and perhaps belonged to the end of the 8th century. [J. G.]

GWORAFWY. [GWRHAFWY.]

GWORDOG (GWORDOC, GWORDDOGWY, GWRDDOGWY). (1) Abbat of Llandewi (now Dewstow, near Chepstow) and witness to several grants made to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishops

Janapeius, Comereg, and perhaps Grecielis. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 409 sq. 417-18.)

GWORDOG (2), Disciple of St. Dubricius. [GWARDOGWY (1).] [J. G.]

GWORFAN (GORFAN), disciple of St. Dubricius, and clerical witness to grant to St. Dubricius and the see of Llandaff in the 5th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 314 sq., 324.) [J. G.]

GWORGAED, clerical witness to grant to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 454, 455.) [J. G.]

GWORGENEU, clerical witness to the grant of Llewes, co. Radnor, to bishop Oudocus and the see of Llandaff in the 5th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 392, 393.) [J. G.]

GWORGYFIETH, clerical witness to the grant of some villages to bishop Trychan, and the see of Llandaff early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 456.) [J. G.]

GWORMOI, clerical witness to the grant of Llan Garth by king Iddon to bishop Teilo and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 358, 359.) [J. G.]

GWORWYDD, clerical witness to grant of Merthyr Clitawg (now Clodock, co. Hereford) to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff by Ithael, son of Morgan, king of Glewyssig, with the consent and approbation of his heirs and heirs' heirs, all named. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 446-448.) [J. G.]

GWRAFEU, GWRAFWY. [GWRHAFWY.]

GWRCEWID, clerical witness to grant to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 435, 436.) [J. G.]

GWRDDELW, GWRDDYLY, Welsh saint, son of Caw, flourished early in the 6th century, and is said to have had a church at Caerleon upon Usk. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 231; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 198.) There is no feast day assigned to him. [J. G.]

GWRFARWY, of Lanneineon, clerical witness to grants of a number of churches by king Athrwys to bishop Comereg and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 411, 412.) [J. G.]

GWRFODW, clerical witness to grants to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 428, 442.) [J. G.]

GWRFWY, clerical witness to the grant of Porthcasseg, near Chepstow, to bishop Oudocus and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 393-4.) [J. G.]

GWRFYW (GORFYW, GORVYW, GWRVYW), Welsh saint of the 6th century, son of Pasgen ab Urien Rheged, seems to have had a church dedicated to him in Anglesey, and a "capel Gorfyw" in Bangor uwch Conwy, co. Carnarvon. (Myv. Arch. ii. 45; Rees, Welsh Saints, 103, 280.) His feast day is not mentioned. [J. G.]

GWRGI (1), clerical witness to a grant of the village of Bertus by Ithael, king of Glewyssig, to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 440, 441.)

GWRGI (2) Gwrgi and Peredur, sons of Elifer Gosgorddfawr, were trained at St. Iltyd's college, but in the Welsh Triads appear as warriors, being at the head of one of the "three disloyal households of the island of Prydain," which deserted their leaders; that of Gwrgi and Peredur, on the eve of the battle with the Saxon Ida at Caer Grau, did so, and allowed them both to be slain, A.D. 584. (Myv. Arch. ii. 13, 70, 80; Rees, Welsh Saints, 103; Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, ii. 455; E. Williams, Iolo MSS. 530, 654; R. Williams, Emin. Welsh, 199.) [J. G.]

GWRGON, daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, and wife of Cadrod Calchfynydd, who flourished about A.D. 430. (Myv. Arch. ii. 44; Rees, Welsh Saints, 147.) She was also called Gwrgon Goddeu, and was abused by Tinwaed Faglawc, a chieftain, one of the "three strong-crutched ones of the island of Prydain." (Myv. Arch. ii. 5; Skene, Celt. Scot. i. 160, n.) [J. G.]

GWRGYNUF, clerical witness to grant of Is-pant by Cuchein ab Glywys to Gwyddlon (Guodloiu) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 415.) [J. G.]

GWRHAEREU, clerical witness to grant to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff, early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 453, 454.) [J. G.]

GWRHAFAL, GWRHAFARN, abbat of Llanilltyd (Llantwit Major, co. Glamorgan) and witness to many grants to the see of Llandaff during the episcopates of Oudocus, Trychan, and Berthgwyn (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 387, 388 et al. ad p. 459). Another Gwrhafal appears as clerical witness in the time of bishop Cadwared (ib. 463). [J. G.]

GWRHAFWY (GWRHAFEU, GWRAPWY, GWRAFEU, GWRAFWY), clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff under bishops Trychan and Cadwared (Catgwaret). (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 451-465.) [J. G.]

GWRHAI (1) (GURHEI, GWRHEI), Welsh saint early in the 6th century, son of Caw, and founder of the church of Penystyryd in Arwystli, Montgomeryshire. (Myv. Arch. ii. 25, 43; Rees, Welsh Saints, 231; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 597, 598; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 199, adding that he was a member of the college of Deiniol.) [J. G.]

GWRHAI (2), son of Glywys and uncle of St. Cadoc. He ruled over Gurinid or Gorwenydd, a district probably co-extensive with the deanery of Groneath, Glamorganshire (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 310, and notes), and was witness to a grant to bishop Arwystyl and the see of Llandaff (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 413). [J. G.]

GWRHAL, clerical witness to grant of Llan Garth (probably Llanarth, co. Monmouth), by king Iddon to bishop Teilo and the see of Llandaff (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 358-9.) [J. G.]

GWRHEI, Welsh saint. [GWRHAI.]

GWRHIR, the bard of St. Teilo, was a saint of the college of St. Cattwg (Cadoc), who lived in the 6th century. He founded the church of Llysfaen, in Glamorgan. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 251.) [C. W. B.]

GWRHYDPENNI, clerical witness to grants to bishop Comereg and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 411-12.) [J. G.]

GWRIN, Welsh saint, founder of Llanwrin, co. Montgomery; he was son of Cynddilig ab Nwython ab Gildas, and belongs to the 6th century (Williams, Emin. Welsh, 200) or more probably to the middle of the 7th, if he is to be accounted third in the line of descent from Gildas. [J. G.]

GWRMAEL, Welsh saint of 4th century, son of Cadfrawd ab Cadfan. His feast day is unknown, and no church is known to have been dedicated to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 89, 102; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 200.) [J. G.]

GWRMAET, disciple of SS. Dubricius and Teilo. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 351, 352.) Languruaet in Brecon belonged to the see of Llandaff. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 248.) [J. G.]

GWRNERTH, ST., a Welsh saint of the 6th century. A religious dialogue, in verse, between him and his father, Llewellyn of Welshpool, said to be by St. Tysilio, is preserved. His day is April 7. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 279.) [C. W. B.]

GWRON, clerical witness to grant by Ffern-wael, king of Glamorgan, "before the seniors of Gwent and Ergyng," to bishop Trychan and the see of Llandaff, early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 451, 452.) [J. G.]

GWRTHAFAR, abbat of Llanilltyd (Llantwit Major, Glamorganshire), and witness to grant of Lann Oudocui (Llandogo, co. Monmouth?) by Morgan, king of Glewyssig, to bishop Oudoceus and the see of Llandaff, in the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 400.) [J. G.]

GWRTHEVYR (surnamed VENDIGAID, the blessed) better known as Vortimer, son of Vortigern, who for a short time headed the Britons on the deposition of Vortigern, but was poisoned by his Saxon stepmother Rhonwen about A.D. 468. In the Triads he is called one of the "three canonized kings of Britain," and, as he was not an ecclesiastic, he was honoured with this title, it is thought by Rees, for his care in restoring the churches which had been destroyed by the Saxons, and likewise for the respect which he paid to men of religion. (Williams, Emin. Welsh, 201; Cumb. Quart. Mag. i. 378 sq.; Rees, Welsh Saints, 134.) [J. G.]

GWRTHWL, ST., the saint of Llanwrthwl, in Brecknock, and Maesllanwrthwl, in Carmarthen. The saint's day is March 2. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.) [C. W. B.]

GWBTRI, clerical witness to grant by king Rhys ab Ithael of Glamorgan to bishop Cadwared (Catgwaret) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 465.) [J. G.]

GWRWAN (GURVAN). (1) Bishop of Llandaff or local suffragan at Ystrydyw, excommunicated Tewdwr ab Rhun, king of Dyfed, for the perfidious murder of Elgystyl ab Awst, king of Brecknock, and as an atonement from Tewdwr, received Lannmihangel Tref Ceriau, probably Llanfihangel or St. Michael Cwmdru, co. Brecknock. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 413-15, 625.) He is not given by Stubbs (Reg. Sac. Angl.), and in Godwin's list of prelates at Llandaff (de Praes. Angl. 622) is called GURVAN.

(2) GWRWAN Hermit. Two brothers, Lybiaw and Gwrwan, and their sister's son, Cynwr, some time after the death of St. Clydog, came from Glamorganshire and lived as hermits at the place of his martyrdom, Merthyr Clitawg, now Clodock, co. Hereford. With the advice and assistance of the bishop of Llandaff, probably Berthgwyn, they built a new and better church, and king Penbargawd or Pennargaut endowed it with lands along both sides of the Mynwy, with all privileges and immunities in perpetuity. There the two brothers remained till death, and it was probably this endowment which "Ithael ab Morgan, king of Glewyssig, with the approbation of his sons and heirs, Ffernwael and Meurig, and with the consent of their heirs, Ithael and Ffrewddyr, sacrificed to God and to St. Dubricius, St. Teilo, and St. Oudoceus, and Clydawg the martyr, and bishop Berthgwyn," etc. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 446-48.) [J. G.]

GWRWAREU, pupil of Gwenwor (abbat of Lanngarthbenni), was clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff under bishops Aidan and Lunapelus in the 5th or 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 408-410.) [J. G.]

GWRWEITH, GWRWIEITH, clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff under bishops Berthgwyn and Trychan, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 427, 436, 451, 452.) [J. G.]

GWTFIL, Welsh saint. [TANGLWST.]

GWYAR, Welsh saint of the 7th century, son of Helig Foel, and brother of two other Welsh saints, Brenda and Euryn. No feast-day is assigned to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 213.) [J. G.]

GWYDDELAN, ST., the saint of Llanwyddelan in Montgomery, and of Dolwyddelan in Carnarvon in the 7th century. The saint's day is Aug. 22. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.) [C. W. B.]

GWYDDELW, Welsh saint. [GWYDDLEW.]

GWYDDFARCH. [GWYDDUARCH.]

GWYDDLEW (GWYDDELW), Welsh saint of the 5th or 6th century, son of Gwynllw Filwr of Gwynllwg, and brother of St. Cadocus or Cattwg. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114, 233.) No feast day or church dedication is recorded of him. [J. G.]

GWYDDLON, bishop. [GWODLOEW.]

GWYDDON, clerical witness to the grant of Cilpedec (now Kilpeck, Herefordshire) by Ffanw, son of Benjamin, to bishop Grecielis and the see of Llandaff, late in the 7th or early in the 8th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 416.) [J. G.]

GWYDDUARCH, a member of the college of St. Cybi at Caergybi, in Anglesey, and son of Llywelyn of Welshpool (Williams, Emin. Welsh, 204), but is not given by Prof. Rees (Welsh Saints). [J. G.]

GWYDDYL, clerical witness to grants to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishop Cadwared, probably in the beginning of the 9th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 463-5.) [J. G.]

GWYLERION, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertus by Ithael, king of Glamorgan, to bishop Berthgwyn and the see of Llandaff, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 440, 441.) [J. G.]

GWYNDAF HEN, the father of St. Meugan. He was said to have been a confessor in Illtyd's monastery, and afterwards superior of the college of Dubricius, at Caerleon, and to have retired in his old age to Bardsey island, near the north point of Cardigan Bay, where he died. He may be deemed the founder of Llanwnda, in Carnarvon, and of another church of that name 'n Pembroke. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 164, 219.) [C. W. B.]

GWYN (1), Welsh saint of the 6th century, one of five sainted sons of Cynyr Farfdrwch, viz. Gwyn, Gwynno, Gwynnoro, Celynin, and Ceitho, who were also the patrons of Llanpumsaint, in the parish of Abergwilly, and of Pumsaint, in the parish of Conwil Cayo, or Cynwyl Gaio, Carmarthenshire. He was commemorated on Nov. 1. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 52, 111, 213, 329.) [J. G.]

GWYN (2) Son of Helig ab Glanawg, and buried, with Boda, his brother, at Dwygyfylchau, now Dwy-Gyfylchi, Carnarvonshire (Camb. Quart. Mag. iii. 43). He is probably Rees's Gwynnin. [GWYNNIN.] [J. G.]

GWYNAU, classed as a son, but probably only a descendant of Brychan of Brycheiniog; he was brother of Gwynwa, but had no church dedication or feast. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 153; Camb. Reg. iii. 219.) [J. G.]

GWYNAWC, GWYNAWG, GWYN-NAWG, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOG.]

GWYNFWY, called Master, was clerical witness with three Welsh abbats and others to a grant made by Meurig, king of Glamorgan, to bishop Oudoceus and the see of Llandaff in the end of the 6th century. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 381-3.) [J. G.]

GWYNGAD, son of Caw (Jones, Welsh Bards, ii. 22), but not classed by Rees among the Welsh saints, as he followed a different list of Caw's descendants. (Lady Ch. Guest, Mabinogion, ii. 260, 335, London, 1849; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 205.) He may be the same as Gwyngar. [GWYNGAR.] [J. G.]

GWYNGAR, GWYNGAWR, son of Gildas ab Caw, and brother of SS. Gwynnog, Noethon, and Tydecho. (Myo. Arch. ii. 44; Camb. Quart. Mag. i. 30.) "Guenan a Noethon Meibyon Gildas M. Kadu," in the Bonedd Saint Ynys

Pri-lam. (Myo. Arch. 225) may refer to Gwyngar or Gwynnog, or even to Gwyngad. [GWYNNOG.] [J. G.]

GWYNGENEU, ST., Welsh saint of the 6th century, to whom Capel Gwyngeneu under Holyhead was dedicated. He was one of the children of Pawl Hên (Paulinus) of Ty-gwyn ar Daf. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 237.) [C. W. B.]

GWYNIO, ST., Welsh saint of the 7th century, to whom Llanwynio, in Carmarthen, was dedicated. His day was March 2 or May 2. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 308.) [C. W. B.]

GWYNLLEU (GUYNLLEU, GWYNLLYW), son of Cyngar, of the race of Cunedda Wledig, and belonging to the 6th century; he founded Nant-gwnlle, Cardiganshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 111, 261; Myo. Arch. ii. 23; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 593, 607.) [J. G.]

GWYNLLYW (GUNDLEUS, GUNDLIOU, GUNLEUS, GUNLYN).

GWYNLLYW (1) Filwr (the warrior), king of the South Britons and a Welsh saint; commemorated March 29. Several Lives have been published, but evidently derived from the same stock. The chief are—(a) Vita S. Gundlei Regis et confessoris, a MS. in Cott. Lib. Brit. Mus., Ves. A. xiv., and published by Rees (Cambro-Brit. Saints, 145-157), but collated with MS. Titus D. xii.; (b) De S. Gundleo Rege et confessore, an abstract of the preceding, given by John of Tinmouth (Sanctilogium), from whom it was taken by Capgrave (Nov. Leg. Angl. f. 168), and reprinted by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 29 Mart. iii. 783). (For the Lives and MS. authorities, see Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. i. 87-9, pt. ii. 804, append.)

Gwynllyw Filwr, son of Glywys ab Tegid ab Cadell, and lord of Gwynllwg or Wentloog, Monmouthshire, married Gwladus, daughter or grand-daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog [GWLADUS], by whom he had St. Cadocus or Cattwg, and other children (Rees, Welsh Saints, 114, 233, for lists of his family). Persuaded by the exhortation of Cattwg, he resolved to devote himself to a religious life, resigned his lordship in favour of Cattwg, and retired with his wife from the world, each afterwards occupying a distant cell. On Cattwg's advice, and with the consent of St. Dubricius, he built for himself a church "tabulis et virgis," supposed to be the church at Newport, Monmouthshire, situated in the hundred of Gwentloog, and dedicated to him under the name of St. Woolos. In his cell beside the church he lived for some years in great abstinence and devotion, subsisting by his own labour. At last worn out with age and austerity, he received the last holy rites of the church at the hands of his son Cattwg and bishop Dubricius, and entered his rest towards the end of the 6th century [CADOC]; but Ussher (Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 13, Wks. v. 530, Ind. Chron. A.D. 490) would place him earlier. He was buried in his own church or monastery, and near the church of St. Woolos there is a tumulus, which, according to the local tradition, was the tomb of Gwynllyw. (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 310, 356, 448 sq.; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 157, app. E; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 13, 415 sq.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, March 26. Crossy, Ch. Hist. Brit. x. c. 21; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 205; Colgan, Acta SS. 158.)

(2) Welsh saint. [GWYNLLEU.] [J. G.]

GWYNNIN, ST., the patron saint of Llandyggwynnyn, in Carnarvon, is commemorated Dec. 31. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 302.)

[C. W. B.]

GWYNNO or GWYNNOG, ST., Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron saint of Llanwynno, a chapel under Llantrisant, and of other churches. His festival is Oct. 26. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 257.)

[C. W. B.]

GWYNNO, son of Cynyr Farfdrwch. [GWYN (1).]

GWYNNOG. (GUYNNAUC, GWNNOG, GWYNAWC, GWYNAWG, GWYNGAWR, GWYNNAWG, GWYNNO, GWYNNOC, GWYNOG, WYNNOG, and latinized GWINOCUS, GWYNNOCUS), Welsh saint of the 6th century, son of Gildas ab Caw, and member of the society of St. Cattwg or Cadoc; commemorated Oct. 26. He was patron of Y Vaenor, Brecknockshire, is said to have assisted St. Illtyd and St. Tyfodwg in founding Llantrisant, Glamorganshire, under which there was a chapel called Llanwynno dedicated to him; he also founded Llanwynnog or Llanwnog Montgomeryshire, where in a painted glass window of the 14th century he is represented in episcopal habits, with mitre and crosier, and underneath in old black characters is the inscription, "Sanctus Gwinocus, cujus animae propitiatur Deus. Amen." (Cambr. Quart. Mag. i. 30-1, from a Parochial History of Llan-Wynnog, in Montgomeryshire, by Gwalter Mechan; Rees, Welsh Saints, 180, 257; Myv. Arch. ii. 25, 44, where in Bonedd Sant Ynys Prydain he appears to be called Guenan; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 597; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, Oct. 26, p. 646, calling him son of "Aneurin, also called Gildas.")

[J. G.]

GWYNNORO, Welsh saint. [GWYN (1).]

[J. G.]

GWYNODL, ST. (GUENNOEDYL, GWYNOEDYL), Welsh saint of the 6th century, the founder of Llangwyodl, in Carnarvon. His festival is Jan. 1. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 236.)

[C. W. B.]

GWYNOG, Welsh saint. [GWYNNOG.]

GWYNWS, ST., the saint of Llanwnws in Cardigan in the 5th century. His festival and that of his brother Gwynau is Dec. 13. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 153.)

[C. W. B.]

GWYRAWM, clerical witness to grant by king Athrwys of Glamorgan, to bishop Cadward (Catgwaret), and the see of Llandaff (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 464.)

[J. G.]

GWYTHELIN. [GUITELIN.]

GWYTHENOC. [WINOC.]

GWYTHERIN, ST., Welsh saint of the 6th century, the founder of a church called Gwytherin, in Denbigh, at which St. Winifred was afterwards buried. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 275.) No feast day is assigned to him.

[C. W. B.]

GWYTHIANUS, ST., gives name to a parish on the north coast of Cornwall. He was one of the Irish saints who came over with St. Breaca (Vol. I. p. 333), and his oratory is buried in the sand, like the more famous oratory at Perran Zabuloe, the sand having very much encroached all along this coast, possibly in the 12th century. The parish feast is on the nearest Sunday to Nov. 1. The name Guoidiane occurs in the Breton Litany of the 10th century in Haddan and Stubbs ii. 82.

GYBRIAN. [GIBRIANUS.]

GYMNASIUS, a bishop who at the council of the Oak was the first to propose the deposition of Chrysostom. (Photius, Cod. 59, p. 60.)

[E. V.]

GYMNOPODAE, the name given by "Prae-destinatus" (68) to the EXCALCEATI of Philaster.

[G. S.]

GYNFARWY, Welsh saint. [CYNFARWY.]

GYNYR, of Caer Gawch, originally chieftain of Pebidiog, or Dewsland, Pembrokeshire, and afterwards enrolled among the saints of the Welsh church, which he enriched by his possessions, when he embraced the religious life. He first married Mechell daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, and then Anna daughter of Gwrthefyr Fendigaid or Vortimer; by the latter he had Gistlianus bishop of Menevia, Non mother of St. David, and Gwen mother of St. Cybi. He endowed the see of Menevia with his lands, to which the cathedral was transferred, and where the see of St. David's now has its episcopal seat, in Giraldus's Vallis Rosina [DAVID (5)]. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 162, 163; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 207; Leland, Collect. iii. 103.)

[J. G.]

GYBOINDUS, twenty-sixth bishop of Clermont, between St. Genesius and Felix. About A.D. 659 he subscribed a charter of Emmo archbishop of Sens for the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1171-1174; Gall. Christ. ii. 243.)

H

NOTE.—Reference should be made to the unaspirated form of any name which the reader may fail to find under this letter.

HABALAH, the name of one of the thirteen presbyters and confessors of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and likewise of a deacon and confessor in Persia, mentioned in the Syrian Martyrology (Wright's translation, Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 432.)

[G. T. S.]

HABERILLA (HABRILLA), Jan. 30, virgin honoured at Augia near Bregenz, on the lake of Constance. According to the Chronicon Constantiensis quoted by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1033), she was a recluse, whom St. Gall consecrated as abbess of the cell of Bregenz, of the order of St. Benedict. But nothing trustworthy is known of her. Her tomb in the church of the apostles Peter and Paul at Augia became celebrated for its miracles. [S. A. B.]

HABETDEUS (1), Donatist bishop of Aursalianae or Sulianae, in Byzacene, one of the assistant managers on the Donatist side in Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. In that capacity, on the third day, he read the document drawn up in reply to the one handed in by the Catholics on the first day. [DONATISM, Vol. I. 894.] (Aug. Brev. Co. 7. iii. 8, 10-14, and vol. ix. App. pp. 834-838; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 454, 554-563, ed. Oberthür; Gest. Coll. Carth. pp. 228, 286, in Migne, Pat. Lat. xi. 1228, 1343 B.) [H. W. P.]

HABETDEUS (2), a Donatist deacon of Carthage, who appears to have been employed by Primianus, his bishop, at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, especially on the first day, to recognise and identify the bishops of his party as they appeared before the president, and sometimes to account for their absence. The part which he took in discharge of this duty excited the indignation of Fortunatianus, bishop of Sicca Veneria [FORTUNATIANUS (4)], who complained that as a deacon he was overstepping his position, and taking on himself duties which belonged to a bishop; but the president overruled the objection, pointing out that in doing this he was acting only as a witness, and not as a member of the assembly. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 405, 406, 422, ed. Oberthür; Gest. Coll. Carth. p. 270 in Pat. Lat. xi.) [H. W. P.]

HABETDEUS (3), Donatist bishop of Marazana, Marazania, or Maraziana, a town of Byzacene, between Sufes and Aquae Regiae (Haouch Sultani) (Ant. Itin. 47, 4), who at the Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, when Eunomius the Catholic bishop asserted that there were no Donatists in Marazana, replied by complaining that both his own predecessor and the Donatist congregation there had been expelled by force, and that he himself had been forcibly prevented from entering the place. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 213; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 415, 416, ed. Oberthür; Gest. Coll. Carth. p. 270 in Pat. Lat. xi. 1305 A.) [H. W. P.]

HABETDEUS (4), bishop of Theudale, in Proconsular Africa, banished by Genseric c. A.D. 457. He has been supposed to have retired to Italy, and to have been identical with Habetdeus bishop of Luna. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 313.) [R. S. G.]

HABETDEUS (5), supposed bishop of Luna (Luni) in Etruria in the 5th century. It is said that, during the Vandal persecution in Africa, having strongly opposed Arianism, he was banished, then recalled and forcibly rebaptized in the Arian manner, and afterwards put to death, in consequence of his continued resistance. It is much more probable, however, that he was an African bishop, who suffered martyrdom either in Africa from the Vandals, or, as a refugee in Italy, from the Arian Goths. (Boll. Acta SS. 17 Feb. iii. 15; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 834; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 427.) [R. S. G.]

HABETDEUS (6), bishop of Tamalluma in Byzacene, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484, having previously suffered much persecution from the Arians. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 303.) [R. S. G.]

HABIBUS (1), martyr. [HIPPARCHUS.]

HABIBUS (2) (ABIBUS), deacon, martyr at Edessa in the reign of Licinius. He is mentioned in the Basilian Menologium, Nov. 15, in association with the martyrs Gurias and Samonas, who belonged to that day and in whose tomb he was laid, and at Dec. 2 he has a separate notice. Simeon Metaphrastes in his lengthened account of those two martyrs (the Latin in Surius, de Prob. Hist. SS. 15 Nov. p. 342, the Latin and Greek in Patrol. Gr. cxvi. 141) similarly embodies the history of Habib. Assemani notices him in his Bibl. Orient. (i. 330, 331) from Metaphrastes, but not in his Acta Martyrum. In recent years the original Syriac account of Habib which Metaphrastes abridged has been discovered, and in 1864 it was edited by Dr. Wright with a translation by Dr. Cureton (Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 72, notes p. 187). The Syrian author, whose name was Theophilus, professes to have been an eyewitness of the martyrdom (which he places on Sept. 2) and a convert. The ancient Syrian Martyrology, another discovery of recent years translated by Dr. Wright (Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 429), likewise commemorates Habib on Sept. 2. Theophilus, who is minute in dates, and copious in his notes of time, relates that in the month of Ab (i.e. August) in the year 620 of the kingdom of Alexander of Macedon, in the consulate of Licinius and Constantine, in the days of Conon bishop of Edessa, the emperor commanded that the altars of the gods should be everywhere repaired, that sacrifices and libations should be offered, and that the people should burn incense to Jupiter. Upon the appearance of this edict Habib, a deacon of the village of Telzeha, went about privately among the churches and villages encouraging the Christians. No penalty was at first announced for refusing compliance with the edict; the Christians were more numerous than their persecutors, and word had reached Edessa that even Constantine "in Gaul and Spain" had become Christian and did not sacrifice. Habib's proceedings were reported to Licinius, who sentenced him, as one directly and actively opposing his commands, to die by fire. When this news reached Edessa Habib was some fifty miles off at Zeugma, secretly encouraging the Christians in that city, and as he was not to be found at Telzeha his family and friends there were arrested. Hearing of this, Habib proceeded to Edessa and presented himself privately to Theotecnus the head of the governor's household. This official desired to save Habib, and pressed him to depart without divulging the visit, assuring him that his family and friends would soon be released. Habib, however, believing that cowardice would endanger his eternal salvation persisted in the surrender, and was accordingly led before the governor. On refusing to sacrifice he was imprisoned, tortured, and finally committed to the fire, but not before he had at great length uncompromisingly exposed the sin and folly of idolatry. The day of his imprisonment was the emperor's festival, and on the second of Iul (September) he suffered. His dying prayer was—"O king Christ for thine is this world and thine is the world to come, behold and see that while I might have been able to flee from these afflictions I did not flee, in order that I might not fall into the hands of Thy justice. Let therefore this fire in which I am to be burned be for a recompense before Thee, so that I may be delivered from that fire which is not quenched; and receive Thou my spirit into Thy presence through the Spirit of thy Godhead, O glorious Son of the adorable Father." The Christians buried his ashes in the tomb of the martyrs Gurias and Samonas on the hill Baith Allah Cucla, upon which spot in the 4th century a church was erected in their honour. It was the sixth day of the week and the second of Ilul when Habib was buried. "On that day," proceeds Theophilus, "it was heard how Constantine the Great had begun to depart from the interior of Spain in order to proceed to Rome, the city of Italy, that he might carry on the war against Licinius; and lo, the countries are in commotion, because no man knoweth which of them will be victorious and continue in the power of the empire."

The year of the martyrdom is given by Baronius, who had only the narrative of Metaphrastes to guide him, as A.D. 316 (A. E. ann. 316, xlviii.). Assemani (Bibl. Or. i. 331) with the same materials decides for 323. The details of Theophilus might seem sufficient to settle the point; but if his era is that of the Seleucidae, the second of Ilul, 620, was Friday Sept. 2, A.D. 309, a year inconsistent with the chronology of Licinius, who did not become master of the East until 313. The date therefore is still a difficulty. In illustration of the other notes of time furnished by Theophilus we may state that the emperors Constantine and Licinius were consuls together in 312, 313, 315; in 319 Constantine and young Licinius Caesar were consuls, and according to one authority in 320 (Clinton, F. R. i. 372). The emperors were at war in 314 and 323. Conon bishop of Edessa was living in 313, according to the Chronicle of Edessa (Assem. Bibl. Or. i. 330; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 955). Friday Sept. 2 occurred in 315, 320. On June 13, 313, Licinius published the Edict of Milan at Nicomedia. Upon the whole, the history of the times and especially the alteration of Licinius's conduct on the question of the Christian religion cir. 321, makes the later date preferable if other difficulties can be overcome. [C. H.]

HABIBUS (3), Dec. 29, martyr in Persia under Sapor II. A.D. 327, with Jonas, Brichjesus, and eight others in the city of Beth-asa. (Assem. Acta SS. Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 215.) [G. T. S.]

HABIBUS (4) (ABIBOS, ABIB, AVIV), Nov. 29, bishop of Necres in Georgia, and martyr under the Persians cir. 550. He was one of the thirteen fathers from Syria who came to revive the faith among the Georgians. [IBERIAN CHURCH.] (Malan, Hist. of Georg. Church, 51, 57.) [G. T. S.]

HABITUS, bishop of Urçi (Almeria) from before 688 until after 693, subscribed the acts of the fifteenth (A.D. 688) and sixteenth (693) councils of Toledo. He was the last bishop of the see before the Mohammedan invasion. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. viii. 224.) [INDALECIUS.] [M. A. W.]

HABRILIA, virgin. [HABERILLA.]

HACCA. (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 58.) [ACCA.]

HACONA, abbat. [HAGONA.]

HADALINUS, Feb. 3, confessor, A.D. 690. A monk and missionary from Aquitaine, who preached and founded a monastery in Belgium. (Acta SS. Boll. Feb. i. 372-377; Mabillon, Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. vi. 1013.) [S. A. B.]

HADDA, a Mercian abbat who attests the forged charter of Medeshamstede, purporting to be granted by Caedwealha, Sighere, Swebheard, Wihtrred and Ethelred. (Kemble, C. D. 40; M. A. Angl. i. 384.) [S.]

HADDE, a West Saxon abbat, whose name is appended as a witness to the charter of Coinred of Wessex to the Tisbury charter in 759. (Kemble, C. D. 104.) [S.]

HADDI (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 48, A.D. 701), bishop. [HEDDA (1).] [C. H.]

HADECERDITAE. [ADECERDITAE.]

HADELOGA (ADALOGA), ST., said to have been the first abbess of the nunnery of Kissingen in the 8th century. According to an anonymous life published by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. i. 306), and attributed to the 12th century, she was the daughter of Charles Martel and Kunehildis. So renowned were her beauty and virtue that kings, princes and nobles came to woo her from Britain, Pannonia and Greece. But from her earliest years she had resolved to consecrate her virginity to God, and, in spite of her father's anger, rejected all her suitors. Her meekness under persecution enlisted the sympathy of all the court, and especially of one of the royal chaplains. Accused to the king by malicious tongues of shameless commerce with him, she was expelled in his company from the court. The chaplain, who was possessed of some wealth, built a nunnery and bought some land for its endowment. Here he collected a few nuns, over whom he set Hadeloga as abbess, and instituted the rule of St. Benedict. The place was called Kitzingen, or Kissingen, from Kuccingus, a shepherd. In time, the king, hearing of the sanctity of her life, and filled with compunction for his unjust suspicion, visited her, and enriched the foundation with lands and property. The nuns became numerous, and a congregation of monks was instituted hard by. She ruled her nunnery prosperously for many years, and at last, worn out with self-inflicted privation, died Feb. 2, the day of her commemoration, and was buried at Kissingen before the altar of St. Mary amid universal grief.

The credibility of this somewhat late history is affected by the statement in Othlons's Vita Bonifacii (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 646-7), to the effect that Boniface established St. Tecla, or Thecla, at Kissingen. Attempts have been made to reconcile the two accounts. Some have supposed the two names to have denoted the same person, others, as the later Bollandists (Oct. vii. 62), that Hadeloga was the first and Tecla the second abbess, but no satisfactory explanation has been given (cf. Retzberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 334-5).

The Bollandists also publish from two MSS. of the Carthusian foundation at Würzburg an Elogium of her virtues, written by an anonymous author at the request of the nuns of Kissingen (Acta SS. Feb. i. 944-58). [S. A. B.]

HADES. [DEATH AND THE DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY.]

HADO (ADO), thirty-sixth archbishop of Chartres, between Leobertus and Flavinus, in the first half of the 8th century. He is said to have instituted canons in the place of monks in the cathedral church (Gall. Christ. viii. 1102). [S. A. B.]

HADOINDUS (HADUINDUS, CHADOINUS, CADUINDUS, CHADAENUS, HARDUINUS, CLODAENUS) ST., thirteenth bishop of Le Mans, St. Bertramnus, and St. Berarius, was present at the council summoned by Sonnatius at Rheims in A.D. 625, and was represented by Chagnoaldus, an abbat, at that of Châlons held about 650. His name is contained in many documents admitted to be forgeries. His will, however, is genuine. It is to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 567, Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1142, Vetera Analecta, p. 267, and Bar. Annales, an. 652, n. xiv. It was dictated to his deacon Cadulphus, in the fifth year of the reign of Clovis II. (A.D. 642). He makes the church of Le Mans his heir, and leaves to it the dispensation of his other bequests to churches and monasteries. In 630 he had founded the monastery of Ebroium (Notre Dame d'Evron). His death is placed about the year 652, and he was commemorated Jan. 20. The Bollandists publish his Gesta from an old MS. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1140), but they are historically worthless. (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 5; Patr. Lat. cxxxv. 102; Mansi, Conc. x. 1194; Gall. Christ. xiv. 349; Gesta Pontificum Cenoman. c. xii.; Mabill. Vetera Analecta, p. 264, Paris, 1723.) [S. A. B.]

HADRIANISTAE. The title ADRIANISTAE occurs in an enumeration by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 1) of short-lived heretical sects, the origin of which he ascribes to Simon Magus; and in the preface to his second book, Theodoret includes in a list of heretics Adrianus, no doubt the supposed founder of this sect. But Valois has pointed out that Theodoret got the name from a corrupt reading in his copy of Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22). In an enumeration of heretical sects there quoted from Hegesippus, the followers of MENANDER are mentioned ἀπὸ τοῦτων Μενανδριανιστῶν. Nicephorus (H. E. iv. 7) reproduces the passage with the reading ἀπὸ τοῦτων μὲν Ἀδριανιστῶν, and the reading Adrianistae is still found in several MSS. of Eusebius. There can be no doubt that Theodoret so read, and that thus he obtained the name. [G. S.]

HADRIANUS (1), PUBLIUS AELIUS (117-137). The early life and the general policy of this emperor may be compressed for our present purpose within comparatively narrow limits. Born in A.D. 76, and placed at the age of ten, on his father's death, under the guardianship of his cousin, Ulpius Trajanus, afterwards emperor, he was conspicuous in his youth for his study of Greek literature, and entered on his career as military tribune in Lower Moesia in A.D. 95. On the death of Nerva in A.D. 97, Trajan, whom he had adopted, became emperor, and Hadrian, on whom he bestowed such favours that men looked for a formal adoption, served in various capacities in the wars with the Dacians, Pannonians, Sarmatians, and Parthians. During the campaign against the last-named enemy, Trajan, leaving him in command of the army and of the province of Syria, started for Rome, but died at Selinus in Cilicia in A.D. 117. Hadrian, on hearing of his death, had himself proclaimed emperor by the army, communicated the election to the senate, and in due course received their formal sanction.

The external policy of Hadrian was marked by the abandonment of any idea of extending the eastern frontier of the empire. The Euphrates was recognised as a natural boundary in that direction, and the emperor, after suppressing a real or alleged conspiracy at Rome by the execution of four men of consular rank, and gaining popular favour by gladiatorial games, large donations, and the remission of fifteen years' arrears of taxes due to the state,^a devoted himself in A.D. 120 to a personal inspection of the provinces of the empire, which was prolonged for several years. In that and the following year he visited Gaul, Germany, and Britain, erecting fortresses and strengthening the defences of the frontiers. The Roman wall carried from the Solway to the mouth of the Tyne remains as a memorial of his activity in the last-named province. Possibly also we may find traces of the eclectic tendency of his mind and his readiness to adopt foreign forms of worship in the altars dedicated to Mithras, and to an otherwise unknown goddess named Conventina or Conventina, which have recently been found in the neighbourhood of one of the stations near the Wall not far from Hexham.^b In A.D. 122 he came to Athens, and found the eager speculative activity of the place so congenial to his taste that it was henceforth his favourite residence, and his love for making experiments, as it were, in different forms of worship led him to seek initiation in the Eleusinian mysteries (A.D. 125). The next four or five years were spent in the same restless travelling and insatiable desire to see all remarkable places. He ascended Aetna, he returned to Athens, he went up the Nile. The death, probably the self-sought death, of his favourite Antinous, a Bithynian page of great beauty and genius, in the last-named journey plunged him into as deep a grief as his nature was capable of, and he sought to console himself by surrounding the memory of his minion with the divine honours which had been paid to emperors.^c Constellations were named after him in the heavens, cities dedicated to him on earth. Incense was to be burnt in his honour, and the art market was flooded with statues and busts representing his exceeding beauty. The new form of worship thus introduced probably did much to alienate the better class of minds that were halting between two opinions. The apotheosis of such an one as Antinous was the reductio at once ad absurdum and ad horribile of the decayed and putrescent polytheism of the empire. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8; Justin, Apol. i. 39.) Shortly afterwards the state of affairs in Palestine called for the emperor's serious attention, and, as connected with the history both of the Jewish and the Christian churches, may be dealt with here with somewhat greater fulness than his general administration of the empire. Disturbances which had threatened the tranquillity of Judaea at the beginning of his reign had been repressed by Martius Turbo, and for fifteen years they were not renewed. His coins and medals bore the inscription of "Tellus stabili." In A.D. 131, however, the emperor began to execute the plan, conceived earlier in his reign, of transforming Jerusalem into a Roman colonia, and rebuilding it under the title of Aelia Capitolina, the first word commemorating the gens to which the emperor belonged, the second its consecration to the Capitoline Jupiter. At first the proposal was received tranquilly. The work of rebuilding was placed in the hands of a Jew, Aquila of Pontus (the reader will note the coincidence of name and country with those of the preacher of Acts xviii. 2); the great rabbi Akiba was on friendly terms with Rufus, the emperor's representative, and the Jews even ventured to petition for permission to rebuild their Temple. They were met with what must have seemed to them a studied indignity, and a plough was drawn over the site of the sacred place in token of its desecration. The city was filled with Roman emigrants, and Jews were forbidden to enter the city of their fathers, with the solitary exception, granted as if in bitter irony, that they might on the anniversary of the capture of the city by Titus come to bewail their fate within its gates. On one of the gates of the new Aelia the figure of the unclean beast in marble sent a shudder through any Jew who approached the walls. The feelings of Christians were in like manner outraged by seeing a statue

^a One of the two reliefs discovered in 1872, and now standing at the N.W. entrance of the Roman forum, may, perhaps, represent the destruction of the documents which were the legal proofs that the arrears were due. They are referred by Dr. Hertzsen in a paper read before the German Archaeological Society at Rome to a like remission on the part of Trajan.

^b See the account of this discovery in a paper by Mr. Clayton in the Transactions of the Newcast. & Archaeological Society for 1875. Some archaeologists are inclined to see in Conventina a Latinized form of the name of some British goddess. The fact that Hadrian when in Spain, made his visit memorable by summoning a conventus of all the Romans who resided there makes it, perhaps, more probable that the mysterious name indicates that the goddess was the idealized and personified guardian of such a conventus held in Britain.

^c The death of Antinous was enveloped in a mysterious darkness. According to some accounts he was drowned accidentally. Other rumours reported that he had sought a voluntary death in order to avert a predicted disaster from his master; or that Hadrian had sacrificed him, with his own consent, in order that he might practise the form of augury known as extispicium (the scrutiny of the viscera of the victim), and so penetrate the secrets of the future. It is not necessary to examine here the evidence in favour of these conflicting statements. The fact that the last gained currency is, however, characteristic of the popular belief as to Hadrian's restless and feverish superstition. See an elaborate discussion of the whole question in a paper on Antinous, by Mr. J. A. Symonds, in the Cornhill Magazine for February 1872. The extispicium appears again, it may be noted, in the case of ELAGABALUS.

of Jupiter on the site of the Resurrection and one of Venus on that of the Crucifixion. Trees and statues were placed on the platform of the Temple, and a grove in honour of Adonis was planted near the cave of the Nativity at Bethlehem. The persistent defiance of national feeling thus displayed roused a wide-spreading indignation, which, after smouldering for a time, burst out under a leader whom we know only by his assumed name of Bar-Cochba, the son of a star. The choice of the name was probably determined by the imagery of the prophecy of Balaam in Num. xxiv. 17, possibly also by the recollection of the "star in the east," of Matt. ii. 2. The man himself is described by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 3) as being of the Barabbas type, a murderer and a robber (φονικὸς καὶ ληστρικός), but he was recognised by Akiba, the leading rabbi of the time, as the Messiah, obtained possession of fifty fortresses and 985 villages, and established himself in the stronghold of Bethera, between Caesarea and the old town of Lydda, which, like Jerusalem, had been rebuilt and renamed by Hadrian as Diospolis. The Christians of Palestine, true to the apostolic precept of submission to the powers that be, took no part in the insurrection, and were accordingly persecuted by the rebel leader, and offered the alternative of denying the Messiahship of Jesus or the penalty of torture and of death (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8). Severus was recalled from Britain, the rebellion was suppressed with a strong hand, and edicts of extremest stringency were issued against the Jews, forbidding them to circumcise their children, to keep the Sabbath or to educate their youth in the study of the law. Akiba died in tortures under the hands of the executioner, and the prohibition of instruction in the law led to the formation of a secret school, continuing the rabbinic traditions, at Lydda. (Jost, Judenthum, ii. 7.) To the Christian church in Judaea, the suppression of the Bar-Cochba revolt and the generally tolerant spirit of the emperor brought a relief by which they were glad to profit. They left Pella, where they had taken refuge during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and returned to the holy city under its new name. Their return was marked by a change in the character of the community. The succession of fifteen bishops, all Hebrews, and belonging to the church of the circumcision, came to an end, and the mother-church of the world found itself under the care of a gentile bishop. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 5.)

In his general treatment of the Christians of the empire, Hadrian followed in the footsteps of Trajan. The more cultivated members of the church felt in addressing the tolerant, eclectic, enquiring emperor, "curiositatum omnium explorator,"^d as Tertullian calls him (Apol. c. 5), that they had a chance of a favourable hearing, and the age of apologists began. Quadratus, according to one tradition [but see QUADRATUS], bishop of Athens in A.D. 126, and famed as possessing prophetic gifts (Euseb. H. E. iii. 37, iv. 3), presented his Apologia, laying stress on the publicity of the works of Christ, and appealing to the testimony of eye-witnesses who were even then surviving. Aristides, a philosopher of the same city, followed, and addressed (A.D. 133) a treatise to the emperor, which was extant and admired in the time of Jerome, in defence of the Christians, and was said even to have been admitted to a personal hearing. [ARISTIDES.] Early in his reign, but probably after receiving these apologies, an Asiatic official of high character, Serenus Granianus, applied to him for instructions as to the treatment of the Christians of that province, complaining that their enemies expected him to condemn them without even the formality of a trial. The result was that the emperor addressed an official letter to Minucius Fundanus, proconsul of Asia, regulating the mode of procedure against the persecuted sect. No encouragement was to be given to common informers (συκοφάνται) or to popular clamour. If the official persons of the district (ἐραρχισταί) were confident that they could sustain a prosecution, the matter was to be investigated in due course. Offenders against the laws were to be punished according to the measure of their guilt, but, above all things, the trade of the informer was to be checked (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8, 9). The character of Hadrian's mind may be inferred from what has been stated as to the policy of his government. He had not the zeal of a persecutor, he was not influenced by the fear that leads to cruelty. His philosophy and his religion did not keep him from the infamy of an impure passion of the basest type. He adapted himself without difficulty to the worship and the thoughts of the place in which he found himself. At Rome he maintained the traditional sacred rites which had had their origin under the republic, and posed as the patron of Epictetus and the Stoicism which was identified with his name. At Athens he was initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries, and rose to the dignity of an Epoptes in the order, as brought within the circle of its most esoteric teaching. He became an expert in the secrets of magic and astrology. To him, as he says in his letter to Servianus, describing the character of his Egyptian subjects, the worshippers of Serapis and of Christ stood on the same footing. Rulers of synagogues, Christian bishops, Samaritan teachers, were all alike trading on the credulity of the multitude (Flavius Vopiscus, Saturn. c. 7, 8). According to the statement of Lampridius, one of the later writers of the history of the emperors (in Alexand. Sever. c. 43), the wide eclecticism of his nature led him at one time to erect temples without statues, which were intended to have been dedicated to Christ. He was restrained, it was reported, by oracles, which declared that, if this were done, all other temples would be deserted, and the religion of the empire subverted. The testimony of Lampridius as to the fact that temples such as he describes, known as Hadrian's, existed in his time may be received without much hesitation, but the absence of contemporary evidence of such an intention, on which it would have been natural for the Christian apologists of his own reign, or those of his successors, to lay stress, compels us to reject his explanation of the fact as an unauthenticated conjecture. The more probable solution of the problem is that adopted by Casaubon (Annot. in Lamprid. c. 43), that the temples in question were built by Hadrian, but not formally dedicated, and that they were intended ultimately to be consecrated to himself. So the imperial Sophist—the term is used of Hadrian by Julian (ut supra)—passed through life, "holding no form of creed and contemplating all," and the well-known lines—

"Animula, vagula, blandula,
Hospes, comesque corporis,
Quae nunc abibis in loca,
Pallidula, rigida, nudula?
Nec, ut soles, dabis jocos."

show that the same dilettante spirit was with him to the last.

It lay in the nature of the case that a reign like that of Hadrian was on the whole favourable to the growth of the Christian church. The popular cry, "Christianos ad leones," was hushed, and no organized persecution took its place. The appearance of an apologetic literature was a sign that the disciples of Jesus made their appeal with confidence to the intellect and judgment of mankind. The frivolous eclecticism of the emperor and yet more his deification of Antinous were enough to shake the allegiance of all serious minds to the older system. The succession of bishops in all the great centres of the church's life went on without the interruption of martyrdom or imprisonment. The tolerance, which was favourable to the growth of the good seed was also, however, equally favourable to that of the tares; and it is to the reign of Hadrian that we have to trace the rise and growth of the chief Gnostic sects of the 2nd century, the followers of SATURNINUS in Syria, of BASILIDES, CARPOCRATES, and VALENTINUS in Egypt, of MARCION in Pontus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 7, 8). (Compare, in addition to the authorities cited, Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chap. iii.; Milman, History of Christianity, b. ii. c. vi.; Lardner, Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, chap. xi.) [E. H. P.]

HADRIANUS (2), servant of Hilarion the hermit. He brought to his master, then in the oasis west of Egypt, the news of the death of Julian; but he afterwards proved unfaithful, and is recorded to have died of the Morbus Regius. (Jerome, Vit. Hilarionis § 34, Opp. vol. ii. p. 34, ed. Vall.) [H. W. F.]

HADRIANUS (3), rector patrimonii under Gregory the Great in Sicily. He is generally addressed as "notarius;" he is once spoken of as "chartularius." When he was at Palermo,

* Prior's version is familiar to most readers. The following is from a less-known writer:

"Poor soul of mine, who canst not rest,
Fluttering still within my breast;
Of the body mate and guest,
Whither bound art thou?
Pallid, bare, and shivering left,
Of thy wonted mirth bereft,
Jests are done with now."

Gregory wrote to him that the husband of a certain Agathosa, who had become a monk, was to be restored to her even if he had received the tonsure, for no man may leave his wife without her consent, except for the cause of fornication. In another letter, Gregory praised him "quod quosdam incantatores et sortilegos fueris insecutus." Hadrian was transferred from the estates of Palermo to be rector patrimonii of those of Syracuse. For the papal estates in Sicily, and the system of papal officials, see Carl Hegel, Städteverfassung von Italien, i. 162. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xi. indict. iv. 50. 53, lib. xiii. indict. vi. 18, in Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 1169-1171, 1273.) [A. H. D. A.]

HADRIANUS (4), bishop of Thebæ Phthioticæ in Thessaly on the Pelasgic gulf, whose condemnation both by John of Justiniana Prima on a charge of peculation, and by John of Larissa his metropolitan, on a criminal charge, gave an opportunity to pope Gregory I. to interfere. When Hadrian appealed, the matter was carried to Rome, and Gregory revoked the sentence of deprivation from the priesthood pronounced against him, and ordered John of Larissa, if he had any suit against Hadrian, either to conduct it before the pope's agents (responsales) at Constantinople, or to bring it to Rome (Ep. iii. 6 and 7). The emperor Maurice, A.D. 582-602, ignored the interference of Gregory, and directed Hadrian's appeal to be heard by the bishop of Corinth, by whose efforts a reconciliation was effected between Hadrian and his metropolitan. Gregory sent a deacon to watch the proceedings, lest, he said, there be any pecuniary corruption between the two parties. (Epist. iii. 39; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 121.) [L. D.]

HADRIANUS (5), bishop of Regium Lepidi, (Reggio in Lombardy), between Donodeus and Benenatus, his period being cir. A.D. 600, judging from his place on the list. (Ugh. Ital. Sac. ii. 243; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 361, 397.) [C. H.]

HADRIANUS (6), bishop of Rieti, signing the epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Mansi, xi. 303; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

HADRIANUS (7), second bishop of Numana, Humana, or Umana, signing the epistle of pope Agatho in 680. (Ugh. Ital. Sac. i. 743; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vii. 79, 191.) [C. H.]

HADRIANUS (8) I., bishop of Rome from Feb. 9, 772, to Dec. 25, 795, during twenty-three years, ten months, and seventeen days. He is said by Anastasius to have been a Roman of noble race, son of one Theodorus, and of "elegant" personal appearance. Left an orphan early in life, he had been educated under the care of Theodatus (or Theodulus), a distinguished Roman, and shewn signs of precocious piety, had been noticed on this account, and ordained subdeacon, by pope Paulus, and deacon by Stephanus III., whom he succeeded in the see after a vacancy of seven days. On the very day of his accession he is said to have released and recalled all who had been sentenced to prison or exile by Paulus. Afiarta the chamberlain, at the close of the late pope's reign. These were probably the partisans of the Franks, whose support Hadrian ever zealously courted. The Lombard king, Desiderius, had, at the time of Hadrian's accession, invaded the exarchate of Ravenna, which the Frank king, Pippin, had in 755 conquered and bestowed upon the pope. Pippin was now dead, having left his kingdom divided between his two sons, Carloman and Charles (Charlemagne). The former, dying in 771, had left Charles sole king, who had thereupon repudiated the daughter of Desiderius, whom, in the previous year, his mother Bertrada had, for reasons of policy, induced him to marry. The two young sons of Carloman, with their mother, had fled to the Lombard king for protection, and were now with him. Under these circumstances Desiderius was anxious to get these two youths anointed by the new pope as kings of the Franks, and so divide the house of Charlemagne by setting up a rival branch. With this view he at once sent an embassy to Hadrian, promising him restitution of his rights in the exarchate, if he would come to him for a personal interview. But against all such overtures Hadrian stood firm; and, having continued to insist on the restitution to the see of Rome of all that Pippin's donation had included, he sent by sea (the passages of the Alps being occupied by the Lombards) an embassy to implore the aid of Charles, who in 773 assembled his forces at Geneva for an invasion of Italy. In the meantime, Desiderius had prepared to besiege Rome, and Hadrian to defend it resolutely; but the former had been diverted from his attempt by a sentence of excommunication in case of his continuing it, sent to him through three bishops by the pope. The passes of the Alps having been for some time successfully defended by the Lombards against Charles, a sudden panic, attributed to the interposition of heaven, caused their retreat. Desiderius retired to Pavia, which was blockaded by the Franks; his son Adalgisus, with the widow and sons of Carloman, took refuge in Verona, which was taken by Charles, after a siege lasting from June to October. Other cities nearer Rome now submitted themselves to the pope. The people of the duchy of Spoleto are especially said by Anastasius to have sued to be subject to the see of Rome, to have sworn fealty in St. Peter's, and Hildebrand, selected by them, to have been made their duke by Hadrian. Pavia, where Desiderius was, continued to hold out, and was not reduced till after the Easter of 774, when Charles returned to it after spending that festival in Rome, whither he had gone, accompanied by his queen Hildegard, who had joined him in Italy, and had been enthusiastically received. Anastasius (Vit. Hadr.) gives a long account of the proceedings. Hadrian, on hearing of his unexpected approach, caused all the judges of Rome to meet him nearly thirty miles from the city; and at a mile's distance he was received and escorted by the Roman militia, and children carrying olive branches, and singing in his praise. Early next day, which was Easter eve, the pope himself received him in St. Peter's. On reaching the steps leading up the church the king knelt and kissed each step as he ascended. At the door of the church the two potentates embraced, and proceeded hand in hand, while the choir sung "Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini," to the tomb of St. Peter, where they prostrated themselves together, and returned thanks. After solemn services in various churches during the Easter festival, and suitable entertainments, it was on Wednesday in Easter week, in the church of St. Peter, that the memorable event of this visit of Charlemagne to Rome took place. In the presence of the clergy and notables of Rome, Hadrian reminded the king of the donation of his father Pippin to St. Peter and his vicars for ever, the promise of which had been assented to by himself and his brother Carloman at Carasium (Chiersi), and admonished him to confirm it; whereupon the king, having caused the engagement entered into at Chiersi to be read, ordered a new instrument of donation to be written, which he signed, and placed, first on the altar, and then on the tomb of St. Peter, having sworn to observe its conditions. The exact extent of territory assigned to the pope by this memorable donation, as well as that of the donation of Pippin, is uncertain, the original documents having perished, and contemporary writers giving us no certain information. Anastasius (in Vit. Hadr.) speaks of large additions to the exarchate of Ravenna, granted previously by Pippin, including Corsica, Istria, Venetia, and the dukedoms of Beneventum and Spoleum. It may be that the evidently exaggerated accounts given by him and others are partly due to a confusion between the "patrimony of St. Peter" in various countries and temporal dominion over them. The dukedom of Spoleum is indeed spoken of in one of Hadrian's letters (Cod. Carol. Ep. 58) as specifically made over to him, and, as has been seen, Anastasius tells us of its having already submitted to him. But, with this exception, and perhaps some other subsequent concessions, it was certainly the Greek exarchate, not the Lombard kingdom, of which a donation was made. Charles ever after styled himself "rex Francorum et Longobardorum," and was absolute in Northern Italy. The nature of the pope's temporal authority over the lands of the donation is also open to dispute. He assumed certainly all the rights of the former exarchs, and Hadrian, writing to Charles, speaks as possessing sovereign power in his own domains (Cod. Carol. Ep. 85); but Charles was still "patricius Romanorum," whatever the title implied, the pope claiming in distinction the "patriciatu b. Petri" (Cod. Carol. Ep. 85); Charles on being crowned emperor by Leo III. was adored by the pope and Roman people, as the Greek emperors had been by their subjects; Rome remained an imperial city (see Charles's will, in Vit. Car. M. per Einhard, c. 33); the popes afterwards had to swear fidelity to the Frank emperor; and it was not till the time of Innocent III. (1198) that the pope exacted from the praefectus Urbis the oath of allegiance formerly taken to the emperor.

In a subsequent letter from Hadrian to Charles (A.D. 777), an allusion has been supposed to the alleged donation of Constantine. (So De Marca, de Conc. Sac. et Imp. iii. 12, who supposes the document to have been already forged. Also Neander, Ch. Hist.) The words are: "Et sicut temporibus b. Sylvestri Rom. Pont. a sanctae recordationis piissimo Constantino M. Imperatore per ejus largitatem Sancta Dei catholica et apostolica Romana Ecclesia elevata atque exaltata est, et potestatem in his Hisperiae partibus largiri dignatus est; ita et in his vestris felicissimis temporibus atque nostris S. Dei Ecclesia, i.e. b. Petri apostoli, germinet atque exsultet:—quia ecce novus christianissimus Dei Constantinus Imperator his temporibus surrexit." But the allusion appears to be only to some fabulous acts of St. Sylvester, referred to by Hadrian also in his letter to the second Nicene council (Concil. Nicen. ii. act. ii.), though the language may have suggested the late forgery.

During the disputes about investiture it was maintained by the imperial party that, Charlemagne having returned to Rome after the reduction of Pavia, a synod was held in which Hadrian granted him the powers contended for. Thus in the Collectio Cann. tripartita, written in the time of Urban II., and in Ivo's decree (in Pertz, Monum. iv. ii. 160, note), "Carolus Romam reversus, constituit ibi synodum cum Adriano papa. Adrianus autem papa cum universa synodo tradiderunt Carolo jus et potestatem eligendi pontificem et ordinandi apostolicam sedem, dignitatem quoque patriciatu ei concesserunt. Insuper archiepiscopos, episcopos per singulas provincias ab eo investituram accipere diffiniverunt, et ut, nisi a rege laudetur et investiatu episcopus, a nemine consecratur. Et quicumque contra hoc decretum esset, anathematis eum vinculo innodaverunt, et, nisi resipisceret, bona ejus publicari praeceperunt." The same account was inserted (Pagi, Crit. iii. 343, shews it to be an interpolation) in the Auctarium Aquicenses of the Chronicle of Sigebert of Gemblours, A.D. 1113 (Pertz, Monum. vi. 393). It appears, too, in different words in a treatise composed A.D. 1109 at Naumburg by bishop Waltram or the abbat Conrad. But there is no early notice of any such synod, and Charles appears evidently to have gone straight to France from Pavia without returning to Rome:—"postquam vestra excellentia a civitate Papia in partes Franciae remeavit" (Ep. Hadr. ad Carol. M. Cod. Carol. Ep. 52). The fact, doubtless, was that Charles exercised the same rights in ecclesiastical affairs as he had always done in the empire of the Franks, and that it was not till a later age that the pope's concession of such rights was conceived as necessary (see Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. div. i. pt. ii. ch. ii. § 5 and § 6, and notes).

Charles having left Italy after his capture of Pavia and complete subjugation of Lombardy, and having taken Desiderius with him into France, Hadrian did not all at once enjoy his donation in peace. There are a number of letters addressed by him to Charles, in which he complains of Leo, archbishop of Ravenna, retaining cities in the exarchate on the plea that they had been granted to him by Charles; of the arrogance of Hildebrand, duke of Spoleum; and in one letter of the latter being engaged in a conspiracy with the dukes of Beneventum, Clusium (Chiusi), Forum Julii (Friuli), and ambassadors from Adalgisus (the son of Desiderius who had escaped to Constantinople), to attack Rome with Greek aid, and restore the kingdom of the Lombards. He repeatedly implores Charles to come again into Italy (Cod. Carol. Epp. 54, 58, 59). But the latter, engaged in his Saxon wars, contented himself with sending emissaries till, when in 775 Hrodgand, duke of Friuli, openly rebelled, he crossed the Alps and put down the rebellion, but did not on this occasion visit Rome (Annal.

Lawriss. ann. 775, 776). After this the pope continued to send letters of complaint: in one he complains of the duke of Chiusi, who had seized the patrimony of St. Peter in his dukedom, and frequently of the archbishop of Ravenna, whom he describes as defying St. Peter and himself in retaining territory included in the donation; and he repeatedly urges Charles to come to the rescue (Cod. Carol. Epp. 53, 60). At length, the Saxons being subdued and multitudes of them having been obliged to accept baptism, Charles, in 780, found leisure again to visit Italy, and spent the Christmas of that year at Pavia. He reserved his second visit to Rome for the Easter of 781, taking with him his queen Hildegard and two of his sons by her, Carloman and Lewis, with the intention that Carloman, born in 776, whose baptism had been deferred that he might receive it from the pope, should so receive it on Easter Eve. On his baptism he received the name of Pippin. The two children were also anointed and crowned by Hadrian, Pippin, the elder, as "rex in Italiam," Lewis as "rex in Aquitaniam" (Annal. Lauriss. et Einhardi). The pope's difficulties with regard to his temporal claims appear to have been settled during this visit; and in return he concurred with Charles, before the latter left Rome, in appointing two episcopal legates to act with those of the king in a mission to Tassilo, duke of Bavaria, who was wavering in his allegiance, sworn to Pippin and his successors. The mission, thus strengthened by spiritual authority, is said to have resulted in temporary success. (Annal. Lauriss. et Einhard.)

At the close of the year 786 Charles again crossed the Alps and, after spending Christmas in Florence, repaired without delay to Rome to take counsel with Hadrian. The purpose of this expedition was to crush a rebellion concocted by Arichis, duke of Beneventum, who, surprised by the sudden invasion, sent at once his eldest son, Romald, to Rome with rich presents, professing submission. But Charles, advised by the pope not to trust the duke, proceeded with his forces to Capua; on which Arichis, having left Beneventum and taken refuge in Tarentum, sent again to sue for mercy, offering both his sons, with others, as hostages. Charles, having accepted his submission, returned to Rome, where he again kept Easter (787) with his friend Hadrian joyfully. While he was still at Rome, the pope again endeavoured to aid his benefactor in differences that had again arisen between him and Tassilo of Bavaria. Ambassadors arrived from this duke to beg the pope's good offices with a view to peace. He accordingly interceded with the king, who expressed himself ready to come to terms; but, when the ambassadors pleaded want of authority for ratifying any terms proposed, Hadrian, moved to anger and convinced of their duplicity, brought forth his spiritual weapons, laying their master and his abettors under an anathema unless he rendered full obedience to Charles and his sons, and declaring the latter free from all guilt for the calamities of war that might ensue. The anathema however failed of its intended effect; for it was not till Charles had coerced him by war that Tassilo made the required submission, and was secluded in a monastery (Annal. Lauriss. et Einhard. et Vita Car. M. per Einhard.)

Not long after Charles had left Italy, Hadrian informed him by letter that Arichis had proved faithless; had made overtures to the Greek emperor, requesting for himself the dukedom of Naples and the patriciate, and offering allegiance to the emperor if the latter would send back Adalgisus, with a competent force, to re-establish the Lombard kingdom. Arichis, however, had died before the arrival of the emperor's reply, whereupon the scheme had been resorted to of requesting Charles to send home Grimoald (the son of Arichis, who had been taken as a hostage into France), the intention being to break out in rebellion, with the aid of the Greeks, on his arrival. The Neapolitans also were concerned in the conspiracy. Of all this Hadrian diligently informed Charles, requesting him to take measures of repression, and on no account to send back Grimoald. But Charles, with better policy as the event proved, allowed the heir to return, who, with Hildebrand of Spoletum, made common cause with a small Frank contingent, and defeated a Greek army under Adalgisus, which had landed in Calabria with the design of expelling the Franks from Italy. (Cod. Carol. Epp. 88, 90, 86; Annal. Lauriss. et Einhard. ad ann. 788; Vita Car. M. per Einhard.)

It remains to notice Hadrian's action in the controversy about image-worship. When Irene had resolved on a council for the restoration of the practice in the East, she sent a letter to the pope, in her son's name and her own, urgently requesting his personal attendance, and promising that he would be received and sent home with the utmost distinction (Conc. Nicen. ii. cap. iv. Labbe). He did not comply with this request, but sent two legates to represent him, Peter, archpresbyter of Rome, and Peter, abbat of St. Sabas, and with them a singularly long and verbose letter. After complimenting Irene and her son in the style of the period, comparing him (as he had before done Charlemagne) to Constantine, and her to Helena, and declaring that his joy at their intention to restore image-worship was such as words could not express, he supports the practice by long arguments from Scripture and tradition, which do not much commend the writer as a reasoner, or theologian, or accurate historian. The concluding part of his letter has reference to Tarasius, whom Irene had just made patriarch of Constantinople, as a fit instrument of her designs. He had been a layman when elected to the patriarchate, at which irregularity Hadrian expresses his wonder and disapproval, comparing it to the case of a man being made a general who had had no military experience; but he condones it on the understanding that the new patriarch would restore image-worship. Further, he complains strongly (as Gregory the Great had done in a similar case) of the title "universal" having been given to the new patriarch, and this especially on the ground that it seemed to imply superiority to Rome, "the head of all the churches," which, he says, would be plainly ridiculous. This latter part of the letter is suppressed in the Greek edition, not having been read with the rest before the council. To Tarasius himself (who, as usual, had, on his election, sent a confession of his faith to the pope) he wrote also in a similar strain, telling him that his acceptance of him as patriarch would depend on his zeal and success in getting image-worship restored. In both letters he sets forth more than once and strongly the paramount supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and his being (as he also often reminded Charlemagne) the representative of St. Peter, who has the keys of heaven (Concil. Nicen. act. ii.). The council, called the second Nicene or seventh Oecumenical, met at length on Sept. 24, 787, at Nice in Bithynia.

Undue importance has been attached to the question who presided at the council, whether the pope's legates or Tarasius. Whoever managed its proceedings, there is no doubt that at this time the pope's claim to take the lead in a general council was recognised in the East. His legates are mentioned first among those present at the closing session before Tarasius, and their names head the signatures.

An account of the decrees of the council confirming image-worship, and anathematizing its opponents, was sent by Tarasius to Hadrian, who accepted them. Charlemagne, however, and his divines, notwithstanding his great reverence for the pope, were not prepared to do so. He caused to be compiled the famous treatise called Libri Carolini, issued by him in his own name A.D. 790, in which the decrees of the second Nicene council are condemned, and the arguments advanced during its sittings refuted. These books find fault with the previous council (754) under Constantine Copronymus, in which images had been rejected altogether, as well as that under Irene, in which their adoration was enjoined. Their position is that such representations are allowable for commemoration and ornamentation, though all adoration of them is wrong. They allow also that the learned, being able to distinguish between the images themselves and that which is denoted by them, may possibly use them without offence, but contend that their abuse is inseparable from their use in the case of the vulgar. At the same time they allow of reverence paid to the relics of saints. Hadrian answered these books in a very long letter to Charles. He addresses him, as usual, in a tone of affection and respect, and seems to regard his purpose in transmitting the treatise to have been that of eliciting the judgment of the see of Rome rather than of expressing his own opinions. After setting forth, after his usual manner, the commission to St. Peter of "the keys of the kingdom of heaven and of the whole Church," and the transmission of his functions to his vicars, and after reminding Charles how his great worldly success had come of his attachment to St. Peter's see, and how his hopes of heaven depended on its continuance, he proceeds to answer one by one ("pro vestra melliflua regali dilectione") the objections of the Caroline books to the decisions of the council, and to the positions maintained during its deliberations. The only section of the treatise that he approves is the concluding one, in which a well-known letter from Gregory the Great to Serenus of Marseilles (Epp. Gregor. i. lib. 7, ep. 9) was adopted as expressing the true view. This section ("hoc sacrum et venerandum capitulum") is, he says, so different from the rest that he concludes it to be due to Charles's own "God-preserved and orthodox royal excellence ;"

and he endeavours to shew that the Nicene decrees were but a carrying out of the view of St. Gregory. In the end he makes a kind of apology for having so far fraternized with the emperor as to accept the council held under his auspices. At the beginning of his letter he had shewn similar uneasiness by disclaiming with an "absit" the intention of defending any man whatever (quemlibet hominem) in replying to the Caroline books, and before concluding he says in effect, "This council having rightly restored image-worship, I could not refuse to accept it, lest the Easterns should return to their heresy. But I have not yet written to the emperor on the subject. I am still much dissatisfied with him for not yet restoring portions of the patrimony of St. Peter which had been alienated by the Iconoclasts; and, if your God-protected royal excellence approves, I will admonish him to restore them, and, on this account, though not on the other, declare him a heretic if he refuses" (Epp. Hadr. ad Car. M. de imaginibus, post Act. Concil. Nicen. ii. Labbe). Neither the arguments nor the authority of Hadrian converted Charlemagne and his divines. In the year 794 was held the council of Frankfort, at which the pope was represented by two legates, Theophylact and Stephen, bishops. The primary object of the council was to condemn Adoptionism, i.e. the doctrine that Christ in His divinity was the natural Son of God, but in His humanity the adopted Son. It had been taught in Spain by Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, bishop of Urgel, and had penetrated into France. Felix had been made to recant before a synod at Ratisbon (792), and then before Hadrian at Rome, to whom he had been sent by Charles. Elipand having complained to Charles, the latter called the Frankfort synod, at which Adoptionism was unanimously condemned, a letter from the pope to the Spanish bishops on the subject having been read. The question of the second Nicene council was then introduced, and the result was that all adoration of the images of saints, such as that council have enjoined under anathema, was repudiated and condemned.* The legates of Hadrian are not said to have dissented from this canon, or he himself, notwithstanding his strong language on the subject at issue as against the Greeks, to have condemned the Franks. Image-worship continued to be rejected in the Frank empire through the 9th century without denunciation from Rome, and a synod at Paris (825) expressly condemned pope Hadrian himself for his action in the matter, saying among other things (as well might be said) that his letter to Irene and Constantine contained things "valde absona, et ad rem de qua agebatur minime pertinentia" (Mansi, Concil. xiv. 421D, who is the first to include this in his collection of councils).

* "Allata est in medium quaestio de nova Graecorum synodo, quam de adorandis imaginibus Constantinopoli fecerunt, in qua scriptum habebatur ut qui imaginibus sanctorum, ita ut deificae Trinitati, servitium aut adorationem non impenderent, anathema judicarentur. Qui supra sanctissimi patres nostri omnimodis adorationem et servitatem renuentes contempserunt, atque consentientes condemnauerunt. (Concil. Francos. can. ii.) Synodus etiam quae ante paucos annos in Constantinopoli sub Irene et Constantino filio ejus congregata, et ab ipsis non solum septima, verum etiam universalis erat appellata, ut nec septima nec universalis haberetur dicereturve, quasi supervacua in totum omnibus abdicata est. (Einhard, de Gestis Car. M. ad an. 794.) Pseudosynodus Graecorum, quam falso septimam vocabant, et pro adorandis imaginibus fecerunt, rejecta est a pontificibus." (Annal. Lauriss. ad an. 794.)

That the old cordiality between Charles and Hadrian had not been interrupted would appear from Einhard's account of the king's sorrow when he heard of the pope's death ("the decease of the Roman pontiff being announced to him, whom he held chief among his friends, he wept as if he had lost a son or a very dear brother") and also from the epitaph in Latin elegiacs, full of affection and respect, which Charles wrote, and had inscribed upon Hadrian's tomb. They were always fast allies and friends, and there were several reasons for their being so. In addition to personal regard and mutual respect, there was the deep religious reverence undoubtedly felt by Charles for the Roman see, which Hadrian lost no opportunity of fostering; and on both sides there were evident temporal advantages in their close alliance. To Charles it was of importance to have so great a spiritual potentate, owing his temporalities to himself, for an ally in Italy, while Hadrian clearly saw that from no earthly power could he get so much reverence, immunity, and temporal sway as from the generous and religious Charles. Zeal and pertinacity in contending for the temporal claims of St. Peter's see, and by the assertion of spiritual prerogative invoking temporal aid for their enforcement, are leading characteristics of Hadrian, as shewn by his letters. As has been intimated, he does not shine in the field of controversy; but there is no reason to doubt the account of him by Anastasius, confirmed by Charles's epitaph, that he was sincerely devout, and very liberal in his gifts for charitable and ecclesiastical purposes. Anastasius, in his life of him, goes at great length into his expenditure on churches and other works in Rome, in which undertakings he was aided by Charles, who, as his biographer Einhard tells us, sent him large gifts, gold, silver, and gems, for such purposes, having nothing more at heart than that the city of Rome should through his aid recover her ancient dignity, and the Church of St. Peter should be not only defended by him, but also adorned and enriched beyond all others.

There is extant a large collection of letters from Hadrian to Charlemagne preserved in the Codex Carolinus, some of which have been referred to above. A large proportion refer to political events in Italy, complaining of wrongs done to St. Peter's see, or of machinations against Charles, and often begging him to come to the rescue. In others he congratulates Charles on the subjugation and forced conversion of the Saxons; orders at his request litanies to be sung in celebration of these successes; directs how to deal with Saxon renegades from the faith; sends palli, and confirms metropolitan privileges, to the bishops of Rheims and of Bourges in Aquitania; grants a bishop of their own to the abbat and monks of St. Denys; undertakes, having been complained of to Charles, to control the irregularities of Lombard bishops, and to suppress simony; and finally denies Charles's claim to intervene in the election of archbishops of Ravenna; on one occasion thanks for the present of a cross; on another gives Charles marbles and mosaics from Ravenna, and on another the dead body of a martyr.

On the occasion of one of the visits of Charles to Rome (probably the first, A.D. 773) Hadrian gave him a collection of the canons of the church for his guidance in his own country, to which was prefixed an epistle in Latin verse (if verse it can be called) of which the first letters of the lines form the sentence, "Domino eccel. filio Carolo regi Hadrianus papa" (Labbe, viii. 583). Also, when Charles was at Rome (Easter, 787), he is said to have taken home with him, as a gift from the pope, the Antiphonary of St. Gregory, with musical notes inserted by the pope himself, together with two singing-masters, learned in Gregorian music, in order that the corrupt method of singing then prevalent in France might be reformed according to the ancient Gregorian use, which was retained at Rome. There had been, we are told, contentions between the French and Roman singers during the Easter services, the former saying that their own singing was the sweetest and the best, the latter defending their own style as orthodox Gregorianism. Charles, being referred to, decided in favour of the Roman use on the ground that the fountain must be purer than its stream, and accordingly took measures for having it taught and maintained in France, founding schools for the purpose with the assistance of the two Roman teachers, who also taught organ-playing (artem organandi). HADULFUS, ST., eleventh bishop of Cambrai and Arras, between Hunaldus and Trarvardus. He was, according to some, a son of St. Ragnulfus the martyr. He is said to have entered the monastery of St. Vaast (Vedasti) in early youth, and risen to be first prior and then abbat, in which office he succeeded St. Hatto, the first of the series. He died in the year 728 or 729, after ruling the monastery for nineteen years and the see for twelve. His tomb in the church of St. Peter, near the walls of his monastery, became famous from the numerous miracles said to have been worked there, and in the 10th century his remains were exhumed and elevated by one of his successors in the see named Enguerranus, or Engranus. His epitaph of four Latin lines in the church of St. Peter is preserved. He is commemorated May 19 and Aug. 31 (Gesta Pontificum Cameracensium, 34, 35, Migne, Patr.

HADUMARUS, bishop. [HATHUMARUS.]

HADWALD, a servant of Elfleda abbess of Whitby, circ. A.D. 685. He was killed by a fall from a tree, and St. Cuthbert is said to have seen angels bearing his soul to heaven at the very time of the accident. Cuthbert mentioned the circumstance to Elfleda, and on the following day the news of Hadwald's death was brought to her (Bed. Vita Cuth. c. 34).

[J. R.]

HADWIN, a bishop, consecrated in 768 to the see of Machui, or Mayo of the Saxons, on the west coast of Ireland. (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 663; Hoved. Chron. Ann. 768; tom. i. p. 9, ed. Stubbs.) He died in 773, when his successor Leuferth was consecrated (ib. 664).

HAEDDL, bishop of Wessex. [HEDDA (1).]

HAEHA, an abbat who attests the charter of Ine to Malmesbury dated May 26, 704. (Kemble, C. D. 50; W. Malmesb. G.P. lib. v. ed. Hamilton, p. 380; Ang. Sac. ii. 22.) Although the charter is a forgery, several of the abbats whose names are attached to it are historical persons, such as Wintra, Beornwald, and Aldhelm, so that Haeha also may be a real name.

HAEMATITAE (Αἱματῖται). An early heretical sect mentioned by Clement of Alexandria as deriving their name, like the Docetae, from the opinions which they held (Strom. vii. 17). What those opinions were, however, he does not say.

HAEMGILS, a monk mentioned by Bede. (H. E. v. 12.) He lived in the neighbourhood of the solitary Drycthelm, probably at Melrose, and was a priest. At the time Bede closed his history he was living as an anchorite in Ireland, and subsisting on bread and water. It was Haemgils who reported the visions of Drycthelm to Bede. His name appears among the anchorites in the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis, p. 6.

HAEMGILS, abbat of Glastonbury. [HEMGISLUS.]

HAEMORRHOISSA [VERONICA.]

HAERES (HERES) (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 631; Fabrizius, Bibl. Med. et Inf. Lat. lib. i. vol. i. p. 134, ed. 1754; Velser, Rerum Boic. p. 308, making haeres the Latin equivalent of the old German Aribo or Erbo), monk. [CYRINUS (2).]

[C. H.]

HAERHUNEN (HAERNUNEN), bishop of Menevia in the 8th century. (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 154; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 601.)

[J. G.]

HAESITANTES, the current rendering of ἡσυχασταί (Phot. cod. 24; Valesius, note 79 on Theodor. Lect., E. H. ii. 29, p. 578; Assem.

Bibl. Or. ii. § 4), those who held aloof from the council of Chalcedon. Timotheus the presbyter reckons up twelve various sects of these separatists, as Eutychianistae, Acephali, Julianistae, &c. (Timoth. Presb. de Recept. Haeret. p. 405, Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. 51; Leont. Byzant. de Sectis, act. vi. § 1, act. ix. Migne, u. s. 1234 B, 1259.)

[T. W. D.]

HAGIOCAUSTAE. The opponents of image-worship were so called. They were anathematized under that name by a synod convened at Jerusalem by Theodorus the patriarch, A.D. 726 (τῶν ἁγιοκαύστων αἵρεσις, Libell. Synod. ap. Mansi, xii. 272; Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 374).

[T. W. D.]

HAGONA (HAGUNA, HUGON, HAGONA), an abbat whose name appears among the signatures of charters of the last decade of the 7th century. He attests the grant of Oethilred to Barking (Kemble, C. D. 35; Mon. Angl. i. 439), the grant of Earconwald (Mon. Angl. i. 439), that of Ine to Malmesbury (spurious, K. C. D. 50), that of Caedwalha to Winchester (K. C. D. 894), and one of Nothelm of Sussex to Selsey (K. C. D. 995). Although most, if not all, of them are forgeries, the coincidence of the name seems to imply that some such person was known to tradition in the 10th century, and the charter of Oethilred may be genuine.

HALARNGEN (HAERNGEN), clerical witness to grant of the church of Ma Mouric, that is, Lann Vuien, to bishop Cadward (Catgwaret) and the see of Llandaff. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 460.)

[J. G.]

HAICO (NAICO), twenty-second bishop of Nantes, between Taurinus and Salapius, towards the middle of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 801.)

[S. A. B.]

HAIDO, bishop of Basle. [HETTO.]

HAIMO, ST. [HAYMO.]

HAINMARUS (AYMAR), twenty-sixth bishop of Auxerre, succeeding Savaricus. According to the annals of the see, he was of noble birth, and of possessions so extended that he became duke of nearly the whole of Burgundy. He followed Pippin upon two campaigns, first against Aimoin king of Saragossa, when, bringing up his forces after the battle had commenced, he decided the event for Pippin with great slaughter of the Saracens. In the second expedition, he assisted Pippin against Eudo duke of Aquitaine, who, from an ally on the former occasion, had been changed into a foe. The Aquitanians were defeated, but Eudo escaped, and it was suggested to Pippin by the bishop's enemies that it was not without his connivance. He was accordingly imprisoned at Bastogne (Bastonia villa) in the Ardennes. After a few days, he escaped on horseback by the aid of a nephew, but was pursued and overtaken at Lifold in the district of Toul. Despairing of escape, he spread out his arms in the form of a cross, and, raising his eyes to heaven, was pierced by the lances of his pursuers. He was supposed to have been buried on the same spot (circ. A.D. 736). This account, however, can only be brought into harmony with history by substituting the name of Charles Martel for that of Pippin, and that of Waifaricus for Eudo, and putting the events in 765, as does Le Cointe. Hainmarus has been counted among the number of martyrs. He was succeeded, after an episcopate of fifteen years, by Theodranus, whom he had associated in the bishopric during his lifetime, that the diocese might not suffer from his secular occupations. (Gesta Autissiodorensium, Bouquet, v. 434; Gall. Christ. xii. 270; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. 765, n. xlviii. tom. v. 677-8; Fisquet, La France Pontificale, Diocèse d'Auxerre, p. 252.) [S. A. B.]

HAITO, bishop of Basle. [HETTO.]

HALACHAH. [TALMUD.]

HALANUS (ALANUS), sixth abbat of the monastery of St. Mary at Farfa, a Sabine town in the Roman states, upon the Farfa, a tributary of the Tiber, about twenty miles north of Rome. The Historiae Farfenses (in Pertz, Scriptores, xi. 528) represent him as a man deeply versed in spiritual philosophy and secular wisdom. Being a monk of Farfa, under the abbacy of Wandelbert, he retired for greater privacy to a spot near the oratory of St. Martin, in the mountain Motilla overhanging the monastery, and it is in that seclusion he may have composed the work which is attributed to him. On the death of Wandelbert, at the close of 759, the whole fraternity of St. Mary's came out to request Halanus to take his place. He complied, and presided nine years, until his death on March 3, 769, nominating as his successor a man of English birth named Wigbert. Another authority (Catalogus Abbatum Farfens. in Pertz, xi. 585) dates his accession 761, and places him between Wandelbert or Guandelpert and Probatas. The work attributed to him is a Homiliarium, the prologue of which is given in Pez (Thesaur. Anecd. vi. 83). This prologue describes the plan of the work as a series of discourses appropriate to the leading seasons of the church year, commencing with the eve of the Nativity. (Ceillier, xii. 145.) [C. H.]

HALMUND, an abbat who attests a grant made by Cuthred, king of Kent, to archbishop Wulfred in a synod at Acle, in Aug. 805. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 559, from MS. Lambeth, 1212; cf. Kemble, C. D. 190.) [S.]

HANANIAS (HANINA in Syr. Mart.), a priest and martyr with another priest named Abedecales and Simeon Barsaboe archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, the primate of the Persian church, in the persecution begun by Sapor II. in A.D. 343. A decree having been issued by Sapor for the execution of the clergy of the three first grades, and the demolition of the churches, Simeon and two attendant presbyters were conveyed in chains to Ledan, a city in the province of Huzitis, where Sapor then resided. Being required by Sapor to do homage to the sun, and being assured that upon their compliance depended the safety of themselves and of the Christians at large, they refused, and were condemned to be executed with one hundred others of the clerical order, upon the day which the Persian Christians had consecrated to the memory of Christ's passion. Simeon and his two companions were reserved till the last, the emperor designing to shake their constancy by the sight of so much bloodshed. Simeon, however, confirmed the band of confessors by his exhortations, and at last died himself with his two companions. It happened that Hananias, when it was his turn to strip himself and be bound in order to receive the stroke of the axe, was suddenly seized by the natural fear of death, and trembled through his whole frame; the flesh only, however, being weak, while the spirit was strong as before. When this was observed by Phusik, an officer of rank, superintendent of all the workmen in the palace, who was himself a Christian, he said to the martyr, "Take courage, shut your eyes for a moment, you will soon see the light of Jesus Christ." For this speech he and his daughter, who was a consecrated virgin, were seized, cruelly tortured, and executed. (Sozomen, H. E. l. ii. c. 8-11; Assemani, Acta Mart. Orient. t. i. pp. 10-42; Wright, Syr. Mart. in Jour. Sac. Lit. for 1865, p. 45, and 1866, p. 423.) [G. T. S.]

HANNO, c. 758, bishop of Verona. (Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 751.) [A. H. D. A.]

HANNO, HANNUS, alleged bishop of Constance, also called JOANNES II. (Gall. Chr. v. 894.) [C. H.]

HANTO (HATTO), fourteenth bishop of Augsburg (809-815), between St. Sintbert and St. Nitger. He was at the same time abbat of Neustadt, where he succeeded Waldericus. Eckhart suggests that he may have been the son of that Hatto from whom St. Megingandus acquired the site of Neustadt, then called Rorlacha. On two occasions he was commissioned by Charles the Great to settle disturbances in monasteries, first when the territory of Benedictoburanum (Benedictbeuern) was invaded by wrongdoers (Meichelbeck, Chron. Benedictobur. p. 21), secondly, in 812, when he was sent with the bishops of Mainz, Worms and Würzburg, to compose the differences which had arisen between Ratgarius abbat of Fulda and his monks (Annal. Lauriss. Min. 812, Pertz, Scriptores, i. 121). In 815, the year of his death, he is said to have assisted his brother Ratpardus in building a church on the site where afterwards stood the monastery of Diessen in Bavaria (De Fundatoribus Mon. Diess., Pertz, Scriptores, xvii. 329). For Hanto, see also Eckhart, Francon. Orient. ii. 139, 473; Retzberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 152. [S. A. B.]

HANUS (1), presbyter martyr in Persia under Sapor II. in the month of May, A.D. 375. He suffered with forty others, including two bishops, sixteen priests, nine deacons, six monks, and seven consecrated virgins. (Asseman, Mart. Orient. i. 144.) [G. T. S.]

HANUS (2), deacon and martyr on the same occasion as the preceding, A.D. 375. (Asseman, Mart. Orient. i. 144.) [G. T. S.]

HARDUINUS, bishop of Le Mans. [HARDINDUS.]

HARDUINUS, a presbyter and recluse at the monastery of Fontenelle. For the sake of more undisturbed contemplation he inhabited the cell of St. Saturninus, built by the abbat Wandregisilus, near Fontenelle, and there gave instruction to many in arithmetic (i.e. ecclesiastical computation, according to Mabillon), and the art of writing, in which he had no small skill. He found time, however, to make a pilgrimage to Rome in the time of pope Hadrian to visit the holy places. Upon his death, which took place in 811, he bequeathed to the fraternity numerous volumes copied during a long life by his own hand, the names of which are preserved, and a little silver plate for the services of the church. (Chartae Fontanellenses, xvi., Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 292; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. iv. i. 69-70, Paris, 1668-1701.) [S. A. B.]

HARDULF (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 773 a), king of Northumbria. [EARDULF (2).] [C. H.]

HARIBERTUS [ARITPERTUS], fourth abbat of the monastery of Murbach (Morbacum, Maurbacum) in the diocese of Basle, succeeding Baldebertus in A.D. 762 (Annales in Pertz, Scriptores, i. 28, 29). Soon afterwards we find him at Rome, on his return whence he was entrusted with a letter from the pope, Paul I., to king Pippin (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 1144). Upon Paul's death in 767, he was sent to Rome a second time by Pippin (Annales, Pertz, i. 31). Several documents relating to him are preserved, a letter of a matron named Herchinildis to him in A.D. 768, a deed of grant from one Usitericus in the same year, a charter of immunity from public burdens granted to his monastery by Charles the Great in A.D. 772, and a gift of land from one Williarus to the foundation in 774 (Schoepflin, Alsatia Diplomatica, i. 40, 44, 47). In this last year Haribert died, and was succeeded by Amicho (Annales, Pertz, i. 40; Gall. Christ. xv. 537.) [S. A. B.]

HARIFEUS of Besançon. [HERVAEUS.]

HARIMARUS, bishop. [HATHUMARUS.]

HARIOLFUS, thirty-fourth bishop of Langres, between his brother Erlolfus and Waldricus. He was founder and first abbat of Ellwangen, in Würtemberg, on the river Jaxt, in the 8th century. He is said to have been of noble family, and not undistinguished while still a layman. In later life he was much loved by Charles the Great, who habitually addressed him as his father. His life was written by Ermenric, a monk of the same foundation, between A.D. 845 and 855. It is in the form of a dialogue between the author and one Mahtolfus, and contains but little information, being principally occupied with his miracles. His choice of the spot for his monastery at Ellwangen, according to this narrative, was determined by a vision. His brother, the bishop of Langres, assisted him in constructing the monastery, and under his influence Hariolfus adopted the monastic garb and became abbat. The relics of the martyrs St. Sulpicius and St. Servilianus, which Erlolfus had received from pope Adrian, were translated to Ellwangen. The date of the foundation is given in A.D. 764. His later life in the diocese of Langres is unknown to us, but he appears to have returned to Ellwangen to die. In the list of the Gallia Christiana (iv. 526) he is confused with his brother Erlolfus, who preceded him in the see, and was present at the Lateran council in A.D. 768 (Mansi, xii. 715). The day of his death is given as August 13, but the year is unknown. An epitaph, discovered on an old parchment MS. in the monastery, is printed by Pertz at the end of the Life. (Scriptores, x. 11-14, Annales Eboangenses, Chronicon Eboacense, Pertz, ibid. 18, 35; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 169.)

HARMACARUS (HARMACKARUS), fifth bishop of Utrecht, between Theodardus and Richfriedus or Rixfridus. He is said to have been a Frisian by birth, and a canon of Utrecht before his elevation to the episcopate. He sat about thirteen years, from 791 to 804, and was buried in the church of St. Saviour at Utrecht. (Van Heussen, Hist. Episcopat. Federat. Belg. i. 6; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 535.) [S. A. B.]

HARMASIUS, a Eutychian and Monothelite of Alexandria, contemporary with Sophronius bishop of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 636. He is mentioned by that writer in an additional paragraph of his celebrated synodic which is published by Cotelier, as "qui Alexandriae adhuc veritatem oppugnat Harmasius piacularis homo" (Eccl. Gr. Monum. i. 790). The authenticity of the paragraph, however, is questioned by Cotelier (u. s.), and also by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ed. Harles. x. 45); but it is admitted by Le Quien (Praef. in Jo. Damasc. de duab. Volunt., Migne, Patr. Gr. xcv. 129). Anastasius Sinaita mentions the HARMASITAE, who would seem to have been followers of Harmasius (Odeg. c. 13, Migne, u. s. lxxxix. 223; Petavius, de Theol. Dogm. v. 43). [T. W. D.]

HARMATIUS (1), a pagan, whose son was converted to Christianity. Basil writing to Harmatius, styling him ὁ μέγας, begged him to respect his son's conscientious convictions, and suggested that he should rather admire the young man's nobility of soul in preferring the heavenly relationship to the earthly. (Basil. ep. 276, p. 420, in Pat. Gr. xxxii. 1011.) [C. H.]

HARMATIUS (2), a gentleman, the possessor of property at Cucusus, to whom Chrysostom wrote a playful letter, A.D. 404, telling him how much better pleased he should be if, instead of bidding his people supply all his bodily wants, which were none at all, he would spend a little paper and ink in informing him how he and his family found themselves. What he should like best would be a visit from him; but the fear of the Isaurian banditti forbade all hope of that. (Chrys. Epist. 75.) [E. V.]

HARMATIUS (3), bishop of Misthium in Lycaonia, subscribed to the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Onesiphorus of Iconium. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1087.)

HARMOGEN. [ARMOGEN, ARMAGIL.]

HARMONIUS (1), son of Bardesanes (Bardaisan) of Edessa, A.D. 190. He is said to have studied at Athens, where he became familiar with the language and philosophy of Greece. He wrote much in Greek and in Syriac. With his father's peculiar tenets he combined others drawn from Greek sources, relating to the origin of the soul, the decay of the body, and transmigration (μετεμψευσις). He sought to popularize his doctrines by presenting them in the form of hymns to be sung on the feasts of the martyrs. He was the first to compose in Syriac, doubtless in imitation of Greek models. Long afterwards, in the 4th century, St. Ephrem wrote hymns in the same metres and to the same airs as those of Harmonius, in order to supplant the heterodox originals. (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 26, p. 1008; Id. Hueret. Fubul. Compend. i. 22, p. 313; Id. ep. 145, p. 1248; Mansi, Concil. xi. 499 E; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 86; Ceillier, i. 466; Tillemont, Mém. hist. ecclés. ii. 457.) [BARDAISAN, Vol. I. p. 252, col. 1.] [C. J. B.]

HARMONIUS (2), apparently a disciple to whom Gregory Nyssen dedicated his treatise De Professione Christiana (Greg. Nyssen. Opp. in Pat. Gr. xlv. 238.) [E. V.]

HARMONIUS (3), bishop of Lampsacus, on the Asiatic coast of the Hellespont, signed the synodal letter of the Cyzicene province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 587; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 773.) [L. D.]

HARMONIUS (4), bishop of Callipolis (Gallipoli) on the Hellespont at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 879; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1123.) [J. de S.]

HARPOCRAS (1), one of the seven emissaries of Peter of Alexandria, probably bishops, sent by him to Constantinople, A.D. 380, as spies, to prepare the ground for the clandestine ordination of Maximus the Cynic as bishop of Constantinople (Greg. Naz. Carm. i. p. 14.) [E. V.]

HARPOCRAS (2) (ARPOCRAS), one of the orthodox Aegyptian bishops who, with some Alexandrian clerics, fled to Constantinople, in A.D. 457, to escape the persecution of Timotheus Aelurus and the Eutychians. His name appears in their petition to the emperor Leo (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 696; Labbe, iv. 891), and at the head of the letter addressed to them by the pope Leo (Leo Mag. Ep. clx. 1336). He appears also in the list of bishops subscribing the encyclical letter of the council held at Constantinople in 459, under Gennadius, against simony (Harduin, ii. 783). In the petition to the emperor he appears as "Episcopus Gavaeorum" (? Tavoeorum), among the subscribers to the decree of the council as "Episc. Tanecor." His see was probably Taua, in the province of Aegyptus Prima (Oriens Christ. ii. 526.) [C. G.]

HARPOCRATIANS. Celsus, quoted by Origen (Adv. Cels. v. 62), mentions a heretical sect "ἀρποκρατιανούς ἀπὸ Σαλώμης." It is natural to conjecture that Carpocratians are intended; and though we have no independent testimony that this sect professed to have derived traditions from Salome, we know that she is frequently mentioned in apocryphal gospels (Protev. Jac. 19, 20; Clem. Al. Strom. iii. 6, 13; Pistis Sophia, p. 102). [G. S.]

HARPOCRATION (1), bishop of Cynopolis in Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile. He was present at the first general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325, according to the statement of Socrates (Hist. Eccl. i. 13; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 591). The list of the Nicene fathers in Mansi (ii. 692 D) names him Alphocraton and Arpocraton, bishop of Naucratis (see also Le Quien, ii. 523). A bishop of the same name was present at the synod of Tyre, A.D. 335, but his see is not mentioned. (Mansi, ii. 1143 C; Athanas. Apol. Patr. Gr. xxv. 392.) [J. de S.]

HARPOCRATION (2), bishop of Bubastus (Basta) in Egypt. He was one of the bishops consecrated by Melchius, according to the Breviarium given to Alexander. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arianos, in Pat. Gr. xxv. 376; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 561.) [J. de S.]

HARUCHUS (HARRUCHUS, HARRUTH), third bishop of Verden, between Tanko and Haligad, 808-830 (Potthast. Bibl. Suppl. p. 435). He was of Irish birth, and before his elevation to the episcopate held the post of abbat in the monastery of Amarbaracum, which was usually supposed to be in Ireland, but according to Eckhart and later critics was in Germany, not far from Fulda, with which Ireland maintained friendly relation. (Francon. Orient. i. 700, ii. 23; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, c. xx. vol. iii. 221.) According to the Chronicle of Verden he was a man of great excellence, and after his death wonderful cures were reported to have been performed at his tomb. Eckhart quotes from the Necrologium of Fulda to the effect that he died in the year 829, and that his remains, together with those of the first bishop, Spatto, and the dalmatic of Tanko the second bishop, were carried back to Verden, from which he infers that these three bishops may have governed the see by chorepiscopi (Francon. Orient. ibid.). Though he finds a place in some hagiologies, principally the Irish, on July 15, Haruchus is omitted by the Bollandists. For their reasons see the Acta SS. Jul. iv. 3. [S. A. B.]

HASSEA, Irish saint. [HEISE.]

HASTULPHUS. [HEISTULFUS.]

HATES, virgin and martyr in Persia under Sapor II. A.D. 343. She is noted in Rom. Mart. on Oct. 17; in Bas. Men. on Oct. 5. In the former she is commemorated under the name of Mamelta, and we are told that she was converted from idolatry by an angelic voice, stoned by the heathen and drowned in a lake. (Assemani, Mart. Orient. i. 96-101.) [G. T. S.]

HATHELAC, bishop. [HEATHOLAC.]

HATHOBERHT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 175, A.D. 798), bishop. [HEATHOBERHT.] [C. H.]

HATHOBERHT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 116, A.D. 767), bishop; the same as Eadbert bishop of Leicester. [EADBERT (9).] [C. H.]

HATHORED, bishop. [HEATHORED.]

HATHOWALD, a priest of Worcester, who attests an act of bishop Deneberht in or about the year 802. (Kemble, C. D. 181.) [S.]

HATHUBERT, bishop. [HEATHOBERHT.]

HATHUFRITH (HADUFRITH), a priest who was present at Ripon in A.D. 709 when Wilfrid gave his last instructions to the convent, and he was also one of those deputed by that prelate to return from Mercia to tell them who was to be their abbat (Eddi, cap. 63). [J. R.]

HATHUMARUS (HADUMARUS, HARIMARUS), first bishop of Paderborn in Westphalia. This district was previously under the care of the bishop of Würzburg, but had become neglected on account of its distance from that place. According to Ido, who wrote the history of the translation of St. Liborius, Hathumarus was a Saxon, who when a boy had been given to Charles the Great as a hostage, and was sent by him to reside at Würzburg. Here he was educated, and in time took the tonsure, and devoted himself to study. He was afterwards consecrated first bishop of Paderborn by command Charles. The year is usually given as A.D. 795, but this seems too early a date to harmonize with Ido's narrative. He was alive in the year 815, as we find Louis the Pious, when asked for a charter for the foundation of the monastery of Corvey, summoning Hathumarus as the bishop of the diocese in which the proposed site lay, that the step might not be taken without his sanction (Hist. Transl. S. Viti, viii., Pertz, Scriptores, ii. 579). He was succeeded by Baduradus. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. v. 415, 417.) His day of commemoration was Aug. 9. (Schaten, Annalium Paderbornensium, tom. i. p. 29 seqq.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 448; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 440-1.) [S. A. B.]

HATTO, eighth bishop of Passau (A.D. 807-818), between Uolf and Reginar or Riucharius, is said to have obtained the see through the influence of Arno of Salzburg. Probably out of gratitude for his elevation he made no claim to the pallium, which at this time had gone to the see of Salzburg. He was present at two councils, that of Salzburg, in 807, and another at Regensburg, the date of which is not known. His name also occurs in some charters of Louis the Pious for the church of Passau. (Auctarium Cremifanense, 807, 818, Pertz, Scriptores, ix. 551, 552; Hansizius, Germania Sacra, i. 152-4; Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. 251; Potthast, Biblioth. Suppl. p. 381.) [S. A. B.]

HATTO, bishop of Augsburg. [HANTO.]

HATTO, bishop of Basle. [HETTO.]

HAUNEPERTUS, abbat of Farfa, 716. He came from Toulouse. (Constructio Farfensis, in Pertz, Monum. xi. p. 528; Catal. Abb. Farf. ibid. p. 585.) [A. H. D. A.]

HAWYSTL, ST., a daughter of Brychan, in the 5th century, who founded the church of Llanhawystl, supposed to be Awst in Gloucestershire (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 152). [C. W. B.]

HAYMO, ST. (HAIMO), flourished towards the end of the 8th century. He and his brother Veremundus while hunting near Milan were pursued by wild boars, and, in fulfilment of a vow which they made in the hour of danger, founded a monastery at Meda, a village midway between Milan and Como. They were commemorated on Feb. 13. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 705; Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. iii. ii. 380.) [I. G. S.]

HAYNIUS, thirty-second bishop of Chartres, between Berthegegrannus and Agirardus. He is said to have been in occupation of the see in A.D. 686. But the history of the diocese of Chartres at this time is involved in the greatest obscurity. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1101.)

HEABERHT, king of Kent. [EADBERT.]

HEABERT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 162, spurious charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 793), bishop; perhaps Heathobert bishop of London. [C. H.]

HEABURGA, abbess of Minster. [EADBURGA (2).]

HEADBERHT (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 1020, A.D. 799), bishop. [HEATHOBERT.] [C. H.]

HEADDA (HEADDI), bishop of Winchester. [HEDDA (1).]

HEADDA (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 36, A.D. 693; 52, A.D. 704), bishop of Lichfield. [HEDDA (2).] [C. H.]

HEADDA (1), a priest of the diocese of Worcester, who attests an act of Eanberht, Uhtred and Aldred, ealdormen or underkings of the Hwicci, to Worcester in 757. (Kemble, C. D. 102.) He is probably the same person as the following. [S.]

HEADDA (2), priest and abbat of the diocese of Worcester; kinsman of bishop Heathored, to whom in 759 the three Hwiccian ealdormen granted lands at Onnanford (Kemble, C. D. 105). and who some years later left his hereditary estates to the monastery at Worcester (ib. 169). The condition of the bequest is curious; the estates are to be held by the abbats' heirs so long as there can be found in the family one who is fitted to rule a religious house, and they are never to come into lay hands. The date of the bequest falls between 781 and 798. [S.]

HEADDA, the eighth bishop of Hereford. (M. H. B. 621, v. l.) [CEADDA.] [S.]

HEAHBERHT, a priest of the diocese of Rochester, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.) [S.]

HEAHBERT, abbat of Reculver, to whom Eardulf, king of Kent, made a grant of land at Perhamstede. (Dugdale, Mon. i. 455, from the Canterbury Cartulary in the Bodleian.) He is called Eadberht in Kemble's recension of the charter, which is undated, but would fall about 747. (Kemble, C. D. 1005.) [S.]

HEAHSTAN, a priest of the diocese of London, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.) He may possibly be identical with the person of the same name who became bishop of Sherborne in 824, and survived until 867; but this is scarcely likely. [S.]

HEAMUND, a Kentish priest, who attested the act of archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

HEAN, the founder of the monastery of Abingdon. In the chronicles of that abbey he is represented as nephew of Cissa, the ealdorman of Wiltshire under Kentwin and Ceadwalha successively kings of the West Saxons. Cissa is called by William of Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, 191, 354), father of king Ine: this, however, was not the case, Ine being son of Cenred; and the relationship here asserted being part of a notion, common to the Malmesbury traditions, which was intended to make the family of Ine a nucleus of monastic sanctity. But this mistake as to the father of Ine need not invalidate the testimony of the Abingdon writers with respect to the relationship of Hean and Cissa. (Hist. Abingdon, ed. Stevenson, ii. 269.) Ceolswitha, or Cilla, the foundress of Helenstow nunnery, is on the same authority said to have been Hean's sister. According to this tradition, which in this point again has something in common with the Malmesbury and Glastonbury legends, Abingdon (which was no doubt named from some ancient Saxon Abba who has left other traces of his occupation in the adjacent country (see Stevenson, Hist. Abingd. vol. ii. pref. p. v.) had been the home of an Irish anchorit named Abbennus or Aben in the 5th century. (Chr. Abingd. i. 2, 3; ii. 268.) The name of Seovekesham was also ascribed to Abingdon before the foundation of the monastery by Hean. It was in the reign of Kentwin that the foundation was first contemplated; Hean about the year 675 obtained from Cissa a place for his monastery, and devoted his own inheritance to the endowment. Under Ceadwalha the successor of Kentwin, the work which, according to the legend, had been begun upon the hill of Abbennus, and been stopped by miraculous agency, which every night threw down what had been built during the day, was removed to the plain by the Thames, where a furrow had been cut by supernatural means to mark the place for the foundation, and where a hermit of Cumnor had directed Hean to build. About this time Cissa died, and was buried first on the hill, then translated to the church on the plain. Hean here completed his work, and obtained charters for his monastery from Ceadwalha, and, after his death, from Ine, who had at first shewn himself unfriendly, but was soon reconciled. He was made first abbat and ruled his monks until the reign of Ethelheard, Ine's successor, when he died, and was succeeded by Conan. (Chron. Abingd. ii. 268-272.) The chronicle gives a detailed description of Hean's monastic buildings. Unfortunately the whole story rests upon very untrustworthy authority, and accordingly the charters, which are adduced in support of it, incur a suspicion of forgery over and above the internal evidence of spuriousness. Of these, however, the most important are the will of Hean (Kemble, C. D. 998; Chron. Abingd. i. 13), in which as abbat he provides for the disposition of his property at Bradanfeld, ~~Recesdune~~ and Earmundeslea, by his sister Cilla, reversion to his monastery; this is confirmed by Ine and bishop Daniel, and must be year 705: a fragment of a charter of Ceadwalha (Chr. Abingd. p. 8): a charter of Ine restoring to Hean 273 cassates or hides of land granted to him and Cilla by king Cissa, which Kemble condemns as a clumsy forgery, but which, as far as its material portions go, is defended by Stevenson (ib. 9, Kemble, C. D. 46): another grant by Ine of some of the lands mentioned in Hean's will (Chr. Abingd. i. 11; K. C. D. 45), which is rejected on account of the false date (A.D. 687), which may have been a late addition: and a charter by the same king to Hean and Ceolswitha, confirming an earlier grant by Eadfrith, son of Iddi, of lands in Bradfield, Bestlesford and Streatley; this last, although rejected by Kemble, may be genuine. (Chr. Abingd. i. 12; Kemble, C. D. 31.) The main features of the tradition must have been current before the days of William of Malmesbury, who without, however, mentioning Hean, calls Cissa, the father of Ine, the founder. When in the reign of Eadred, St. Ethelwold settled a monastery at Abingdon, he found there the remains of a small monastery, possessing forty mansae, and claiming a larger territory which was in the hands of the king (Alfric, Life of Ethelwold, Chr. Abingd. ii. 257; Wolstan, v. Ethelw. ap. Mab. AA. SS. O. S. B. saec. v. p. 600); the early existence of the monastery is thus attested by evidence of the age of Dunstan. But it must be feared that as Bede, the chronicles, Asser and Ethelwerd are silent as to the traditions, they were either invented or developed from the genuine portions of the charters, in the reign of Edgar. See besides the chronicle of Abingdon, edited by Mr. Stevenson, the extracts from the Abingdon copy of Florence of Worcester, Ang. Sac. i. 163; Mon. Angl. i. 505-526; W. HEANBALD (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 2199, in M. H. B. 790), archbishop of York. [EANBALD II.] [C. H.]

HEANFLET (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1196, in M. H. B. 779), daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria. [EANFLED (2).] [C. H.]

HEANFRID (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1258, in M. H. B. 780), king of Northumbria. [EANFRID.] [C. H.]

HEARDBERHT, brother of Ethelbald king of Mercia, c. A.D. 736. (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 80, 83.) [C. H.]

HEARDRED (HEARDRAED, HEADRED), the seventh bishop of Dunwich after the division of the East Anglian sees. (M. H. B. 618.) His name occurs in the act of Heathored at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439), and under the corrupt form Harchelus among the attestations of the acts of the legatine council of 787. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461.) It appears also in the charter granted by Offa to the gesith Osbert in the council of Calchyth in 788 (K. C. D. 153), and in other documents dated at a similar assembly at the same place in 789. (K. C. D. 155, 156, 157.) The latter year seems to be the last of Heardred's pontificate, as his successor Aelhun [ALHUN] appears in 790. If these dates are correct, Heardred would be one of the bishops transferred from the province of Canterbury to that of Lichfield, supposing the account given by the later writers of the arrangement made in 787 to be trustworthy. [HIGBERT.] [S.]

HEARDRED (HEADRED), bishop of Hexham. [EADRED (2).] [S.]

HEARED, a deacon of the diocese of Rochester, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.) [S.]

HEATHOBALD, a deacon of the diocese of Hereford, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

HEATHOBERT (HATHUBERT), the thirteenth bishop of London. (M. H. B. 617.) His name is attached to charters of 798 and 799. He attests a grant of Kenulf of Mercia, confirmed in synod in 798 apparently at Clovesho (Kemble, C. D. 175; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 514), and an act of Witenagemot at Tamworth (K. C. D. 1020) in 799, where his name appears as Headbert. There is likewise a document of the year 801, in which Hathobert appears as a witness. (K. C. D. 116; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 531.) Such being the evidence of charters to Heathobert's date, it is satisfactory to find his death noted under the year 801 by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 672), and, as no intervening name occurs, he probably succeeded Eadbald, who left England in the year of Offa's death, 796. [EADBALD (3).] It is, however, to be observed, that in a remarkable charter, purporting to be granted by Offa to Canterbury in a council at London in 795, no name of a bishop of London is found. (K. C. D. 159; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 485, 486.) Simeon records that shortly after Heathobert's death great part of London was burnt. (M. H. B. 672.) [S.]

HEATHOLAC (HADULAC, HATHELAC; ETELATUS, Ang. Sac. i. 404), the third bishop of Elmham after the division of the East Anglian sees (M. H. B. 618). He was bishop at the time Bede closed his history (H. E. v. 23), and must have attained that dignity after the year 716, in which his predecessor, Nothbert, was living. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300.) His successor, Ethelfrith, was consecrated by archbishop Nothelm in or about 736. (Ang. Sac. i. 404.) [S.]

HEATHORED (1), 8th bishop of Worcester (M. H. B. 623). According to Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 545, 546) he succeeded bishop Tilhere in 781, and died in 798; and these dates are amply borne out by the evidence of charters, from which also we learn more of Heathored than we know of most of the contemporary bishops. In 781 we find him at the council of Brentford, making an agreement with Offa by which the monastery of Worcester resigned to the king its rights at Bath, on condition of retaining lands at Stratford, Sture in Usmere, Bredon, and Homtune. (Kemble, C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 438, 439.) The same year he attests some questionable charters of Offa (K. C. D. 141, 142), and in 785, the fabricated grant of that king to Westminster. (Ib. 149; Mon. Angl. i. 291.) In 787, under the name "Adoredus," he appears at the legatine council. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461.) In 789 Heathored was engaged in litigation with Wulfheard, the son of Cissa, touching the inheritance of Hemele. (Kemble, C. D. 156; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 465; Mon. Angl. i. 587.) This cause was tried in the council of Acle in that year, and it was then decided that Wulfheard should retain the property for life; the matter was again brought forward after Heathored's death in the council of Clovesho in 803. (K. C. D. 183.) The division of the province of Canterbury in 787 or 788 would have the effect of making Heathored's see subject to Lichfield. His name, however, appears in the list of bishops who attended with Ethelheard at London in 795 (K. C. D. 159; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 485, 486). In 794 at a council at Clovesho, attended by both archbishops, he recovered an estate at Aust from Bynna, a 'gesith' of Offa (K. C. D. 164). He continues to attest Mercian charters of Offa and Egferth, and appears as signing a grant of Kenulf to the ealdorman Oswulf in the synod of 798. (K. C. D. 175.) Besides occurring in genuine charters his name is found in the spurious grants of Offa to St. Alban's (K. C. D. 161, 162) and Westminster (K. C. D. 149). His last appearance is in a dated charter of Kenulf to Christ Church, Canterbury, of the year 799. (Kemble, C. D. 1020.) If this charter is genuine, the date given by Florence for Heathored's death will require the common rectification by two years, and belong to the year 800. (Thomas, Survey of Worcester, pp. 19-22; Heming, Cartulary of Worcester, ed. Hearne, passim; Anglia Sacra, i. 471.) [S.]

HEATHORED (2), bishop of Lindisfarne, properly the 13th in succession, but omitted in the ancient list (M. H. B. 626), and inserted among the bishops of Whithern (ibid.). Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 547, 548) gives the date of his promotion to Lindisfarne as 819, and dates his death in 828; in the margin of the MS. of Simeon of Durham, he is dated, by mistake, 891 (ib. p. 685). The latter author, in his History of the Church of Durham, recognises Heathored as bishop of Lindisfarne, assigning him an episcopate of nine years between Egbert and Egred (lib. ii. c. 5; ap. Twysden, p. 13), which probably signifies from A.D. 821 to 830, as in the latter year the accession of Egred is noted (M. H. B. 673). Of Heathored as bishop of Whithern nothing is known, but he may have taken charge of that diocese after the death of Badwulf. [S.]

HEATHORED (3), a priest of the diocese of Sidnacester, who attests the act of Clovesho in 803. (K. C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

HEATHORED (4) (HETHEMED), an undated abbat of Malmesbury, whose name occurs twelfth in the list in the Cotton MS., Vitellius, A. 10. (Birch, Abbots of Malmesbury, p. 7.) [S.]

HEBDOMAS. All the early Gnostics of whose opinions Irenaeus gives an account, in a section (i. 23 sqq.) probably derived from an earlier writer, agree in the doctrine that the world was made by the instrumentality of angels. The brief account given of the teaching of the first two in the list, Simon and Menander, does not state whether or not they defined the number of these angels; but it is expressly told of the third, Saturninus (ch. 24), that he counted them as seven. At the end of the first book of Irenaeus is a section to all appearance derived from a source different from that just referred to. He here (c. 29) relates the opinions of heretics to whom he himself gives no title, but whom his copyist Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 14) calls Ophites. We have noted (Vol. I. pp. 382, 426) coincidences between this chapter and the former chapter on Saturninus, which have led us to the conclusion that in both chapters the doctrines of the same school are described. The former chapter might be regarded as an abstract derived from a previous treatise on heresies; the fuller details of the latter might have been obtained by Irenaeus himself from a work of the school written when the system had received some development. In any case the Ophite teaching may be used to illustrate that of Saturninus, his connexion with that school being closer than with any other. It would have been natural to think that the number of seven angels was suggested to Saturninus by astronomical considerations; and this supposition is verified by the statement in the later chapter (c. 30, p. 111) that the holy Hebdomas are the seven stars called planets. In fact, the sphere of the seven stars, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and the Moon, were supposed to be presided over, each by a different angel. Their names are differently given; Irenaeus (c. 30) giving them, Ialdabaoth, the chief, Iao, Sabaoth, Adonaus, Eloaeus, Oreus, and Astaphaeus. With this closely agrees Origen, who, writing of the Ophites (Adv. Cels. vi. 31, 32), gives the names Ialdabaoth, Iao, Sabaoth, Adonaus, Astaphaeus, Eloaeus, Horaens. Epiphanius (Haer. 26, p. 91), relating the opinions of what was clearly a branch of the same school, places in the highest heaven Ialdabaoth or, according to others, Sabaoth; in the next, Elilaeus according to one version, Ialdabaoth according to the other; in the next Adonaus and Eloaeus; beneath these Dades, Seth, and Saclas; lowest of all Iao. It was thought that each of the Jewish prophets was sent by a different one of these seven angels, whose special glory that prophet was to declare. Thus (Irenaeus, i. 30, p. 109) the first angel sent Moses, Joshua, Amos, and Habakkuk; the second Samuel, Nathan, Jonah, and Micah; the third Elijah, Joel, and Zechariah; the fourth Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and Daniel; the fifth Tobit and Haggai; the sixth Micah (qu. Malachi?) and Nahum; the seventh Ezra and Zephaniah. The ancient astronomy taught that above the seven planetary spheres was an eighth, the sphere of the fixed stars (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 25, xxv. p. 636: see also his quotation, v. 11, p. 692, of a mention of the fifth heaven in apocryphal writings ascribed to Zephaniah). In the eighth sphere, these Gnostics taught, dwelt the mother to whom all these angels owed their origin, Sophia or Prunikos according to the version of Irenaeus, Barbelo according to that of Epiphanius. In the language of these sects the word hebdomad not only denotes the seven angels, but is also a name of place, denoting the heavenly regions over which the seven archons presided; while Ogdoad denotes the supercelestial regions which lay above their control.

Again, beside the higher hebdomad of the seven angels, the Ophite system told of a lower hebdomad. After the serpent in punishment for having taught our first parents to transgress the commands of Ialdabaoth was cast down into this lower world, he begat himself six sons, who with himself form a hebdomad, the counterpart of that of which his father Ialdabaoth is chief. These are the seven demons, the scene of whose activity is this lower earth, not the heavens; and who delight in injuring the human race on whose account their father had been cast down. Origen (Adv. Cels. 30) gives their names and forms from an Ophite diagram; Michael in form as a lion, Suriel as an ox, Raphael as a dragon, Gabriel as an eagle, Thauthabaoth as a bear, Erataoth as a dog, Onoel or Thartharaoth as an ass.

It does not appear that the Oriental philosophy, or the earliest Gnostic systems, recognised any place higher than the eighth sphere; and it is here that according to the account of Epiphanius (Haer. 26, p. 91) dwelt Barbelo the mother of all. But Grecian philosophy came to teach that above the sensible world there lay a still higher, and Clem. Alex. (l.c.) speaks of the eighth sphere as lying nearest τῇ νοητῇ κόσμῳ. Accordingly, those Gnostic systems which are tinctured by Grecian philosophy, while leaving untouched the doctrine of seven or eight material heavens, develop in various ways the theory of the region above them. In the system of BASILIDES, as reported by Hippolytus (vii. 20 sqq.), Ogdoad and Hebdomad are merely names of place. In that system the universe is divided into the Kosmos and the hypercosmical region. At the highest point of the Kosmos presides the great Archon, ruling over the Ogdoad, or ethereal region, which is described as reaching down to the moon. Beneath the Ogdoad is the Hebdomad presided over by its own Archon. In one place (p. 238) the names Ogdoad and Hebdomad seem to be given to the archons themselves. In any case the names shew marks of having been derived from a previous system, for the system of Basilides itself gives no account of the numbers seven or eight; and the number of heavens is not limited to seven, as many as 365 being counted. In the latest form of Basilidianism, that contained in Pistis Sophia, the doctrine of the higher regions receives such enormous development that the seven planetary spheres are thought of as contemptibly low; and Ialdabaoth, once their ruler, in this book sinks to a demon.

In the system of VALENTINUS again the names Ogdoad and Hebdomad occur in the same signification. Above this lower world are the seven heavens, where dwells their maker the Demiurge himself also, on that account, called Hebdomas (Iren. I. v. p. 24). Of these seven heavens Marcus taught in more detail (Iren. I. xiv. 7, p. 72). Above these heavens is the Ogdoad, also called ἡ μετέωρος, and Jerusalem above, the abode of Achamoth, who herself also is called Ogdoad (Iren. I. v. 2, p. 24; Hippol. vi. p. 191). Over the Ogdoad is the Pleroma, the abode of the Aeons. Thus (Hippol. p. 195), we have the threefold division, τὰ κατὰ τοὺς αἰῶνας, τὰ κατὰ τὴν ὀγδόδα, τὰ κατὰ τὴν ἑβδόμηδα. This use of the words Hebdomad and Ogdoad also bears traces of derivation from a previous system, the word Ogdoad occurring in a different sense in the system of Valentinus himself, whose Ogdoad within the Pleroma was probably intended to answer to the Ogdoad outside. Irenaeus (ii. 107) argues from what is told of Paul's ascent to the third heaven against the low place assigned to the heavens in the Valentinian scheme.

The word Hebdomad occurs also in the Clementine Homilies, but its use there is quite unconnected with the teaching hitherto described. The mystery of the Hebdomad there unfolded (Hom. i. 10) is an independent exposition of the six days' work of creation, and the seventh day's rest; illustrated by the six directions, into which infinite space extends, viz. up, down, right, left, backward, forward, together with the central point considered as making a seventh.

The mysteries of the number seven are treated of by Clem. Alex. (Strom. vi. 16), and in the source whence he borrowed (Philo, de Op. Mund. and Leg. Allegor., where the theme is enlarged on, χαλκὸς ἡ φύσις ἑβδομάδης). See also Hippol. Ref. iv. 51; Routh, Rel. Sac. i. 416. On the Jewish theory of seven heavens, see ISAAH, ASCENSION OF. [G. S.]

HEBREW LEARNING AMONG THE FATHERS. Judging from a priori grounds it would not be unreasonable to expect that we should find evidence in the works of the earliest Christian writers of some acquaintance with the Old Testament Scriptures in their original tongue. The facts that Christianity has its roots firmly planted in Judaism,—that the writers of the New Testament uniformly appeal to the words of Moses and of the prophets,—that the new law went forth from Jerusalem,—and that its first preachers and converts were Jews—naturally suggest the probability that we should find in the writings of the early fathers indications of their habitual use of the Old Testament Scriptures in the original tongue. It is well known to every ecclesiastical student that the facts of the case are otherwise, but very little labour has been hitherto bestowed (especially in this country) upon any attempt to ascertain the extent to which the study of Hebrew was cultivated within the first few centuries of the existence of the Christian church.

It is not difficult to trace the chief causes of the neglect of this study. Jerusalem soon ceased to be the centre from which the new faith was propagated, and Judaism soon ceased to supply its ablest expositors and apologists. Moreover, whilst the use which was made of the LXX version by the writers of the New Testament sufficed to establish its authority amongst Christians, the prevailing use of the Greek language accounts for the general adoption of that version, both for the instruction of converts and for the conviction of adversaries. And further, whilst the bitter animosity which existed on the part of the Jews towards Christianity may have so far reacted upon Christians as to create within them a prejudice against the Hebrew language, there existed a strong reluctance, and in some places a strict prohibition against the imparting of a knowledge of Hebrew by Jews to those whom they regarded as enemies alike to their creed and to their nation.

These considerations may serve in some measure to account both for the prevalent neglect of the Hebrew language, and also, to a certain extent, for the disposition on the part of those who possessed some acquaintance with it to rest their statements on the authority of Jews rather than to advance them on their own responsibility. In confirmation of this view the following extract may be adduced from the Apologia adversus Rufinum of St. Jerome. "Ipse Origenes et Clemens et Eusebius atque alii complures, quando de Scripturis aliqua disputant, et volunt approbare quod dicunt, sic solent scribere: Referebat mihi Hebraeus, et audiui ab Hebraeo, et Hebraeorum ista sententia est. Certe etiam Origenes patriarchen Huillum, qui temporibus ejus fuit, nominat, et tricesimum tomum in Esaiam, in cujus fine dedisserit Vae tibi . . . illius expositione concludit" (tom. iii. p. 91, Basil. 1516).

JUSTIN MARTYR.—The controversy of Justin with Trypho deserves notice in connexion with this subject on several grounds. Justin Martyr was a native of Samaria. He was born at Flavia Neapolis, a town which occupied the place of Sichem, the old capital of Samaria, and which was colonized with Greeks by the emperor Vespasian. His dialogue with Trypho, who was esteemed one of the most learned Jews of his time, was held at Ephesus about the year A.D. 148. We have here the case of one who, though born and brought up in the land of Palestine, was not only ignorant of the vernacular language of that country at the time of his conversion to Christianity, but who appears to have been insensible of the great disadvantage under which, by reason of this ignorance, he engaged in controversy with a Jew; and who, as far as we know, never subsequently applied himself to the study of those Scriptures in their original tongue from which the arguments which he urges against Trypho are mainly derived.

The indications which Justin gives of his entire dependence upon the Greek version (or versions) of the Old Testament, and of his ignorance of a Hebrew text, are of a very marked and conclusive character. The following will suffice by way of illustration.

(1) In c. 49 Justin's argument based upon Ex. xvii. 16, "A hand upon the throne (or, as some read, 'upon the banner') of the Lord," is derived from the LXX, who appear to have had a reading entirely different from the present Hebrew text, and one which is unsupported by the other versions, viz. ἐν χειρὶ κρυφαίᾳ, "with a hidden hand."

(2) Although Justin's quotation, in c. 50, from Is. xxxix. 8 to xl. 18, presents several verbal variations from the LXX, he agrees with the LXX and with the Vulgate, and differs not only from the Hebrew, but also from the other Greek versions, in adopting the masculine instead of the feminine gender in ver. 9, ὁ εὐαγγελιζόμενος, "thou that bringest good tidings."

(3) In c. 113, Justin prefers it as an accusation against the Jews that, whilst taking no account of the change of Oshea into Joshua, they made it a theological question why an α was added to the name of Abraham (Ἀβραμ for Ἀβραμ) and a second ρ inserted in that of Sarah (Σάρρα for Σάρα). It is difficult to imagine that this "vulgar mistake of the Greeks," as it is described by bishop Pearson,* could have been made by any one who knew that the real change was the addition of the letter א (h) in the name of Abraham (i. e. Abraham for Abram), and the change of ש (i) into א (h) in that of Sarah (i. e. Sarah for Sarai).

(4) One more illustration will suffice. In c. 125, Justin gives his explanation of the meaning of the name Israel, "not thinking it right when he knew a thing not to say it." The explanation is that it is derived from Isra (Ish), a man, and El, power, the true derivation, as is well known, being from אֵל a chief or prince, or אֵלֶּיךָ sarah, he contended, or prevailed, and אֱלֹהִים El, God.

It is important to observe, in connexion with this subject, that Justin not only follows the LXX generally^b in his quotations, and defends the accuracy of their version, but that he charges the Jews with corrupting those copies of that version, which, as it appears from his statements, were used in some of their synagogues. Thus, in c. 68, he says that the Jewish teachers "presumed to affirm that the translation made by the seventy elders in the time of Ptolemy, the king of Egypt, was in some respects untrue."^c In c. 71 he repeats the same charge, and alleges that the Jewish teachers did not allow that the translation of the LXX was well done, and that they endeavoured to make a translation themselves (ἀλλ' αὐτοὶ ἐξηγεῖσθαι περιόρνται). The Benedictine editor supposes that these words have reference only to certain passages, and not to a new translation. It does not appear improbable, however, that allusion is made to the version of Theodotion, who is said by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. iii. 24) to have been a Jewish proselyte, and whose version is supposed to have been made during the former half of the 2nd century. The versions of Aquila and of Symmachus appear to have been made at a somewhat later date, but it is possible that one or both may have been taken in hand during the life of Justin Martyr, who is thought by some to refer to the version of Aquila in this place. [See art. AQUILA.]

In the following chapter Justin endeavours to establish the accusation preferred in the 71st chapter against the "Seventy Elders" of having removed from their translation many passages which have reference to Christ. No confirmation of this charge, so far as we are aware, has been obtained from any existing MSS., and in regard to the alleged expurgation of one of the passages quoted by Justin, viz. Jer. xi. 19, Justin himself acknowledges that it was "still found in some copies in the Jewish synagogue," and, as far as we are aware, it is retained in all the MSS., both Hebrew and Greek, which are now known.^d It is remarkable, however, that Trypho who is described by Eusebius (Hist. iv. c. 18) as "the most distinguished of the Hebrews of his time," instead of insisting upon the production of direct evidence of so grave an accusation, contented himself with remarking that "the thing appears incredible." Upon the whole it seems not unreasonable to conclude that neither Justin nor Trypho was able to refer to the Hebrew text.

* Note on Art. II. p. 113, Ox. 1797.

^b It is obvious, however, that in some places either the text which Justin used differed from any which is now known, or that Justin did not strictly adhere to it. Thus, in the quotation from Is. liv. which occurs in c. 13, we observe that whereas the LXX omit two negatives which are found in the Hebrew in ver. 4, and insert two negatives which are not found in the Hebrew in ver. 6, Justin follows the Greek text in the former case and the Hebrew text in the latter. We may observe also that in the quotation in c. xlii. from Is. lii. 12, where the version of the LXX is πορεύσεται γὰρ πρότερος ὑμῶν, Justin, in accordance with the Hebrew, which has אֶפְרַיִם לִפְנֵימֹכָם, i. e. before your face, reads πορεύσεται γὰρ πρὸ προτέρων ὑμῶν.

^c Justin refers particularly to Is. vii. where he says (cf. c. 71 and c. 84) that the Jews presumed to corrupt the translation made by the LXX and to substitute ἡ μάστις for ἡ σαβίβος.

Whilst, however, Justin shews his entire ignorance of the Hebrew language, he gives evidence of some familiarity with the Jewish traditional interpretation of many passages of the Old Testament. Thus, e.g., in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. xx.), he adopts the same view of the meaning of Gen. i. 29, 30, which is found in the Midrash on Ps. cxlvi. 7, viz. that whereas only the flesh of some animals was allowed as food by the Mosaic laws, the flesh of all animals, without restriction, was granted to Noah and to his sons. In c. xxxii. of the Dialogue Justin refers to the Jewish interpretation of Daniel's "time," יָמֵי (xii. 25), as denoting a hundred years. Again, in c. xl. of the same Dialogue, Justin, by the use of the word θυμιατα, as applied to the two goats, of which one was killed and the other sent into the wilderness on the day of Atonement, shews his acquaintance with the injunctions of the Mishnah (treatise Yomah) respecting the exact resemblance of the two goats, on which, indeed, though nowhere prescribed in the law of Moses, it makes the validity of the enjoined rites to depend. In c. cxii. of the Dialogue he shews his acquaintance with the Jewish traditional interpretation of Gen. xxxii. 15, where mention is made of female camels only, not males, and of the number of measures of fine flour, and of oil in the appointed offerings. And once more, in c. cxxxi., Justin refers to the interpretation of Deut. viii. 4, which appears to have been currently received by his Jewish contemporaries, viz. that the clothing of the children of the Israelites, during their wanderings in the wilderness, increased in size in proportion to the growth of the wearers. (Cf. Justinus Martyr und die Agada, von Dr. Alex. Heinrich Goldfahn, Breslau.)

TERTULLIAN, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENTINUS, the earliest of the Latin fathers of the church. The precise date of his birth is uncertain. It was probably between A.D. 145 and A.D. 150. There are passages in his writings which lead to the inference that he was brought up as a heathen, but Jerome, in his Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, gives no information on this point. There can be little doubt (notwithstanding the objections of some Romanist writers) that, although a married man, Tertullian was a presbyter, either of the church of Rome, or of ^d We may refer to two valuable notes on this subject in Bishop Kaye's Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr, pp. 20, 21, 22, and 44, 45, 2nd ed. 1836. Bishop Kaye is of opinion that the Christians appear to have been more justly liable to the accusation of corrupting the Septuagint version than the Jews.

that of Carthage. He appears to have been acquainted with all those branches of science and of literature which were studied in his time; and he sometimes speaks, as bishop Kaye has observed in his Ecclesiastical History of the Second and Third Centuries, illustrated from the writings of Tertullian (p. 66, foot-note, 1826), as if he was acquainted with Hebrew. Thus, e.g., in his Five Books against Marcion (iv. 39), we find him giving the correct meaning of the name Israel, viz. one who prevails with God (in martyris nomine cum Deo invalescentis, quod est interpretatio Israelis). This is the more remarkable when we remember that Jerome, in his treatise on proper names, as well as Origen, adopts the interpretation of the name then commonly received, viz. one seeing God, and that the former afterwards assigned as his reason for so doing the names of great weight by which that interpretation was supported (see under Jerome in this article).^{*} Again, in his work Against Praxeas (c. 5), Tertullian says, "There are some who allege that even Genesis opens thus in Hebrew,—'In the beginning God made for Himself a Son' ('in principio Deus fecit sibi filium'), on which statement Tertullian observes, 'Hoc ut firmum non sit, alia me argumenta deducunt,' &c. &c. In his Quaestiones in Genesim, Jerome refers to these words of Tertullian, and having first observed that the Hebrew is בְּרֵאשִׁית and not בְּרַב, which latter reading would mean that God created the heaven and the earth by the Son, Jerome remarks that the reference to Christ must be understood rather according to the sense than according to the letter. The remarks of Tertullian do not appear to justify the inference that he rejected the statement to which he refers from a personal examination of the original. It is quite possible that the evidence of the version or versions which he used may have satisfied him of its incorrectness.

In his treatise Against Marcion (iii. 22) Tertullian quotes Ezekiel ix. 4 thus, "Pertransi in medio portae, in media Hierusalem, et da signum Tau in frontibus virorum." He goes on to observe that the Greek letter Tau and the Roman letter T have the form of the cross, but he does not appear to have been aware that in the old characters which Jerome says the Samaritans used in his time, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet has the form of the cross. Tertullian quotes the passage from Ezekiel again at greater length in his treatise Adv. Judaeos (c. 11), but in this place the MS. which Oehler usually follows omits the word Tau after signum. Now inasmuch as the Greek version of the LXX has simply σημεῖον both in v. 4 and in v. 6, in both of which the Hebrew has the word טָו, Tau, it is possible that Tertullian may have derived his version from the original Hebrew; on the other hand it seems more probable that the old Latin version or versions, which are thought to have existed in the time of Tertullian, had the Tau as the present Vulgate has.

It may be observed here that the Tau is found in the version of Theodotion, according to Origen and Jerome, and also in the versions of Aquila according to Origen; but independently of the question whether these versions, especially that of Theodotion, could have been known to Tertullian, there appears no evidence of his use of them.

In his treatise Adversus Judaeos (c. 9), Tertullian refers to the meaning of the word Immanuel in the Hebrew: "Sonus enim Hebraicus, quod est Emmanuel, id est nobiscum Deus, suae gentis est." These words, however, like those to which reference has already been made, do not warrant the inference that Tertullian was capable of referring to the Hebrew text; and the wide deviation of his quotations from it, even when arguing against the Jews, affords presumptive evidence that he was unable to do so. Amongst many incidental indications that such was the case reference may be made to the following: (1) In common with many of the early Christian writers, Tertullian quotes the words "from the tree" (inadvertently transferred it may be, in the first instance, from Acts xiii. 29 to Ps. xcvi.), as if they occurred in Ps. xcvi. 10 (Adv. Jud. c. x.). (2) When quoting Is. xlv. 1, Tertullian either read Kuplō for Kūpō or quotes from some old Latin version which was based upon that reading: "Sic dicit Dominus Deus Christo meo Domino." The origin of this reading is obvious to any one who refers to the LXX, but such a rendering would have been impossible if reference had been made to the Hebrew, which has לְכֹרֶשׁ, "to Cyrus." (3) Tertullian's quotation from Micah v. i. (ib. c. xiii.) agrees more closely with the Greek of St. Matthew ii. 3–6, than with the Hebrew or the LXX. (4) Tertullian's rendering of Ps. xxii. 17 is "exterminaverunt manus meas et pedes." (5) Tertullian follows the LXX in his version of Jer. xvii. 9, ib. c. xiv. "homo est et quis cognoscet illum," where the Hebrew word שָׁנָא which is taken in the Vulg. and in the A. V. as an adjective, or past participle from שָׁנָא to be sick, is read by the LXX as the Aramaic שָׁנָא, or the Hebrew שָׁנָא, ἀσθενος. The above instances of Tertullian's mode of quotation, which it would be useless to multiply, appear to justify the conclusion that there is no sufficient evidence of Tertullian's knowledge of Hebrew, and that when his quotations are not made from memory, "Tertullian," as bishop Kaye has observed, "in quoting the Old Testament, appears either himself to have translated from the Greek, or to have used a Latin version made from the Greek, not from the Hebrew" (Eccles. Hist. of the Second Century, p. 310).

IRENAEUS.—Very little is known of the early history of Irenaeus. He was probably born in Syria, and his great work, Against Heresies, appears to have been written towards the close of the 2nd century, during the episcopate of Eleutherus, who was succeeded as bishop of Rome by Victor about the year A.D. 190. This work was composed in Greek, but the greater portion of the original has been lost, and the portion which remains has been preserved in quotations made by different authors. An ancient Latin translation, however, has been preserved. Irenaeus believed in the miraculous composition, and consequently in the inspiration, of the Septuagint versions which he commonly follows, although, in common with other early writers, his quotations are frequently made from memory. He was aware of the existence of the versions of Aquila and Theodotion, and refers to their incorrect translation of Is. vii. 14 (iii. 21, 1).

In his reference to the appearance of the Son of God to Jacob (iv. 10) Irenaeus seems to allude to the commonly accepted meaning of the name Israel as a man seeing God. In the same chapter he says that our Lord was foretold by Moses, in a figurative manner, "by the name given to the passover," in reference, apparently (to Tertullian and other early writers), to the etymology which connects πάσχα (Heb. פסח, pesach), with πάσχειν, to suffer. In his quotation from Ps. xl. 7 (iv. 17), if the old Latin translation may be trusted, Irenaeus follows the version of the Vulgate "aures autem perfecisti mihi"; which, if we may read perforasti for perfecisti, agrees with the Hebrew, whilst the LXX read σῶμα δὲ κατηργήσω μοι. But whilst this correspondence affords no evidence of the ability of Irenaeus to consult the Hebrew, there is strong presumptive evidence to the contrary, as, e.g., in iv. 18, where he not only adopts the Septuagint version of Gen. iv. 7, but dwells with particular emphasis upon the word ἡσυχασεν, which is found in some copies of the LXX, but which has no warrant whatsoever in the original Hebrew. The quotation from Dan. xii. 8 gives rise to an interesting inquiry respecting the Greek version then in use in the churches. The words of Irenaeus, as they are found in the Latin, are "a multis justis," which correspond with the version of Theodotion ἀπὸ τῶν δικαίων τῶν πολλῶν, but which accord neither with the Hebrew (unless the מ (m) of the Hiphil participle מִן (min) were read as the preposition מִן (min, from), and the absolute form of the word were read in place of the construction), nor with the Greek of the LXX as it is found in the edition of Daniel, published at Rome in 1772.^f It has been thought remarkable that Irenaeus should have seen the version of his contemporary Theodotion. It is still more remarkable that one holding the view which Irenaeus did of the authority of the LXX should have followed any other. Upon the whole there does not appear any ground for the supposition that Irenaeus made any use of the Old Testament Scriptures in their original language.

THEOPHILUS.—Theophilus is said by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 20) to have been the sixth bishop of Antioch in Syria, and to have been appointed to that bishopric in the eighth year of Marcus Aurelius, that is A.D. 168.

The following remarks refer to the three books which he addressed to his friend Autolycus.

(1) In book i. c. 12, Theophilus says "that which among the Hebrews is called the Sabbath is when translated into Greek ἑβδομάς." It is obvious that Theophilus has here fallen into the error of supposing that the word Sabbath is connected with some form of the numeral שֶׁבַע, sheba, seven, rather than with the verb שָׁבַע, shabath, which denotes rest, and from which the noun שַׁבָּת, shabbath, is derived.

(2) In book i. c. 19, Theophilus follows the ^f The reading of the LXX in the Roman edition is καὶ αὐτὸν κατήργησεν τοὺς λόγους μου, &c.

LXX version of Gen. ii. 2, where the sixth day is substituted for the seventh.

(3) In book i. c. 24, Theophilus observes rightly that in Hebrew the word Eden (עֵדֶן) signifies delight. This information, however, he may reasonably be supposed to have derived from others, as also the interpretation which he gives in book iii. c. 19, respecting the meaning of the name Noah, which he says in Hebrew signifies rest.^g

(4) In book ii. c. 10, Theophilus writes thus: "First he named the 'beginning' and 'creation,' then he thus introduced God." This observation may imply that the writer was aware of the order observed in the Hebrew בְּרֵאשִׁית בְּרָא אֱלֹהִים. It is not conclusive proof, however, that such was the case, inasmuch as the order of the Greek is the same as that of the Hebrew, Ἐν ἀρχῇ ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεός.

(5) In book ii. c. 21, Theophilus follows the LXX version of Gen. iii. 15, in reading watch instead of bruiſe. Upon the whole there seems no evidence that Theophilus was acquainted with Hebrew.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.—Clement of Alexandria was born about A.D. 150–160, but the place of his birth is uncertain, and his early history is involved in obscurity. Eusebius says that he became the scholar of Pantaenus (Eccl. Hist. book v. c. 11), who was the chief of the catechetical school at Alexandria, and that Origen was numbered amongst his scholars (ib. book vi. c. 6). He withdrew from Alexandria at the time of the persecution under Severus, A.D. 202–203, and it is thought that he visited Syria.

His quotations, both from the Old and New Testaments, appear to have been commonly made from memory, but it is evident that he used the version of the LXX, as, indeed, it would have been reasonable to anticipate from his residence at Alexandria. It will suffice, in proof of this statement, to refer to the following instances from the Exhortation to the Heathen, in the early chapters of which the citations from Scripture are not numerous.

(1) "For it was before the morning star," which is evidently taken from Ps. cx. 3, where the LXX read πρὸ ἐσφόρου ἐγέννησά σε (c. i.).

(2) In his quotation from Is. liv. 1, although evidently made from memory, Clement follows the LXX in the latter part of the verse verbally (c. i.).

(3) In c. iv. Clement quotes Ps. xxiii. 6 and Ps. viii. 4, almost verbatim from the LXX.

(4) In c. vi. Clement quotes Deut. xxv. 13 almost verbatim from the LXX.

In the eighth chapter the quotations from the Prophets are numerous, and they adhere for the most part very closely to the version of the LXX, whilst, at the same time, the blending of different quotations, and the ascription of the words of Amos to Hosea, shew that Clement was quoting, for the most part, from memory. Amongst other proofs that Clement did not refer to the ^g It is well known that a diversity of opinion exists on this point, some deriving the name from the verb נָח and interpreting it as denoting rest, whilst others derive it from the verb נָחַם, and interpret it as denoting consolation.

Hebrew, the citation in this chapter from Ps. ii. 12, ἀπαλασθε πειθελάς, may be adduced, as also that in c. x. from Is. liv. 17, where, instead of "their righteousness is of (or from) Me," the LXX read καὶ ὑμεῖς ἔσεσθε μοι δίκαιοι.

The following instances shew that, although brought into contact with at least one, if not more, of the Hebrew race (Miscellanies, book i. c. 1), Clement did not possess any knowledge of the Hebrew language.

(1) In the Paedagogus (i. c. 7) he says that Jacob was called Israel "because he saw God the Lord," with evident allusion to the prevalent etymology of the word יִשְׂרָאֵל, Israel, as if derived from יִשְׂרָאֵל, a man, יָרָא, he saw, and אֱלֹהִים, God. He refers to the same etymology in c. 9 of the same book, where he says "Israel means he that sees God." And again in the Miscellanies (book i. c. 5), he says that he who is "really endowed with the power of seeing is called Israel."

(2) In the place last quoted, Clement adopts Philo's etymology of the word Isaac as meaning self-taught; of Jacob as meaning exerciser; and of Rebecca as denoting patience.

(3) In book i. c. 21 of the Stromateis, Clement represents the prophet Isaiah as the son of the prophet Amos, not being aware that the name of the father of Isaiah was אִמּוֹס, Amos, whilst the name of the prophet was יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, Isaiah.

(4) In the same chapter he identifies יהויקים, Jehoiakim with יהויכין, Jehoiachin, and represents the latter as the namesake of the former.

(5) In the Stromateis (book v. c. 5) Clement explains the word Cherubim as meaning much knowledge; and the word κιβωτός (which not being aware, as it should seem, of the distinction between the Hebrew כִּבֻּת and the Chaldaic כִּבְרִיתָא, or כִּבְרִיתָא, he says is derived from the Hebrew word תְּבֵנָה), as signifying in ἀνὸς πύργων τόπων.

It would be superfluous to adduce further evidence in support of the position that Clement was altogether ignorant of the Hebrew language.

ORIGEN.—Origen, who was born about the year A.D. 185, was remarkable in his early youth for his acquaintance with Holy Scripture, and his anxiety to attain to its inner meaning. His father Leonidas fell a victim to the persecution of the Christians which broke out at the beginning of the 3rd century. Whilst still a layman and very young, Origen was appointed by Demetrius, the bishop of Alexandria, as the successor of Clement in the catechetical school of that city; and from this time he devoted his energies to the investigation and elucidation of the Scriptures. With a view to accomplish these objects more thoroughly, he is said to have entered upon the study of the Hebrew language—an undertaking which, as is implied in the terms in which it is mentioned by Eusebius and by Jerome (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. c. 16; Hieron. Catal. Script. Eccles.; and Ep. ad Paulam super Obitu Blasillas) was almost unknown in those times. Origen diligently pursued his biblical researches for some years in Palestine, whither he repaired for safety during the persecution which was raised against the Christians in Alexandria on the occasion of the visit of the emperor Caracalla in the year A.D. 216 and his studies were renewed at a later period of his life with fresh vigour both at Caesarea in Palestine and at Caesarea in Cappadocia, after he had been degraded by the African bishops from the order of the priesthood into which he had been admitted by Theoctistus, bishop of Caesarea. It was at Caesarea in Cappadocia that Origen appears to have come into possession of some of the MSS. which had formerly belonged to Symmachus, the Ebionite translator of the Old Testament; but it is a matter of uncertainty at what time he commenced his magnum opus, the Hexapla, or how many years were occupied in its completion. The work itself may be briefly described as follows. It consisted of six columns, whence was derived the name of Hexapla. The first of these contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters; the second, the Hebrew text in Greek characters; the third, the text of Aquila, probably, as being the most literal version of the Hebrew; the fourth, that of Symmachus; the fifth, the Septuagint version; and the sixth, that of Theodotion. Two other anonymous versions called the fifth and the sixth, the extent of which is uncertain, were added to this work, and hence its name of Octopla; whilst, on the other hand, the four Greek versions already mentioned constituted the Tetrapla, to which reference is made by Eusebius as a separate work.¹

The critical value of this work, as it proceeded from the pen of Origen, consisted in the emendation of the Greek text of the Septuagint by the aid of the other versions. This was effected in the following manner. When Origen observed any omission in the text of the Septuagint, he supplied it, marking the place with an asterisk, and adding the initial letter of the translator from whose version the omission was supplied. When he observed any redundancy in the text of the Septuagint, he marked it by prefixing to it an obelisk. He added two points (:) in order to mark how far either an insertion or an omission extended. He also made use of some other signs, the object of which appears to have been to shew the extent of the coincidences between the version of the LXX and that of Theodotion, though Epiphanius gives a different and fanciful interpretation of them based upon the fabulous account of the composition of the Septuagint which was current in his time.

It is reasonable to suppose that the extreme jealousy which the Jews displayed towards the Christians, in regard to the acquisition of the Hebrew language in the time of Jerome was equally strong, and perhaps even stronger, in the time of Origen. His writings, however, afford evidence that he did not fail to avail himself of such opportunities as were afforded him of obtaining assistance from Jewish sources, as—e. g., when he observes, in regard to the dimensions of the ark (in Gen. Hom. ii. 2), that he had obtained information on that subject from one of those who were held in repute among the Hebrews. Again, in his commentary on Psalm iii. 7,¹ in reference to the insertion of the word paralēs by the LXX, and the omission of any equivalent for לחי, lehi, cheek-bone, Origen observes that certain Jews said that the ancient copies differed from those which were then received¹; whilst his references to one of their number, whom he describes as ὁ Ἑβραῖος, are frequent; but if we may judge from this Jew's interpretation of 1 Kings ii. 6, which he appears to have read without the word לחי, lo, not,² the information which Origen derived from these sources, if correctly represented, appears to have been of very unequal value.

Although Origen acquired a high reputation as a scholar amongst his own contemporaries, and was held in equally high estimation by later writers, especially by Jerome, it needs but a slight acquaintance with his works to perceive that his Hebrew scholarship was rather of a traditional than of a critical character, and that he was indebted for the criticisms which he introduced into his writings rather to the information of others than to any original research.

This conclusion appears to be justified by the following considerations:—

1. The language employed by Origen when he had occasion to refer to persons who were conversant with the Hebrew language favours the inference that he did not reckon himself amongst that number. Thus e.g. if we may rely on the Latin version of the Fourteenth Homily on the book of Numbers, Origen says that the name of God is said to be differently written in Hebrew when the true God is denoted, and when a false god is intended; that when the tetragrammaton is found the reference is undoubtedly to the true God, but that in other places the reference is uncertain. He then proceeds to comment thus upon Numbers xxii. 12:—“Aiunt ergo, qui hebraicas literas legunt, in hoc loco Deus, non sub signo tetragrammati esse positum, de quo qui potest, requirat” (tom. vi. p. 393; Wirceburgi, 1783).

We meet with a similar passage in Origen's answer to Celsus (p. 27, cant. 1677), in which he alleges that the word אלמה almah, a virgin, occurs in Deut. xxii. 23, ἡ φάσι, in which place, and indeed throughout the whole of the Pentateuch, if we except Gen. xxiv. 43, and Ex. ii. 8, unless the copies extant in the time of Origen differed from the present Masoretic text, the word is not found, and consequently, Origen's informers must have misled him. It cannot but excite surprise in any case that in the interpretation of so important a passage as Isai. vii. 14, Origen should not have referred to Deut. xxii. 23 for himself, rather than have relied on the information of others. It is important to add that עלמה does not appear to have been found in the text of Deut. xxii. 23 in the time of Jerome, who, in his commentary on Isai. vii. 14, observes, in reference to this passage, “Sub puellae et adolescentulae nomine virgo intelligitur.”

² It is deserving of notice that, notwithstanding the high estimate which Origen formed of the Septuagint version, he observes on this passage that it is possible that the translators may have wished to avoid the use of so common a word as cheek-bone and so substituted without cause for it.

It can hardly be supposed that in thus writing upon a passage, which, as he informs us, he had carefully examined, Origen would have failed to refer to the Hebrew text, had he been accustomed so to do. It is equally difficult, on the supposition that he did consult the Hebrew text, to account for the language which he here employs, if his words are correctly represented in the Latin version which is now extant.

Another illustration of Origen's neglect, or inability to consult the Hebrew text, occurs in the same treatise (i. 55), where he appeals, in support of the Messianic reference of Isaiah liii., to the LXX rendering of v. 8, where they read למוֹת to death, instead of למוֹת upon Him, or upon them.^a

Again, in his Twelfth Homily on Genesis, when explaining the supposed etymology of the name Esau, he acknowledges that his information was borrowed from others: “Ut aiunt qui Hebraea nomina interpretantur;” and again: “Ut aliis visum est.” Moreover, if the Latin version can be trusted, he gives a very confused account of the information which he had received, inasmuch as he assigns as one etymology of Esau that of Edom, viz. “vel a rubore, vel a terra,” whilst he assigns as the other, “factura dictus videtur”—an etymology which connects עֵשָׂו, Esau, with עָשָׂה, asah, fecit. It is probable that Origen derived his information from one of the Onomastica which are still extant both in Greek and Latin. One of the latter gives rubens (ruddy) as one of the meanings of Esau, but it is probable that this meaning has arisen out of a confusion of Esau with Edom. Jerome says (Quaest. Heb. in Gen.), “Et dixit Esau Jacob, da mihi gustum de coctione rubear ista, quia deficio: propterea vocatum est nomen ejus Edom.” On the other hand, it is due to Origen to state that in his Sixth Homily on Exodus (tom. v. p. 400) he gives, according to the Latin version, terrenus as the interpretation of Edom. We have a similar instance of this confusion of etymologies, whether arising from ignorance or from carelessness, in Origen's explanation of the meaning of Syria, which he appears to confound with Aram, and explains as meaning lofty. (Select. in Gen. tom. v. p. 96.) It is unsafe, especially in regard to the works of writers of the first four centuries, to attach too much importance to etymological errors. The following instances, however, when due allowance has been made for the misconceptions and misrepresentations of the editors of his works, will suffice to shew that Origen's Hebrew scholarship was of a very defective nature. In his Selecta in Genesim he explains קטורה, Keturah, as meaning smaller, i.e. he confounds it apparently with קטננה, Ketannah, although elsewhere he explains it as meaning incense. Again, he adopts Philo's explanation of עֲנוֹךְ, Enoch, as meaning thy favour (Die hebräischen Worterklärungen des Philo, von Dr. Carl Siegfried, p. 18, Magdeburg, 1863), and he explains אֲבִי־אָהֵל, Abidah, as meaning the height of my father. He adopts Philo's derivation of Israel, a derivation accepted at one time, though afterwards rejected by Jerome, as if from עֵשֶׂה ish, vir, וָיָדָה vidit, and אֱלֹהִים Deus (ibid. p. 24); and he gives an interpretation of the name Samuel, as if it were derived from שָׁמַיִם sham, ibi, אִשָּׁה ipse, and אֱלֹהִים Deus.

^a Gesenius, in his Commentary on Isaiah, remarks that both Symmachus and Theodotion read למוֹת, and he observes that the reason why neither Origen nor Celsus referred to the difference between the reading of the Hebrew text and that adopted by the LXX was, without doubt, that the Alexandrian Jew understood as little Hebrew as Origen. “Allein der Grund liegt ohne Zweifel darin, dass dieser alexandrinische Jude so wenig hebräisch verstand als Origenes, wie dieses bey den alex. Juden gewöhnlich der Fall war, und von Origenes höchst wahrscheinlich ist.” Commentar über den Jesaja, ii. 184, Leipzig, 1821. Cf. Gesenius, Geschichte der heb. Sprache p. 91, Leipzig, 1815. In exact accordance with the judgment of Gesenius, is that of Redepenning, who writes as follows: “Ob er (i.e. Origenes) ein gründlicher Kenner des Hebräischen oder nur oberflächlich unterrichtet war, darüber hat eine frühere Zeit ganz anders entschieden als fast einstimmig die unsrige.” (Origenes, eine Darstellung seines Lebens und seiner Lehre, i. 367, Bonn, 1841.)

II. Other indications are not wanting of Origen's lack of a critical acquaintance with the Hebrew language. Thus e.g. in his Selecta in Genesim, he endeavours to explain the "solecism" which he finds in the Greek version of Gen. i. 11, βοτάνην χόρτου σπείρον σπέρμα κατὰ γένος, by suggesting the insertion of a stop after χόρτου, and by continuing thus, κατὰ γένος σπείρον σπέρμα, a rendering which it is almost superfluous to observe that no one who had consulted the original would have thought of proposing.

Again, in his Commentary on Ps. ix., Origen follows Philo and the Greek interpreters in supposing that the change made in the name of Sarai consisted in the addition of a second p, i.e. in the change of Σαρα into Σάρρα.^{*} It is true, indeed, that according to the Latin version of his sixth Homily on Genesis, he says, "Puto ergo Saram, quae interpretatur princeps vel principatum agens, formam tenere ἀπερῆς," but when the whole of his fanciful exposition of Gen. xxvi. 7 is taken into account it may well be doubted whether Origen was not one of those to whom St. Augustine referred when he wrote the following words: "Sicut aiunt qui scripserunt interpretationes nominum Hebraeorum, quae his litteris sacris continentur, Sarai (or, as some editions read, Sara), interpretatur princeps mea, Sara (or, as some editions read, Sarra), autem, virtus" (De Civitate Dei, lib. xvi. c. 28).

III. The opinion which has been here expressed as to the small amount of Hebrew scholarship possessed by Origen is confirmed by his servile adherence to the Greek versions, especially the Septuagint, when they widely differ from the Hebrew text. It is true, indeed, that Jerome draws a distinction between Origen's Homilies in which he follows the Greek text, and his more elaborate and scholarly works in which he is said to follow the Hebrew. Moreover, Origen appears to have shared, to a certain extent, the opinion which prevailed during the early ages of the Christian church as to the co-ordinate authority of the Septuagint version, as e.g. in his commentary on the second Psalm, where his remarks upon the tenses employed in the prophecies of the Old Testament by "the Holy Spirit" appear to refer to the Greek version rather than to the Hebrew original. Independently, however, of the consideration that it was the object of Origen's great work, not to restore the text of the LXX to its original form, but rather to shew where, and how, it differed from the Hebrew, and by the aid of other versions to make it more conformable to it, it is almost impossible to suppose that anyone who recognised the authority of the Hebrew text, to the extent to which it is recognised by Origen in his letter to Africanus, in which he speaks of doing away with the Greek version then used in the churches, and procuring a genuine text from the Jews (tom. iv. p. 298), should, except from necessity, not only adopt the LXX as the basis of his commentaries, but should pass over in silence the most palpable divergences of the Greek versions from the Hebrew original, and, in regard to doubtful and obscure passages, should fail to have recourse to the latter for their true interpretation.

The following instances will suffice to illustrate what has been here advanced:—

(1) In his exposition of Gen. ii. 2 (tom. v. p. 70, Wirceburgi, 1783), Origen adopts the reading of the LXX, "the sixth day," without any reference to the Hebrew, which has "the seventh day;" and inasmuch as he adopts the same reading in two places when arguing against Celsus (lib. v. c. 59, and lib. vi. c. 61), it is obvious that the adoption of that reading was not the result of a concession on the part of Origen to the version commonly used by his hearers.

(2) In his homily on Exodus xx., and in his 'De Principiis,' i. 5. 2, Origen adopts the reading of the LXX in his allusion to Deut. xxxii. 8, "according to the number of the angels of God," instead of that of the Hebrew, "according to the number of the children of Israel," and he grounds the remarks which he makes on the passage upon the Greek version without reference to the Hebrew. This is the more remarkable, inasmuch as Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. xxxi.), takes notice of the difference between the Hebrew text and the version of the LXX.

(3) In his Commentary upon Numbers xxiv. 17 (tom. vi. p. 449), he adduces, in proof of the proper humanity of Christ, the reading of the LXX, "And there shall arise a man" (ἄνθρωπος), an argument which it is scarcely probable that he would have used, especially if the passage be viewed in connexion with the context, in which he refers to the rejection of Christ by the Jews, had he been aware that the Hebrew is "And there shall arise a sceptre" (שֵׁבֶט, shebet).

(4) In Origen's Commentary on Jeremiah xi. 19 (tom. ix. p. 480), which appears to have been written subsequently to the year A.D. 245, he adopts as the basis of his remarks the rendering of the LXX, ἐμβάλεμεν ξύλον εἰς τὸν ἄρτον αὐτοῦ, "let us cast wood into his bread," and takes no notice of the entire discrepancy of this rendering from the Hebrew text, הִתְחַשְׁבֵּהוּ

* The origin of this theory appears to have been that the Greek letter p stands for 100. Jerome exposes the fallacy of this etymology in the following words: "Nemo autem in altera lingua quempiam vocans, etymologiam vocabuli sumit ex altera." (Quaest. Heb. in Gen. iv. p. 96 c.)

וְנִלְכֹּם עֵץ "let us destroy the tree with its fruit" (or bread).

(5) In his Commentary on St. Matt. cap. xi., Origen follows the version of the LXX in his quotation from Ps. lxxxi. 7, ai χεῖρες αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ κοφίνῳ ἐδούλευσαν, where it is obvious that the LXX read הַכֵּימָוֶת instead of הַכֵּימָוֶת. It is worthy of observation that whereas in his version of the Psalms according to the LXX, Jerome renders the passage "manus ejus in cophino servierunt," in his version according to the Hebrew he renders it "manus ejus a cophino receperunt."

Once more, when discussing at some length the difference between the Greek and Latin renderings of Gen. xlv. 27 (tom. v. p. 266), it does not seem to have occurred to Origen to refer to the Hebrew text in order to ascertain which of the two versions more nearly accorded with it, whilst in one of the earlier Homilies on the same book, "On the Circumcision of Abraham" (tom. v. 179), where he has occasion, in combating the Ebionites, to compare the text used in the church with the Hebrew text which they (the Ebionites) said to be more correct ("quae veriora dicitis exemplaria"), he alleges that certain words occur in Exodus iv. 10, which are really found in the parallel passage in Exodus vi. 30.

Other indications of the same character, and leading to the same conclusion, are not wanting.

The following is an extract from Origen's Commentary on Ezekiel ix. 2-7, a work which, according to Eusebius (lib. vi. c. 32), was composed during his residence at Caesarea in Palestine, and was finished at Athens, i.e. between A.D. 235 and A.D. 240. "The Seventy say that the man who was clothed with a long robe was commanded to put a sign (σημεῖον) upon the foreheads of those who groaned and were in pain. But Aquila and Theodotion say that the mark of the letter Thau was placed upon their foreheads." Origen then proceeds to give the explanation of the import of this mark as he had received it from three Jews, the last of whom, one who had been converted to Christianity, said that "in the old alphabet the letter Thau resembled the figure of the cross" (tom. ix. p. 282).

Two observations naturally suggest themselves in connexion with this passage. (1) The rendering of Aquila and Theodotion, καὶ σημεῖώσεις τὸ Θαυ,⁹ is nothing but a simple transliteration of the Hebrew text וְהִתְחַוְּתָה תָּו, v'hithvitha tav, and hence had Origen referred to the Hebrew text he would hardly have quoted the version of Aquila and Theodotion. And (2) it is somewhat remarkable that Origen, who, in his Commentary on Ps. ii., refers to the change of Hebrew characters which is said to have been made by Ezra during the captivity (tom. vii. p. 226), should have been unacquainted with the well-known fact that the letter Thau or Tav bore the shape of a cross in the old Hebrew, as well as in other ancient alphabets.

Again, in Origen's letter to Africanus, in defence of the canonicity of the Story of Susanna, he refers to the authority of Aquila, not to the original text itself, in support of the assertion that the words, "Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonished and rose up in haste," &c., are found in Daniel iii. 24 (tom. iv. p. 295), whilst, in the same letter, he affirms that the words "From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it" (Job i. 7), are not found in the Hebrew copies of the book of Job, an assertion which, unless the text used by Origen greatly differed from the present Masoretic text, is utterly without foundation. Moreover, when in doubt as to the Hebrew equivalents of the Greek verbs σχίζω and πρίζω, both of which occur in the LXX (the former frequently), Origen speaks of consulting "not a few Jews," in order to obtain the information which he needed, but it does not seem to have occurred to him to have recourse to the Hebrew Bible, with a view to ascertain the point for himself; whilst the simplicity with which he relates the answer which he received from his Hebrew friends to a similar inquiry respecting the Hebrew equivalents of the trees, σχῖνος and πρίνος, viz., that if Origen could tell them where those words were to be found in the Greek version of the Old Testament they could tell him of what Hebrew words they were the representatives, still further confirms the impression that it had not entered into Origen's head to institute such an examination for himself, or that he was conscious of his own inability to do so. One more specimen of Origen's critical skill, which is found in this letter, is too significant to be overlooked. One of the arguments justly urged by Africanus in proof that the story of Susanna and the Elders had no Hebrew original is the play upon the Greek words just mentioned, viz., σχῖνος and σχίζω and πρίνος and πρίζω. Origen's answer to this argument is that the translators, either found this play upon the Hebrew words, which he vainly endeavoured to ascertain from his Jewish authorities, or that being unable to represent in Greek the play upon words which they found in the Hebrew, they adopted one nearly resembling it. He then illustrates his position by reference to Gen. ii. 23, which, in the Greek version, reads thus, αὕτη κληθήσεται γυνή ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ ἀνδρός αὐτῆς ἐλήφθη αὕτη, "She shall be called woman because she was taken out of man." He observes upon this passage that the Jews say that a woman is called ἑσσα, יֵשָׁא, issah. He then says that this word ἑσσα (we presume he means a word pronounced in the same manner), means I took, ἔλαβον, in proof of which he refers to Ps. cxvi. 13, which, in the Hebrew, reads thus, כִּי יָצַק יְיָ דִּיב, kos yeshuoth essa, and in the Greek, ποτήριον σωτηρίου λήψομαι, "I will take the cup of salvation," and thus, making the play upon words to consist in the double meaning of the word ἑσσα, he adduces this as an analogous case to the play of the Greek translators upon σχῖνος and σχίζω, and πρίνος and πρίζω.⁹ It would be easy to multiply indications of Origen's habitual disregard of the Hebrew text, of his constant recurrence to Jewish authority upon points on which it is difficult to account for such recurrence on the supposition that he was capable of pronouncing an independent opinion,^r and of the singular errors into which he has fallen when he ventures into the domain of Hebrew criticism.

⁹ Theodotion appears to have adopted the same etymology of the word; "assumptio quia ex viro sumpta est." (Hieron. Quaest. in Gen.)

It may, indeed, be justly urged in opposition to the view here expressed of the extent of Origen's Hebrew scholarship that it is absolutely impossible that the blunders thus ascribed to him could have been committed by anyone who was capable of accomplishing the herculean task of copying out the whole of the Hebrew Bible, of transliterating the same into Greek characters, and of comparing the whole of the received Greek version, clause by clause, with the original and with the three (or five) other Greek translations. The force of this argument cannot be resisted if the premises are allowed. But if, after due allowance has been made for the errors which may have crept into the Greek text of Origen's writings, and after still greater allowance has been made for those of the Latin translator, there appears conclusive evidence that Origen's scholarship was utterly inadequate to the task of a just discrimination between a true and a false rendering of the Hebrew text, we are reduced to the consideration of the plausibility of any theory upon which we can account for the execution of a work involving such prodigious labour, and apparently executed with a considerable amount of learning, as well as with an almost incredible amount of industry, by one who does not appear to have possessed the requirements necessary for such an undertaking. Now the number and the nature of the allusions made by Origen to his Jewish instructors seem to justify the conclusion that he was more largely indebted to their aid than has been commonly supposed. There is no difficulty in the supposition that the first two columns of the Hexapla, containing the Hebrew text and the transliteration of the same in Greek characters may have been the exclusive work of Origen's Jewish amanuenses. Nor is there any insuperable difficulty, as it should seem, in the supposition that an extremely small amount of Hebrew scholarship may have sufficed for Origen's share in the correction of the text of the Septuagint by the aid of the other versions. An accomplished Hebrew scholar may well be supposed to have rendered the Hebrew text literally into Greek, whilst Origen compared the version of the LXX with that rendering, marking with the obelus those passages which had no corresponding words in the original, and in the case of omissions, inserting from one or other of the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the words which most nearly corresponded with the oral version of the Jew. Some such theory as this appears to offer the most probable solution of the problem how a work of such immense labour and importance, as the Hexapla undoubtedly was, could have been the production of one whose critical scholarship appears to have been so unequal to the task.

This theory receives some confirmation from the fact that we have no sufficient evidence of the Hebrew scholarship of Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, or of Hesychius, the Egyptian bishop, both of whom undertook to amend the text of the Septuagint about the beginning of the 4th century, and whose recensions are mentioned by Jerome in his second book against Rufinus, as being in common use in the countries to which they respectively belonged (iii. p. 102).

^r It is easy to account for references to Jewish authority in certain cases in which a writer might have been capable of forming an independent judgment, especially at a time at which the knowledge of Hebrew was almost confined to one people. This consideration, however, does not suffice to account for many of Origen's references to information obtained from his Jewish authorities.

THE CLEMENTINE WRITINGS.—The arguments which have been adduced in support of the Eastern origin of the document to which the Clementine writings owe their existence entitle these works to a short notice in the present article. At the same time the uncertainty which exists as to their authorship, and as to the date of the composition of their respective portions, detracts in no small measure from the value of the results of any minute examination of their contents with a view to ascertain whether the writers did, or did not, possess any acquaintance with the Hebrew language.

THE CLEMENTINE HOMILIES.—(1) In Hom. iii. c. xxv., we read that "Cain is interpreted both possession and envy." The reason assigned for the name in Gen. iv. 1 connects its etymology with the verb קָנָה, Kanah, which means to acquire or possess. The alternative etymology (which is adopted in c. xli.) connects it with קָנָה, Kana, which in the Piel signifies to be envious or jealous.

(2) In Hom. iii. c. xxvi. it is said that "without any ambiguity Abel is translated grief." It is obvious that the writer, if acquainted with Hebrew at all, identified אֶבֶל with אָבֵל, and transferred to the former of these words the meaning which belongs to the latter.

(3) In Hom. iii. c. 45, the meaning of the place Kibroth-hattaavah, קִבְרוֹת הַתַּאֲוָה (Num. xi. 34), is explained to be βουρὸς ἐπιθυμιῶν, to which explanation, if designed as a literal rendering, exception may be taken on the ground that the Hebrew word for graves is in the plural number, and the Hebrew word denoting lust is in the singular number.

(4) In Hom. iii. c. 47, the LXX version of Deut. xxxiv. 6, ἐγγὺς οἴκου Φωγάρ, is adopted.

(5) In Hom. iii. c. 49, the LXX version of Gen. xlix. 10 is for the most part followed, but instead of τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, we find οὗ ἐστὶν as the rendering of שִׁלוֹ, Shiloh, as if equivalent to לְשִׁלוֹ.

(6) In Hom. viii. c. 5, the LXX version of Exodus xix. 9 is adopted almost verbatim.

(7) The quotation from Exodus xxii. 28, in Hom. xvi. c. 6, follows the LXX almost verbatim, but in the quotation from Deut. iv. 33 in the same chapter, the word ἄρεος is inserted before Θεὸς and reasoned on by Simon, and the insertion is not noticed in the following chapter by Peter.

There does not appear to be sufficient evidence that the writers of this work or of the Recognitions possessed any acquaintance with Hebrew.

EUSEBIUS, the father of Ecclesiastical History, was born in Palestine about A.D. 264, and became bishop of Caesarea A.D. 315. It might be anticipated from the country in which he lived, and from the subjects on which he wrote, as well as from his admiration of the learning of Origen, and his frequent references to the Hexapla, that he would have acquired some acquaintance with Hebrew. A very slight examination of his writings, however, will suffice to shew that, in this respect, he was not in advance of the age in which he lived.

If, e. g., we refer to his Præparatio Evangelica (lib. xi. c. 6), we shall find an explanation of the meaning of many Hebrew words and proper names, from which we select the following particulars:—

(1) The Hebrew word עִנּוֹשׁ, enosh, man, as distinguished from אָדָם, adam, man, is said to mean forgetful, and reference is made to Ps. viii. 4, by way of proof. "What is man (עִנּוֹשׁ) that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man (אָדָם) that thou visitest him?"

(2) Eusebius says that Moses rightly called heaven στερέωμα, firmament, because it was a solid (στερεόν) body, and one perceptible to the senses. How utterly remote the Hebrew word עָרָב, expansæ, is from the notion of solidity, is well known to everyone who is acquainted with its etymology.

(3) He explains Israel in common with Philo, Origen, Lactantius, and (at one time) Jerome, as one who sees God, i.e. as if derived from שָׂרָא, הָרָא and לָא (cf. lib. v. c. 11; Demonst. Evangel. lib. vi. c. 15).

Again, the remarks of Eusebius upon Habakkuk iii. 2 are scarcely reconcilable with the supposition that he was able to read the Hebrew text. Having first given the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, all of whom appear to have translated from the present Masoretic text, he proceeds, apparently without being conscious that the LXX took the word שָׁנִים, shanim, years, for the numeral שְׁנַיִם, shnayim, two, and that they read the following word, חַיִּיתִי, as if some form of the noun חַיִּית, life or beast, to explain the passage in accordance with the version of the LXX (ἐν μέσῳ δύο ζώων), as having reference to the divine and human natures of Christ. In the same chapter Eusebius explains the proper name תְּמָנִי, Temian, as meaning consummation, συντέλεια, as though derived from תָּמַל; and once more, in the 18th chapter of the same work, he explains the meaning of the proper name אַזַּל, Azal (Zech. xiv. 5), as understood by the Hebrews, to be the work of God, θελοῖ δὲ τοῦτο κατὰ τὴν Ἑβραίων φωνὴν ποίησιν Θεοῦ. It is true, as Eusebius observes, that the form of the word adopted by the LXX is Ἀσάλα, which, according to the sound, would naturally suggest to the mind of anyone acquainted with Hebrew the two words פָּעַל, fecit, and אֱלֹהִים, Deus, and it is easy to imagine that, when thus pronounced, Eusebius may have received from a Jew the etymology which he has here recorded. It is difficult, however, to suppose that anyone who had consulted the Hebrew text, and who possessed a competent knowledge of the language, could have accepted such an explanation.

We will now adduce some other instances of the imperfect Hebrew scholarship of Eusebius, as we find them in his Demonstratio Evangelica (Parisii, fol. 1628).

(1) In book vii. c. 2, in common with other early writers, Eusebius not only confounds Nazarene with Christ, but relying on the LXX version of Lev. xxi. 12, he takes oil to be the meaning of the Hebrew word נֶזֶר, nezer, Ps. l.

(2) In chap. i. of the same work, he confounds the word שִׁלּוֹחַ, Shiloh (Gen. xlix. 10,) with שִׁלּוֹחַ (or שִׁלְחָה), Shiloah (Is. viii. 6), and he does so, notwithstanding that he gives the correct meaning of the latter word, viz. sent, whilst he quotes the LXX version of the former, viz. ὃ ἀπόκειται, he for whom it is kept.

(3) In his exposition of Jer. xxiii. 5 (lib. vii. c. 3), he transliterates the Hebrew words מְרִיטֵי צְדָקָה by ἰσώδεκεται, and explains the meaning to be οἱ τοῦ Θεοῦ δίκαιοι, the righteous ones of God.

(4) When referring to the words of Ps. xxii. 1, as uttered by our Lord upon the cross, Eusebius speaks of them twice as if they were the very words of the Psalmist, not the Syro-Chaldaic version of them (lib. x. c. 8). It is remarkable that such an error should be committed by a resident in Palestine.

(5) At the end of the 8th book of the Demonstratio Evangelica, Eusebius has occasion to cite Is. xix. 20. Having quoted the version of the LXX καὶ ἀποστελεῖ αὐτοῖς Κύριος ἄνθρωπον ὃς σώσει αὐτούς, he takes occasion to correct this rendering of עֲשֵׂה, and observes that according to the Hebrew the passage is καὶ ἀποστελεῖ αὐτοῖς Κύριος Σατῆρα ὃς σώσει αὐτούς, a rendering which is open to one or other of these objections, viz. that it either doubly translates עֲשֵׂה, or that Eusebius failed to perceive that the second σώσει αὐτούς, which occurs in the LXX at the end of the verse, is the rendering not of עֲשֵׂה, but of לְצַחֵק.

It would be easy to multiply illustrations of the imperfect Hebrew scholarship of Eusebius. It is due, however, to so eminent a man and so voluminous a writer, to notice the aid which his writings afford in the recovery of a portion of the great work of Origen, as will at once appear, even on the most cursory reference to Dr. Field's edition of the remains of the Hexapla.

EPHRAIM THE SYRIAN, or Ephrem Syrus (as he is commonly called), is said to have been born at Nisibis early in the 4th century, and he died about the year A.D. 370. He was born of Christian parents, and, according to some accounts, was instructed in Christianity by James, the bishop of Nisibis. He was ordained as a deacon by Basil the Great at Caesarea, but the greater part of his life was spent at Edessa, where he expounded the scriptures to a large number of scholars. He is commonly thought to have remained in deacon's orders throughout life, but he speaks of himself as having hidden the talent of the priesthood in the earth through idleness (tom. iii. p. 467; Assemani, Rom. 1733), and his refusal of the episcopate confirms his own statement that he had been admitted into the order of the priesthood. His works occupy six folio volumes, three of which contain his Syriac writings, and the remaining three the Greek writings commonly ascribed to him, and which are supposed to consist of translations from the Syriac. The former of these appear to have been considerably interpolated; and there is much doubt as to the genuineness of some of the latter, although we are told by Sozomen that some of the writings of Ephraim were translated into Greek during the lifetime of the author, and we find references to them in the works of Chrysostom and other contemporary writers.

If any inference respecting Ephrem's knowledge of Hebrew may be drawn from the Greek works which are ascribed to him, that inference would be of an unfavourable character, as will appear from the following instances, taken from his Paraenesis, which might be indefinitely multiplied:—

(1) Ephrem adopts the reading of the LXX in Gen. v. 22, "two hundred" where the Hebrew and the Syriac Peshito read "three hundred" (Paraenesis xlix. p. 341; Ox. 1709).

(2) In his reference to Gen. xxii. 13, although Ephrem does not quote the words of the LXX, viz. κατεχόμενος ἐν φυτῷ Σαβὲκ, he was evidently as much perplexed as to the meaning of the Hebrew word שֶׁבַע sebek as were the LXX, and he appears to have regarded it as the name of some particular tree or shrub, ἰδοὺ κριθὸς δέβεται ἐν τῇ φυτῇ τοῦ σαβέκ (In Abraham et Isaac, Opp. ii. p. 318; Romae, 1743).

(3) In the twenty-ninth Paraenesis (ib. p. 295), Ephrem, in opposition to the present punctuation and division of the Hebrew verses, and to the Peshito version, connects the word Jerusalem with v. 1 of Ps. cxv. instead of v. 2, and reads ὁ κατοικῶν Ἱερουσαλήμ.

(4) In his quotation from Prov. ii. 13, in Paraenesis xl. (ib. p. 315), Ephrem departs both from the Hebrew and the Syriac, and adheres nearly to the LXX.

(5) In his quotation from Prov. xxviii. 1, Ephrem adds the words ἐν τῇ αὐτοῦ πολλῇ παρησίᾳ, which are not found in the Hebrew, the Syriac, or the LXX, and which appear to be a free rendering of the Vulgate, "absque terrore erit." (Paraenesis xlviii. ; ib. p. 339.)

(6) In the fifteenth Paraenesis Ephrem adopts the LXX rendering of Isaiah xxxi. 9; Μακάριος ὁς ἔχει ἐν Σιών σπέρμα καὶ οὐκ εὐρύσκει ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμ (ib. p. 276), a rendering which entirely differs from the Hebrew and the Syriac, and concerning which Jerome writes thus: "Sic interpretari possumus ut dicamus praesentis loci sensui convenire."

(7) When quoting from Isaiah li. 8 in his forty-first Paraenesis (ib. p. 316), Ephrem follows the LXX, who seem to have read the word לַיָּמִים instead of לַיָּמִים moth, where again he has no support from the Syriac.

(8) In his quotation from Habakkuk iii. 2, (Paraenesis xliii. ; ib. p. 328), where the LXX follow an entirely different reading from that of the present Masoretic text, Ephrem adopts the rendering of the LXX. The Peshito version in this place does not entirely follow the Masoretic text, but agrees much more closely with it than does that of the LXX.

(9) In the quotation in the same Paraenesis, from the 16th verse of the same chapter of Habakkuk, where, as Jerome observes, all the versions differ widely from the Hebrew, Ephrem follows the LXX (ib.).

He does not, however, invariably follow the LXX in his Greek writings, or rather in those works which now exist in Greek, as e.g. in his sermon on "The life-giving Cross of the Lord," where he adopts the interpolated words from the tree, which have the support neither of the Syriac nor of the LXX. On the other hand, in a quotation from Ps. xxxix. 4, Ephrem adopts the rendering of the Syriac, "If there is craft in my tongue," where the Hebrew has only לִשְׁוֹן word, and where the LXX have λόγος ἔδικος.

It may fairly, however, be questioned whether the evidence here adduced does not point to the inaccuracy of the translation of Ephrem's Syriac works into Greek, inasmuch as it is, in the highest degree, improbable that Ephrem should habitually have followed the LXX, where that version differs as much from the Syriac as from the Hebrew.

The instances which follow are taken, for the most part, from his Rhythms (portions of which have been translated from the Syriac by Mr. Morris, and published at Oxford in 1847), and will suffice to shew that Ephrem in his Syriac works quotes habitually from the Peshito version, and that he does not appear to have made much use of the original Hebrew.

(1) In his quotation from Ps. lxxii. 17, Ephrem, in common with the Syriac and the Chaldean versions, regards the second member of the first clause of the verse as having reference to the past, and reads, "His name was before the sun," instead of reading, according to the present Masoretic text and the version of the LXX, "His name shall continue (or be continued) as long as (or before) the sun."

(2) In his quotation from Gen. xlix. 10, 11 (Rhythm against the Jews, c. 18), Ephrem follows the Syriac in rendering שֹׁפֵט, lawgiver (or staff of the ruler), by expositor or interpreter, but in the following verse he does not follow the Syriac and the LXX in regarding בְּנִי as a form of the construct-state of the noun, but translates it (perhaps accidentally) as if taken directly from the Hebrew my son; whilst, on the other hand, in the twenty-seventh chapter of the same Rhythm he renders the same words, "the ass's foal."

(3) In his quotation from Amos vii. 7 (ib. c. 19) Ephrem follows the Syriac and the LXX in rendering אֲדָמָנִת adamant.

(4) In his paraphrase of Is. xlix. 14, &c. (ib. c. 20), Ephrem follows the LXX against the Hebrew and the Syriac in making the walls the subject of the verb: "I have graven thy walls."

(5) In his fifty-third Rhythm Ephrem, with evident allusion to Deut. xxxi. 26, speaks of the words of chaste women as being placed in the ark. It is evident that he has here followed the Syriac version, which has "in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord," instead of the Hebrew, which has בְּצִד "at the side," and with which the LXX and the Chaldean agree.

(6) In his Commentary on 2 Kings ii. 9, Ephrem adopts the Peshito text, which does not retain (as the LXX has) the same rendering of the Hebrew בְּנִי 'D, which is found in the Syriac version of Deut. xxii. 17, and consequently overlooks the obvious reference to the elder son's portion of his father's goods, which is there denoted.

(7) A yet stronger proof of Ephrem's ignorance

* The introduction of the past tense instead of the future in the Syriac and Chaldean versions probably arose (as Mr. Morris suggests in his translation of the select works of Ephrem, p. 67, note) from the fact that some of the Jews regarded the word בְּנִי or בְּנִי as a proper name. "Before the sun His name was known."

or neglect of the Hebrew text is found in the argument which he derives from the alleged use of the plural verb in Gen. xi. 7, where the Syriac and the Chaldee have "Come ye," but where the Hebrew has the singular הָבִי . The LXX $\delta\epsilon\upsilon\tau\epsilon$ cannot be alleged on either side, inasmuch as it is used in conjunction both with singular and with plural verbs. It is possible, indeed, inasmuch as Ephrem occasionally refers to readings found in the Hebrew, that there may have been a different reading in this case, but no other reading is now known to exist.

Once more, amongst the extracts from the unprinted MS. containing Ephrem's Commentary on Jonah, Assemani gives the following: "Jonah began to enter into Nineveh a journey of three days, and he preached and said, 'Within, or yet, forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.' The Greek reads, 'There are yet three days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.'"¹ Ephrem endeavours to reconcile the discrepancy thus:—"Now both of these are true; for it is written in the Hebrew copies thus, 'Jonah began to enter into the city in forty days.'"² He then proceeds to explain the forty days as dating from the time when Jonah escaped from the fish's belly and began his journey to Nineveh, and the three days as occupied in preaching in the city. It deserves to be noticed that whereas Ephrem in this place limits not only the preaching of Jonah, but also the period of reprieve assigned to the Ninevites to three days, the whole of this Metrical Homily on the Repentance of Nineveh, which has been translated, with an introduction and notes, by Dr. Burgess, proceeds on the view commonly entertained by the Syrians, in accordance with the Hebrew text, that the period of reprieve was not three but forty days. The object, however, for which the quotation from Ephrem's Commentary is here adduced is to shew that unless the Hebrew text of Jonah iii. 4, to which Ephrem refers, differed from the present Masoretic text, either Ephrem had never consulted it, or he was unable to comprehend it.

Upon the whole, it is clear that if Ephrem was able to consult the Hebrew text, he made but little use of the knowledge which he possessed, and that he relied mainly on the Peshito in his Syriac writings; and that the version of the LXX is, for the most part, adopted in those of his writings which are now extant only in Greek. Mr. Morris, indeed, refers, as a proof of Ephrem's acquaintance with the Hebrew, to the fact that he notices the various reading in 2 Kings viii. 10, לֹא , to him instead of נֹא not, as in the Masoretic text. The various reading is here obviously the correct one, and is adopted by the Vulgate, the Syriac, and the Chaldee, but Ephrem probably obtained his information from Jewish sources.³

CYRIL OF JERUSALEM.—Amongst those early fathers of the church who might reasonably be expected to have been acquainted with Hebrew

² Cf. the article EPHRAIM THE SYRIAN (p. 137), in which Ephraim's knowledge of Hebrew is discussed at some length, the conclusions arrived at being substantially those of the present article.—EDD we must include Cyril, who was born about A.D. 315, probably in, or near Jerusalem, and who was bishop of that city about thirty-five years. We should the rather have expected to find indications of such knowledge in the writings of Cyril because, whilst they do not afford evidence of any great amount of ability or eloquence, they contain ample proof of the intimate acquaintance of the writer with the books both of the Old and of the New Testament.

We should not be justified in inferring that Cyril was altogether ignorant of Hebrew from the fact of his adherence to the Greek version of the Old Testament, even in passages in which it fails to represent the true meaning of the original,⁴ (1) because in many cases these variations do not materially affect the general scope of the passage, or the argument of the writer, and therefore the version in common use amongst his hearers may have been employed just as the A.V. is by ourselves, even when the rendering is known to be not strictly accurate; and (2) because it appears from Lecture IV. c. 34, that Cyril was one of those who ascribed divine authority to the Septuagint version. His opinion on this point deserves notice. Having first related the traditional account of the verbal agreement of the translations independently made, as alleged, by the 72 interpreters, he continues thus: "For the matter was not one of witty invention, or a contrivance of man's cunning devices; but the interpretation of the divine Scriptures, spoken by the Holy Ghost, was, of the Holy Ghost, accomplished." (Library of the Fathers, ii. p. 50, Oxford, 1839.)

Independently, however, of the numerous citations which Cyril makes from the LXX,⁵ in which that version differs very materially from the Hebrew, the following instances will suffice to show that he did not possess even a superficial acquaintance with the Hebrew language.

(1) In Lecture I. 14, Cyril writes thus: "That Samuel may come, and thy barren soul may hear the salvation of God who hears prayer; for this is the meaning of the word Samuel." Now it is quite true that different opinions exist as to the true derivation of the name Samuel; some deriving it from שָׁמַעַל , Sham El, name of God, others from שָׁמַעַל אֱלֹהִים , Sham'el-El, asked of God (Josephus renders it by the Greek name Thesetetus, $\Theta\epsilon\sigma\epsilon\tau\eta\tau\omicron\varsigma$), and others again, and, as we think, correctly from שָׁמַעַל אֱלֹהִים , Shamuel El, heard by (or of) God; but, unless Cyril has very imperfectly expressed his meaning, he has assigned to the name a derivation of which it is altogether incapable.

(2) In Lecture II. 9, Cyril writes thus in

etc. etc.

reference to Rahab: "And if thou wouldest receive a written witness that she was saved, thou hast it recorded in the Psalms, 'I will think upon Rahab and Babylon,' but with this added, 'with them that know me.' On men therefore, and likewise on women, is salvation, viz. that which is secured to us through repentance."* (ib. p. 18.) The Hebrew scholar will perceive that Cyril has been misled by the Greek version, which reads Ῥαββ in Josh. ii. 1 and Ps. lxxxvii. 4, whereas the name of Rahab the harlot is in Hebrew רַחַב, rachab, i.e. wide, whilst the allegorical name of Egypt, in writings subsequent to Isaiah (cf. xxx. 7), is רַחַב, rahab, i.e. tumultuous violence, a word different in orthography as well as in meaning from the former.

(3) In Lecture X. c. 4 we read thus: "Fitly is He called Jesus deriving His name from His salutary medicine." This remark refers to the Greek word, Ἰησοῦς, and to its supposed derivation from ἰάομαι, as Cyril says in c. 13, "Jesus then means among the Hebrews 'a Saviour,' but in the Greek tongue 'a Healer' (ὁ ἰάμενος)." The fact that Cyril should seriously imagine that there is any connexion between Ἰησοῦς and ἰάομαι is somewhat remarkable. But, further, in the 11th chapter of the same Lecture we read thus: "And He has two names, Jesus Christ; Jesus because He saves, Christ because of His priesthood. And, knowing this, the inspired prophet Moses conferred these two titles on two most special men, changing the name of his own successor in the government, Anses, to Jesus, and surnaming his own brother Aaron, Christ, that by two special men he might represent at once the high-priesthood and the kingdom of Him who was to come, the One Jesus Christ." (ib. p. 104.) The origin of the statement respecting Aaron is, we presume, the Greek rendering of Lev. iv. 5, where the Hebrew is הַכֹּהֵן הַמָּשִׁיחַ, the anointed priest, and the Greek ὁ ἱερεὺς ὁ Χριστός. It is obvious that had Cyril been capable of referring to the Hebrew text he would not have made this singular statement.

(4) In Lecture X. c. 16, Cyril writes thus: "Your name was 'Jews' and 'Israelites' in the time of Moses and the other prophets, and after the return from Babylon, and up to the present time." This statement indicates something more than the lack of Hebrew knowledge on the part of Cyril. It is quite true that there are passages in the book of Jeremiah,† as well as in the later books of the Old Testament, in which the word "Jews" may be understood as comprising more than the subjects of the kingdom of Judah. But when Cyril speaks of the name "Jews" as being used in the days of Moses, he betrays not only ignorance of the use of the Hebrew word יְהוּדִים (Yehudim), but also of that of its Greek equivalent, Ἰουδαῖοι.

* The editor of the Oxford translation, in a footnote, vindicates Cyril's fanciful reasoning in the following words: "And as what is said of Hagar in Gen. xxi. 10 is meant of Jerusalem, so Rahab may really be named in this Psalm yet Egypt meant as its scope." This note has obviously escaped the eye of the learned Regius Professor of Hebrew whose name stands first amongst the editors of the Library of the Fathers.

† Thus, e. g. in Jer. xxxiv. 9, עֲבָדֵי יְהוָה Hebrew, and יְהוּדִים Jew, appear to be used as synonymous words.

(5) In Lecture XIII. c. 9, Cyril says that "Judas" means confession." Now it is quite true that the Hebrew verb יָדָה (Yadah) from which Judas = Judah is derived, bears the meaning to confess, as well as to praise. There are two passages in Genesis in which reference is made to the meaning of the name, viz. chap. xix. 35 and chap. xlix. 8. In the latter of these passages we read thus: "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise;" where the LXX has ἀνέσουσιν or (according to another reading) ἀνέσασιν. Cyril does not appear to have had this passage in his mind, but to have grounded his observation upon the LXX version of Gen. xix. 35, where, instead of rendering the Hebrew verb by ἀνέω, as in xlix. 8, the LXX substitute ἐξομολογέομαι; and whereas we rightly read in the A.V. "Now will I praise the Lord," they read, Νῦν ἔτι τοῦτο ἐξομολογήσομαι Κυρίῳ. It is possible indeed that this instance ought to be adduced, not so much as a proof of Cyril's ignorance of Hebrew, as of his blind adherence to the LXX. We think, however, that it may fairly be alleged as one amongst many proofs that Cyril derived his knowledge of the Old Testament solely from the Greek, inasmuch as the rendering of the LXX in this place can scarcely be regarded, in any just sense of the word, as a translation of the original.

(6) In Lecture XIII. c. 11, Cyril expends some labour on the attempt to prove that there is no discrepancy between the account contained in Zech. xi. 13, where, as he alleges, the prophet states that the thirty pieces of silver were cast into "the refining house," and that contained in St. Matthew xxvii. 7, which speaks of "the potter's field." It will be obvious (1) that Cyril does not touch upon the real difficulty involved in the interpretation of the words of Zechariah (xi. 13); and (2) that Cyril's difficulty arises altogether out of his ignorance that "the refining house" (τὸ χωνευτήριον) is not found in the Hebrew, which has, as the A.V. has rendered it, "to the potter" (לְהַיָּצֵר). It is worthy of observation that Jerome remarks upon the discrepancy between the translation of the LXX and the words of the Evangelist. He adds, however, "Sed et in Hebraeo cum sensus idem sit, verba praepostera sunt, et pene diversa" (Ep. ad Pammachium, iii. p. 167)."

(7) In Lecture XIII. c. 27, Cyril writes thus: "Esaias saith, 'Who is this that cometh from Edom? the redness of His garments is from Bosor;' (who is this who for a dishonour weareth purple? for Bosor hath in Hebrew this meaning)." The only key which we can discover to this extraordinary statement is that in Micah ii. 12, the LXX appear to have read בְּצָרָה (ἐν θλίψει), instead of בְּצָרָה. Jerome in his Commentary on Micah explains the word in the same way, "in tribulatione." Jerome's alternative explanation of the meaning of the word, viz. flesh, arises out of his view of the interchangeableness of the sibilants שׁ and ס.

EPIPHANIUS.—Epiphanius, bishop of Constantia, the ancient Salamis of Cyprus, was born in the early part of the 4th century at Besandus, a village of Palestine, not far from Eleutheropolis, and was brought up by the monks of Palestine. He is said to have been of Jewish extraction, and to have been acquainted with the Hebrew, the Egyptian, the Greek, and to some extent, the Latin languages, in addition to his native tongue, the Syriac. The writings of Epiphanius bear witness to a certain amount of familiarity with the Hebrew language, as will appear from the following instances.

* He rightly renders the Hebrew words לְהַיָּצֵר "ad statuarium."

When speaking of the different names given to the Christians, he distinguishes between Nazarenes and Nazirites; i.e. between a word derived probably from נָצַר, netzer, a shoot, and a word derived from נָזַר, nazar, to separate; and he observes that our Lord was called a Nazarene after the name of the city Nazareth, in which he was brought up; whereas he explains Nazirites as persons sanctified or dedicated to God, as was Samson. (Adversus Haereses, lib. 1, tom. ii. c. 5. Haer. 29, tom. i. p. 121, fol. Colon. 1682.) It deserves notice that when speaking of the tenets of the heretical sect who assumed the name of Nazarenes, he says that they were admirably skilled in the Hebrew language, and that the books of the Old Testament were read by them in Hebrew as by the Jews. (Ib. p. 123.)

Again, when Epiphanius has occasion to refer to the words uttered by our Lord upon the cross, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani," he lays great stress upon the fact that this quotation from Ps. xxii. 1 does not accord with the Hebrew original, but that having pronounced the words "Eli, Eli," our Lord uttered the words which follow in the Syriac tongue (ib. p. 792). Now this statement is not entirely correct, inasmuch as the word lama (or as it is printed in Petavius's edition of Epiphanius, λημᾶ) does not accord with the Syriac lemanā, but with the Hebrew lama. The verb, however, is, as Epiphanius observes, not the Hebrew word asabtani, but the Aramaic word shebachtani.

Again, when Epiphanius quotes the first verse of Psalm cxli., he does not adhere to the Hebrew, but, as if quoting from memory, he substitutes קִרִּית אֱלִי for קִרְאָתִי; he inserts the words שִׁמְעֵנָּה אֱלֹהִים, let God hear, which do not occur in the original, and he substitutes for הִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה הָאֲדָמָה הַזֶּה the words ἡ βεβηλωμένη ἀκρόα, as they stand in the Greek text of Petavius, which probably represent the Hebrew words, יְבִיט הָאָדָמָה הַזֶּה, yabbat hakkhol, let Him have regard to the voice (tom. ii. p. 163). Other explanations may be given of these variations, but they are, at least, consistent with the theory that Epiphanius was familiar with Hebrew as a spoken language, and that, in quoting from memory, he readily substituted one form of expression for another, and whilst deviating, whether by insertion or by omission from the original, preserved the general sense of the passage which he designed to reproduce.

Once more, when referring to the words of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 3, Epiphanius points out the departure of the LXX from the Hebrew in rendering אֶל הָאֱלֹהִים μὴ ἐκδέσθης, and he observes that the Hebrew words may be rendered μὴ ἀνακλῆσθαι (ib. ii. p. 100), or μὴ προστεθείης, or μὴ περισσεύης.

But whilst thus displaying a certain familiarity with Hebrew as a language which has many points of affinity to his native Syriac, Epiphanius, in common with the other early fathers who possessed some slight knowledge of Hebrew, shews that his knowledge was not of a critical character.

Thus, e.g., whilst rightly explaining אֱלֹהִים, El, as meaning God, he explains אֱלֹהִים, Elohim, as meaning God always, or for ever, supposing probably that it was equivalent to אֱלֹהֵי עוֹלָם, El olam, 'the everlasting God' (Gen. xxi. 33), (i. p. 792).

Again he explains אֱלֹהֵינוּ, Israel, as meaning God; יְיָ, Jah, as meaning Lord, Κύριος; אֲדֹנָי, Adonai, as ὁ θεὸς Κύριος; יְהוָה יֵשׁוּעַ, Yahveh, as θεὸς ἡσυχίας καὶ εἰρήνης καὶ ἀεὶ ὢν (tom. i. p. 296).

It is difficult to account for three out of these four explanations.

As another instance of false etymology we may refer to the derivation of יָדָה, a measure, from יָדָה, confess, and the somewhat amusing vindication of this etymology in the words πληρωθῆναι γὰρ ὁ μόδιος ὁμολογεῖ ὅτι πεπλήρωται (tom. ii. p. 181).

It is deserving of notice, moreover, that when Epiphanius has occasion to refer to Gen. i. 2, he adopts the Greek version of the passage, Καὶ συνετέλεσεν ὁ θεὸς πάντα ἐν τῇ ἑκτῇ ἡμέρᾳ, instead of following the Hebrew, which has the seventh day (tom. ii. p. 179).

JEROME.—Eusebius Hieronymus Sophronius, the son of Eusebius, a Christian, was born at Stridon in Dalmatia, as some say about the year A.D. 329, but, as seems more probable, about the year 346, and he died at Bethlehem on Sept. 30, A.D. 420. He was sent to Rome at the age of eighteen, and after a residence of some years in that city, during which he studied under the grammarian Donatus, he travelled in the East and in the West. In the desert of Chalcis, near Antioch, about the year A.D. 374, he devoted himself to the study of Hebrew. In A.D. 382 he returned to Rome, and after the death of pope Damasus he retired to Bethlehem (about A.D. 387), where he continued until his death, pursuing the study of Hebrew with renewed ardour. Up to this time Jerome's work in respect to biblical revision had been chiefly restricted to corrections of the old Latin version by the aid of the Greek. About A.D. 390 he began his new translations from the Hebrew, a work which appears to have extended over a period of about fifteen years, and, notwithstanding the numerous defects which exist in the version of Jerome, of some of which he was himself fully conscious, and which were almost inseparable from the imperfect scholarship of his age and the haste with which some portions of the work were executed, his magnum opus, commonly known as the Vulgate, will ever remain a noble and unique monument of the linguistic skill, as well as of the indomitable courage and perseverance of its highly-gifted author.

Whatever opinion may be formed of the philological accuracy of Jerome's Hebrew scholarship, his superiority in this respect to all the ecclesiastical writers who preceded him, and to all who for many centuries followed him, will be universally allowed. At the same time it is a task of considerable difficulty to determin-

The precise nature and extent of Jerome's obligations to his Hebrew teachers (Barrabanus and others), and thus to discriminate accurately between those criticisms which were original, and those for which he was indebted to his Jewish instructors. Some idea of the extent to which Jerome was indebted to Jewish sources of information may be gathered from the comparison instituted by Rahmer, in his Die hebräischen Traditionen in den Werken des Hieronymus, of the Quaestiones in Genesim, with the Hebrew traditions preserved in the Talmud and other Jewish writings. The following instances will suffice by way of example:—

1) In Gen. ii. 8, where the A.V. reads "And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden," Jerome's translation is "Plantaverat autem Dominus Deus paradisum in Eden, a principio." This interpretation of the Hebrew word עֵדֶן is found in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and in two of the Talmudical treatises (Pesachim, 54, a; Nedarim, 39). The Greek versions of Symmachus and Theodotion, moreover, appear to favour it in the renderings ἐκ πρώτης and ἐν πρώτοις.

(2) Jerome's explanation of Gen. vi. 3, "Yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years," is as follows: "Hoc est, habebunt centum viginti annos ad agendam poenitentiam. Non igitur humana vita, ut multi errant, in centum viginti annos contracta est." The Targum of Onkelos renders the passage thus: "A term will I give them, an hundred and twenty years, if they may be converted." In like manner the Targum of Jonathan: "Behold I will give them a prolongment of a hundred and twenty years, that they may work repentance, and not perish." The Midrash on Genesis explains the passage in the same manner.

(3) In his explanation of Gen. xi. 28, Jerome, in common with the Midrash and the Jerusalem Targum, explains the Hebrew word חֶרֶב, which in the A.V. is regarded as a proper name, Ur, as denoting the furnace in which Haran was consumed, and from which Abraham was delivered. It is true, indeed, that Jerome speaks of the Jewish account as a fable (fabula), but when explaining the apparent discrepancy between the age of Abraham when he left Charran, viz. 75, and the statement that this event took place after the death of Terah who, if only seventy years of age at Abraham's birth, must have lived sixty years after his departure, Jerome refers to the Hebrew tradition as true, and explains the age of Abraham as dating not from his natural birth, but from the time of his renunciation of the idolatry of the Chaldeans.

(4) Jerome's explanation of Gen. xix. 14 appears to be borrowed from Jewish sources. He does not, indeed, accept the whole of the explanation which is found in the Midrash on that place, viz. that Lot had four daughters, of whom two were already married, and two were about to be married. But he adopts the Jewish interpretation of the words קָבְלָהּ בְּנִינָהּ, qui accepturi erant filias ejus, who were about to take his daughters in marriage, and rejects that of the LXX, τοὺς ἐληφότες τὰς θυγατέρας αὐτοῦ, "who had married his daughters."

(5) In his explanation of Gen. xxi. 14 Jerome remarks upon the difficulty of supposing that

Ishmael at eighteen years of age should have been placed upon Hagar's shoulder. Accordingly he rejects the version of the LXX, καὶ ἐπέθηκεν ἐπὶ τὸν ὄμω αὐτῆς τὸ παιδίον, "and he placed the child upon her shoulder," and instead of connecting the words וְאִתּוֹ הִלֵּךְ, "and the child," with שָׁם עַל-שִׁכְמָה "he placed upon her shoulder," he connects them with the preceding verb וַיֵּן "and he gave," and in conformity with the views of some of the old Jewish commentators, he explains the passage thus: "Et hoc facto, dedit puerum matri: hoc est, in manus ejus tradidit, commendavit, et ita emisit e domo."

The following criticism, for which it can scarcely be doubted that Jerome was indebted to his Jewish teachers,* exemplifies not only the extent to which he was in the habit of borrowing from others, but also the readiness with which he received and transmitted statements without investigation. In his Commentary on Galatians i. (tom. ix. p. 80) he states that when the Hebrew word עוֹלָם, olam, occurs with the letter vau it means eternity; but that when it occurs without the vau it means the fiftieth year, or year of jubilee, in support of which latter statement he refers to Exodus xxi. 6, where the word is written without the vau, and also to Deut. xxiii. 4, where the vau is inserted.

Our next inquiry must be into the direct evidence which exists respecting the amount of Hebrew scholarship possessed by Jerome. On this subject he sometimes speaks with much diffidence; and when we contrast with this diffidence the very different language which Jerome, not only in other places, but even in the very same treatises, adopts in reference to his other qualifications, it is reasonable to conclude that the language which he employs was not altogether the result of a proneness to under-rate his own acquirements. Thus e.g. in his Apologia adversus Rufinum he writes thus: "Nos autem qui Hebraeae linguae saltem parvam habemus scientiam . . . et de aliis magis possumus judicare, et ea quae ipsi intelligimus in nostra lingua exprimere" (tom. iii. p. 103 B, Basil, 1516). And, again, in the same treatise, when speaking of his familiarity with the Latin grammarians, rhetoricians, and philosophers, he observes, "et Hebraeum sermonem ex parte didicimus" (ib. p. 103 c). And, once more, in his Epitaphium Paulae matris he says: "Hebraeam linguam, quam ego ab adolescentia, multo labore ac sudore ex parte didici, . . . discere voluit" (tom. i. p. 86). On the other hand it must not be overlooked that in this same treatise Jerome describes himself as "trilinguis," i.e. "Hebraeus, Graecus, Latinus," and that in his Preface to the Apocryphal Book of Tobit, he says that in one day he translated into Latin the version which was made for him viâ voce out of the Chaldee into Hebrew by one who was acquainted both with the Hebrew and Chaldee languages.*

* Amongst other similar acknowledgments of this indebtedness we find the following statement in a letter addressed to St. Augustine (l. p. 298, Clark's edition): "It would have been but fair to have given me credit for the same fidelity (i.e. as that which he had shewn in the revision of the translation of the New Testament) in the Old Testament; for I have not followed my own imagination, but have rendered the divine words as I found them understood by those who speak the Hebrew language. If you have any doubt of this in any passage, ask the Jews what is the meaning of the original."

The following examples, which might be almost indefinitely multiplied, will suffice to afford some idea of the deficiency of Jerome's critical scholarship, when tried by a standard applicable to that of the present day.

We shall refer, in the first instance, to his treatise on Hebrew proper names, one of the earliest of his productions, but one in the preface to which he observes that he had undertaken it at the request of those who thought that he had acquired some proficiency in the Hebrew language, "qui me putant aliquid in Hebraeae linguae noticiâ profecisse" (tom. iv. p. 136 D).

(1) Jerome regards the Hebrew gutturals א. ה. ח. and ע as interchangeable. Thus, in his explanation of the name Abel, אַבֶּל, he assigns as one of its meanings luctus, grief, identifying אַבֶּל with אֵבֶל. He assigns as one explanation of the proper name Bera, בֵּרָא, creatura, creature, thus identifying בֵּרָא with בְּרָא. He identifies Elishah, אֵלִישָׁה, with Elisha, אֵלִישָׁע, and gives as an explanation of the former name Dei mei salvatio, and as an explanation of the latter Dei mei salus. He confounds בֵּרָא, drought or desolation, Zeph. ii. 14, with בֵּרָע, and renders the word by corvus, raven. He explains Hur, Heb. חֹר, as meaning ignis, aut lumen, thus identifying חֹר with חֹר. Again, after giving happy (beatus) as the explanation of the meaning of the proper name Asher, אֲשֶׁר, he observes that if written with ח and ע instead of א and ש it means a court, חָצֵר, hater, atrium. In his Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim he regards אֲשֶׁר and אֲשֶׁע as interchangeable words; and whilst assigning the meaning happy to Asher, the son of Jacob and Leah, he observes, "Aser ergo non divitiae, sed beatus dicitur, duntaxat in praesenti loco. Nam in aliis secundum ambiguitatem verbi possunt et divitiae sic vocari." And, again, in his remarks upon Gen. iii. 14, in the Quaestiones Hebraicae, he regards אֶפֶס, dust, as convertible with אֶש, ashes, and observes that the former word may be rendered favilla. And, once more, in his able and elaborate commentary upon Isaiah he regards the word אֶפֶס as interchangeable with אֶש (Is. vii. 12), and observes that the meaning may be either tempt or exalt.*

The uncertainty which attaches to any attempt to determine the amount of scholarship possessed by early writers from their etymological conceits is increased in the case of Jerome by the undue deference which he attached to the views of his predecessors in this field of inquiry.

* His words are these: "Et quia vicina est Chaldaeorum lingua sermoni Hebraico, utriusque linguae peritissimum loquacem reperiens, unius diei laborem arripui, et quicquid ille Hebraicis verbis expressit, hoc ego, accito notario, sermonibus Latinis exposui" (tom. iv. p. 92).

* Jerome's remark, however, upon אֶפֶס, which appears to have stood in the text which he used in Gen. xiv. 5, instead of אֶש, proves that he did not regard the letters ח and ע as always convertible. (Quaest. Heb. p. 94.) His remarks upon the name Beerabebe, בֵּרָא בֵּרָא (ib. p. 98), shew that the letter ע, samech, was commonly used in place of ש, sin. Again in his Comm. on Is. iv. 7, he says that the word שֶׁבַע, Sheba, may be interpreted "nunc septem. nunc plures, nunc juramentum."

Thus e.g. in his treatise on proper names he writes thus: "Israel est videre deum, sive vir, aut mens videns Deum," while in his Quaest. Heb. in Genesim (ib. p. 100) he says that when he gave the explanation of the name Israel as if derived from שׂא, הָאֵל, and אֵל, he did so under the influence of names of great weight and authority; and instead of adhering to that view, he explains the meaning of the word, in accordance with the obvious import of Gen. xxii. 28, as princeps cum Deo, or princeps Dei, i.e. as derived from שׂ (or הָאֵל) and אֵל. Moreover in his later etymology of the word Israel, he seems to regard שׂאֵל as a noun, and he transliterates it sawith, and explains it thus, principem sonat; whilst, in allusion, as it should seem, to yet another etymology, he adds: "sive directus Dei, hoc est eibereves Θεός."

(2) After making ample allowance, however, for Jerome's undue respect for the opinions of earlier writers, and also for the wide field for speculation which is opened in all etymological researches, it is difficult for Hebrew scholars of the present time to understand how Jerome could have been satisfied with etymologies of which the following will suffice as specimens:—He explains the meaning of the word Adullamite, אֲדֻלַּמִּי (Gen. xxxviii. 1) as the testimony of water, testimonium aquae, as if it were derived from אֲדָל and מִי. Again, he explains the word Amraphel, אֲמֶרָפֶל, thus: dixit ut caderet, as if derived from אֲמַר and פֶּל. He explains Hadoram הָדָרָם (Gen. x. 27), by generatio excelsa, as if derived from הָדָר and רָם; Arphaxad, אֲרַפְּחָאֵד, by sanctus de populationem, apparently as if derived from אֲרַם and שָׁד; Philistines, פְּלִשְׁתִּים by cadentes, (as if from פֶּל), or ruins poculi, or cadentes potione, apparently as if from פֶּל and some form of שָׁתָה; and Ramoth, Heb. רָמוֹת, as risio mortis, as if from רָם and מוֹת. Jerome's attempts to trace Egyptian words to a Hebrew source are of a somewhat singular character. Thus e.g. he explains the meaning of Pharaoh, Heb. פַּרְעֹה, dissipans sive discooperiens eam, as if derived from the Hebrew word פָּרַע; that of the word Abroch (Gen. xli. 43), as tender or delicate father, as if derived from אֲבִי and רַח. Here, however, as in other instances, Jerome appears to have followed the guidance of earlier writers, for whereas in his Quaestiones in Genesim he considers the word אֲחִי Achu (Gen. xli. 2) as a Hebrew word, and explains it by pater, in his Commentary on Isaiah xix. 7, he says that he was told by the learned that in the Egyptian tongue everything green that grows in marshes is called by this name. One more example of Jerome's etymological conceits may be cited from his epistle to Paulinus, de Studio Scripturarum, in which he assigns iniquitas as the meaning of the proper name Haman.

We shall now adduce a few illustrations of the lack of critical accuracy and discernment which pervades the writings of Jerome.

(1) In his remarks on Gen. iii. 17 in his Quaest. Heb. he translates and observes as follows: "Maledicta terra in operibus tuis. Opera hic non ruris colendi, ut plerique putant, sed prociata significant; ut in Hebraeo habetur. Et Aquila non discordat dicens: Maledicta humus propter te. Et Theodotio, Maledicta adama in transgressionem tua." We remark here (1) that Jerome appears to have read עָבַדְתָּ; or some other form of עָבַד, operatus est, instead of עָבַרְתָּ; and (2) that he does not appear to have observed that Aquila read in accordance with the present Hebrew text עָבַרְתָּ, or that Theodotion appears to have read עָבַרְתָּ or some other nominal form of עָבַר, transgressus est.

(2) Jerome's explanation of the LXX version of Gen. iv. 7, in which the words "thou shalt rule over him" are made to refer, as in the English version, to Abel, not to sin, is that in Greek the word ἀμαρτία, sin, is of the feminine gender, whereas in Hebrew the word חַטָּאת is masculine. The inadequacy of the explanation is obvious, even had Jerome's statement as to the gender of חַטָּאת been correct; but it seems to have escaped his notice (1) that the word ἀμαρτία is not found in the LXX in this verse; and (2) that in every other place in which חַטָּאת occurs it is of the feminine gender.

Amongst other indications either of an imperfect acquaintance with Hebrew or of great carelessness, we may notice the following:—

(1) Jerome's rendering of מִנְנֶגֶב, minnegob, in Gen. xiii. 3, by the words per austrum. It may perhaps be inferred from this rendering that Jerome was not aware of the fact that The South, or The Negeb, was the name of a district of Judaea, and consequently that there was no difficulty in understanding the meaning of verse 1, in which it is stated that Abraham came up "out of Egypt into the south." This ignorance, however, furnishes no sufficient justification for rendering מִנְנֶגֶב minnegob "through the South."

(2) Jerome's rendering of צַדִּיקָא כְּמִנִּי, Gen. xxxviii. 26, is "justior est ista quam ego." Not content, however, with this rendering, which is a correct version of the Hebrew, he proceeds to observe, "In Hebraeo habet justificata est ex me" (Quaest. Heb. 101 a).

(3) Jerome renders לִישׁוּעָתָךְ קִיּוּתִי יְהוָה, Gen. xlix. 18, salvatorem tuum expectabo Domine. This rendering is the more remarkable, inasmuch as that of the LXX is τὴν σωτηρίαν περιμένειν σου.

(4) Jerome appears to have been unable to give any account of the Septuagint version of Gen. xxvi. 32, where the Greek translators evidently read אֵל not for ל to him (Quaest. Heb. in Gen. p. 98 a).

(5) When noticing the obvious play upon the words מִשְׁפָּח mishpat and מִשְׁפָּח mishpach, and upon זְדָקָה zedakah and זִשְׁתָּה zeshakah in Is. v. 7, Jerome says, "volumus latinis insinuare auribus quod ab hebraeis didicimus;" and he then proceeds to give the meaning of each word, and to show the difference which was caused in each case by the change of a single letter. It may, perhaps, be thought by some that Jerome wished to secure more implicit credence for his remarks by the statement that he was indebted for them to Jewish sources. It is scarcely probable, however, that a Hebrew scholar would have deemed it necessary to ascribe to his Jewish teachers information of so obvious a nature, and of which it is difficult to understand how any one who was tolerably versed in the Hebrew language could have been ignorant.

(6) Jerome's remarks on the word אָפַקְדָּן afflicted, the Nif. part. of the verb אָפַקְדָּן, in its const. form, which he renders by the Latin word nugas, are as follows: "Sciamus in Hebraeo ipsum Latinum esse sermonem et propterea a nobis ita ut in Hebraeo erat positum: ut nosse possimus linguam Hebraicam omnium linguarum esse matricem." (Comment. in Zeph. iii. 18.)

(7) In his commentary on Is. ii. 16, Jerome gives it as the opinion of the Jews that תַּרְשִׁישִׁי, Tarshish, is the Hebrew word for the sea, and that ד' is a Syriac word.

(8) In his commentary on Habakkuk iii. 5, he renders שִׁבְרָה fiery bolt, or pestilential fever, by diabolus.

(9) Jerome's opinion that a portion of the book of Job was written in hexameters shews to how great an extent he relied upon the authority of Philo, Josephus, Origen, and Eusebius, not one of whom appears to have been competent to form any opinion upon the question, and either how little he relied on his own judgment, or how incompetent he was to arrive at any independent conclusion on such a subject.^a In his treatise on proper names Jerome observes upon the words Hiram, Ira, Ishtob, and Ish-boosheth as follows:—"Idcirco cum aspiratione haec nomina posuimus, quia et apud Graecos et apud Hebraeos per diphthongum scribuntur." It will suffice here (1) to call attention to the reason fallaciously assigned for the aspiration of these names, viz. that they begin with a diphthong; and (2) to present to the eye of the reader the four names in their Hebrew and in their Greek form—

(1) חִירָם, Χειράμ, Hiram.

(2) עִירָא, Ἰράς, Ira.

(3) אִישׁ טוֹב, Ἰστώβ, Ish-tob.

(4) אִישׁ-בֹּשֶׁת, Ἰσβόσθ, Ish-boosheth.

It would be an easy task to multiply to an almost indefinite extent the indications afforded in the writings of Jerome of his imperfect scholarship, of his unseemly haste,^b and of his reliance upon sources of information which were not unfrequently fallacious. It is a more agreeable task, however, to direct attention to the very great value which his writings, especially his commentaries, possess (1) as laying the foundation, however imperfectly, of a sounder method of biblical exegesis than is to be found in the writings of any of his predecessors or contemporaries; (2) as preserving so much of the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion which would otherwise have been lost; and (3) as pointing out, in many instances, the superiority of these versions over that of the LXX, which was customarily regarded as an inspired work, and to which Jerome himself at times was led to assign an authority which at other times he refused to recognise,¹ and also over the old Latin version which was based upon it, and which, notwithstanding all the opposition which it had to encounter, the great work of Jerome ultimately superseded.

^a In Librum Job, praef. tom. iv. p. 10.

^b E.g. in his preface to the book of Proverbs, Solomon's Song and Ecclesiastes, Jerome writes thus: "Itaque longi aegrotatione fractus, ne penitus hoc anno reticerem, et apud vos mutus essem, tridui opus nomini vestro consecravi, interpretationem videlicet trium Salomonis voluminum" (tom. iv. p. 10, 2). And again, at the end of his commentary on Obadiah, he excuses himself thus, "Aliud est, mi Pammachi, saepe stilum vertere, et quae memoria digna sunt scribere. Aliud notariorum articula praeparatis pudore reticendi dictare quodcumque in buccam venerit." He adds, "In hoc prophetâ et adolescentuli levis et senex praesumpsimus."

The most cursory comparison of the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, first with the version of the LXX, and then with that of Jerome, will suffice to establish the vast superiority of the latter over the former. A few instances taken from the first chapter of the Book of Amos will serve by way of illustration.

(1) In v. 1 the LXX treat יְרוּשָׁלַם, Jerusalem, as a proper name, Accurim; they represent the words of the prophet as being uttered in that place, not the prophet himself as being in it, although the verb יָרָא is in the singular number; and they translate the word יְרוּשָׁלַם, Jerusalem, by Jerusalem, thus misrepresenting in a very important point the main drift of the prophecy. Well might Jerome say in his preface to this book, "Septuaginta autem, necne quid colunt, interpretati sunt, 'Sermones Amos qui facti sunt in Acharim de Thome quos vidit pro Hierusalem.'" On the other hand, Jerome renders the verse thus from the Hebrew: "Verba Amos qui fuit in pastoralibus (or pastoribus) Thome quos vidit super Israel."

(2) In vv. 6 and 9, where the adjective מְאֹדָּה, abundant, whole or entire, occurs as qualifying the captivity spoken of, the LXX render it as a proper name, μυμλαιοία and Ζαλαμδα, whilst Jerome renders it correctly as an adjective, "captivitas perfecta."

(3) In v. 11, whilst the LXX render מִן־מִן־יָדָהּ by and ἀποφύγετε μὲντες ἐν τῇ γῆ and assign to מִן the abstract meaning of מִן, supervenerunt, witness, Jerome rightly renders the former phrase, "violaverit misericordiam ejus," and מִן, "neque in finem."

It would be easy to multiply illustrations in proof of the superiority of Jerome's work over the LXX, but any elaborate comparison of the two versions would unduly increase the length of the present article.

It will be obvious from what has been here alleged that it is by no means an easy task either, in the first instance, to form a correct judgment of the extent of Jerome's Hebrew scholarship, or, when that judgment has been formed, to convey to readers of the 19th century a just estimate of the excellence and the defects of that scholarship as compared with the more critical and exact scholarship of the present day. If any credence is to be given to words which breathe no spirit of arrogance or of intentional exaggeration, it will follow from Jerome's account of his version of the book of Tobit, to which allusion has already been made, that however defective may have been the amount of his critical scholarship, Jerome must have acquired a very considerable amount of practical acquaintance with the Hebrew language, and a generally correct apprehension of the signification of Hebrew words and phrases. The same conclusion may be gathered from the success which crowned his labours as a teacher, as may be seen by reference to letters which he addressed to Paula and to Eustochium, her daughter (cf. Heronymus, sein Leben und Werken von Otto Zöckler, p. 155, Gotha, 1865), who appear to have acquired by his aid a sufficient amount of acquaintance with Hebrew to enable them to have recourse to it for the better understanding of the Old Testament Scriptures.

THEODORET.—Theodoret was born at Antioch towards the close of the 4th century, and was made bishop of Cyrus, a small town of Syria, near the Euphrates, about the year A.D. 426, from which office he was deposed in the year A.D. 449, as a partisan of Nestorius. In addition to his History of the Church, and several controversial treatises, he has left behind him commentaries on a large portion of the Old Testament and on the Epistles of St. Paul.

These writings prove that Theodoret possessed a certain amount of acquaintance with Hebrew as well as with Syriac; and he appears to have had also the advantage of personal intercourse with learned Jews. Thus, e.g., in his Quaestiones in Exodus (Inter. xv.), he observes that the Samaritans pronounced the sacred tetragrammaton as 'Iahē (Yahel), but the Jews as 'Ald. His remarks upon the Hebrew language (Quaest. in Gen. Inter. lxi.) are of a somewhat singular character. He observes, in proof that Hebrew is a sacred language and the direct gift of God, that whereas children commonly speak the language of the nation to which they belong, the children of Jews do not at once speak Hebrew, but the language of those amongst whom they are born: and he appeals to Ps. lxxx. 5, as it is rendered by the LXX, γλῶσσά σου ὡς ἡν ἔγνω ἑσέως. He proceeds to state his own views as to the derivation of the word Hebrew. After noticing the opinions of those who derive it from Elor, which he rejects, he expresses his belief that it is derived from the circumstance that Abraham crossed (עָבַר) the Euphrates. He observes that the Syriac for עָבַר, which is used by the LXX in Gen. xiv. 13, as the equivalent of עָבַר, Hebrew, is Hebra, and that he himself found that in the Hebrew the word was Hebrā, and that the on Ps. xiv. 20, where verb עָבַר by Symmachus καταβύβη. Thus also in ch. 15, he notices the verb עָבַר by ἀλά ἔσται and not καὶ ἔσται, as the LXX and he explains the word נַח, etā kairós, not as a time of prosperity promised to the righteous, but as a time of adversity for the wicked, a use of the word נַח which is common, as he alleges, in Hebrew and in Syriac, in support of which statement he might have appealed to Is. xiii. 22, and to Jer. xxvii. 7.

Again, in his Commentary on Ps. civ. 16, Theodoret observes that whereas the LXX have τὰ ξύλα τοῦ πεδίου, the Hebrew has "the trees of the Lord." On the twenty-fifth verse of the same Psalm, he observes upon the words ἐμπαίσειν αὐτῷ that αὐτῷ stands for αὐτῇ τῇ θαλάσσῃ, and that the masculine gender is used because in the Hebrew and Syriac the word for sea is of that gender. And so, once more, in his Commentary on Ps. cvi. 48, he observes that the double γένοιτο of the Greek stands as the representative of the double Amen of the Hebrew, in which instance, however, he appears to have trusted to his memory, inasmuch as the יְהוָה, Amen, is not repeated.

Whilst, however, Theodoret displays a certain amount of acquaintance with the Hebrew, as well as with the Syriac language, his grammatical attainments seem to have been of a very superficial character. Thus, e.g., he observes, in reference to 2 Kings xxiii. 6 (Quaest. in 2. Reg. Inter. lv.), that, in place of the word ἄλσος, a grove, which the LXX use here as the equivalent of אֲשֶׁרָה, Asherah, the other interpreters use the word Ἀσηρᾶθ or Ἀσταρᾶθ. He adds that this was the name of Venus, who was called Astarte. In making this remark Theodoret seems to have overlooked the fact that Ἀσηρᾶθ is the Greek form, not of the singular אֲשֶׁרָה, Asherah, an image pillar of Asherah, or Astarte, but of the plural אֲשֶׁרוֹת, Asheroth, whilst it must be presumed that Ἀσταρᾶθ was designed by him to represent the Greek form of אֲשֶׁת־אֲשֹׁרֵת, Ashtoreth, 1 Kings xi. 5, where the LXX have Ἀστάρτη Astarte.

Again, in his Commentary on Ps. cxiii. 1, whilst he observes in reference to the παῖδες of the LXX that the Hebrew and Syriac have servants, and therefore that the word does not denote young men, he takes no notice of the fact that the Hebrew word for servants עֲבָדִים, abde, is in the construct form, and that the true rendering is not "Praise the Lord, O ye servants," but "Praise, O ye servants of the Lord." It is due, however, to Theodoret, that it should be observed that in adopting the version of the LXX, he is supported by Aquila and Symmachus, and, consequently, that it is probable that, in common with them, he may have been content with a free rendering of the passage. As another illustration of his dependence on the versions, rather than on the original, it may be noticed, that in his Commentary on 2 Kings ii. 14, Theodoret, in common with the LXX and other Greek versions, has taken the two Hebrew words, מִן הַיָּד, even He, as one word, ἀφφά, and that he explains the meaning as ὁ κρύβιος, occultus.

Again in his explanation of the meaning of Zoar, Σηγῶρ, as κατάποσις (Quaest. in Gen. Inter. 70), it is obvious that Theodoret has confounded Zoar with Bela, בֶּלַע, its former name (Gen. xiv. 2).

Another indication of Theodoret's reliance upon the Greek versions is found in his Commentary on 1 Kings i. 33, where David commands Solomon to be taken to Gihon. Theodoret observes upon this passage that the Nile is called Gihon; and he refers to Jer. ii. 18, where the LXX read Γῆων as the equivalent of גִּיחֹן, Gihon.

The use of ἰ conversive appears to have been unknown to Theodoret, for he observes on Ps. xcii. 11, where the LXX has Καὶ ἐπεῖδεν as the rendering of עָלָה, that Symmachus, Theodotus, and the Hebrew itself, have ἐπόψεται, thus shewing that Theodoret regarded it as equivalent to עָלָה.

Again, Theodoret's remarks upon the derivation of the proper name יְדִידְיָה, Jedidiah, 2 Sam. xii. 25 (Quaest. in II. Reg. Int. 26), seem to denote that he did not rightly understand the derivation of the word, or perceive the drift of the comments of Aquila and of Symmachus. The version of the LXX is as follows. Καὶ ἐκάλεσε τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἰεδιδιά ἐνεκεν Κυρίου, on which Theodoret observes, "Aquila interpreted the word ἐνεκεν Κυρίου on account of the Lord, but Symmachus εἰς βασιλεία ἀφωρισμένον, set apart as a king."

Once more, while Theodoret appears to have diligently compared the versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion with that of the LXX, and has recorded the variations in many instances, he does not appear to have been fully sensible of the linguistic grounds on which these variations rested, or he did not consider that they would be appreciated by those for whom he wrote. Thus e.g. in his Commentary on Ps. xxvii. 11, he observes, that, whereas the LXX render ἡγομήθησόν με, teach me, Aquila and Theodotion render the same word enlighten me, φώτισόν, but he does not allude to the fact that these interpreters, in common with the LXX in other places (as e.g. 2 Kings xii. 3), confounded the Hiphil form of the verb הָגַם and of the verb הָאִיר, i.e. הָגַם and הָאִיר.

And once more in his Commentary on Ps. xc. 14, 15, when pointing out in support of his statement that the time denoted in the verses has been changed in the LXX, he appeals only to the versions of Aquila and the other Greek interpreters by whom the words שָׂמְנוּ, satisfy us, and שָׂמְנוּ, make us glad, are correctly rendered in the imperative mood, and not in the past tense as by the LXX and in the Vulgate.

Upon the whole, whilst the writings of Theodoret display a considerable amount of careful research, and have preserved many of the readings of the Greek interpreters, it seems that his acquaintance with Hebrew was rather such a superficial acquaintance as one living in Syria would have acquired by intercourse with those who spoke a cognate language, than such a grammatical acquaintance with it as would have qualified him for the task of an original interpreter or commentator.

There are other writers, as e.g. Lucian a disciple of Macarius of Edessa, about the end of the 3rd century, and Dorotheus, a presbyter of Tyre or of Antioch, and a contemporary of Eusebius of Caesarea, who are said to have possessed some knowledge of Hebrew. Eusebius says that Dorotheus was "devoted to the study of Hebrew, and that he read the Hebrew Scriptures with great facility" (Hist. Eccles. vii. 32). Eusebius of Emessa, moreover, if the works ascribed to him be genuine, seems to have used the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, as well as the Peshito version, in the commentaries which bear his name, on Genesis and on some of the Psalms. Little, however, remains of the genuine writings of these and of other authors of the first five centuries who are said to have been acquainted with the Hebrew language, and a minute examination of their reputed works would unduly increase the length of the present article. We have already briefly examined the works of the most distinguished writers of the church of the first four centuries who possessed, or who might reasonably be supposed to have possessed, any acquaintance with the Hebrew language. It would be a useless task to examine at length the works of those writers who neither possessed, nor professed to have, any knowledge of Hebrew. A few references, however, to the works of St. Chrysostom and of St. Augustine will not be devoid of interest as illustrating the general neglect of Hebrew which prevailed alike in the East and in the West.

The most cursory examination of the writings of Chrysostom will suffice to shew his ignorance of Hebrew. Thus, e.g., in his Fourth Homily on Genesis i. he tells his hearers that those who are well skilled in Hebrew (οἱ τὴν γλῶτταν ἐκέλευν ἀκριβῶς ἡσκημένοι) say that in that language the word denoting heaven is of the plural number, and he informs them further that it is the custom of the Hebrew language to use the plural number to denote a single object. He not only adopts the LXX version as the groundwork of his commentary, but he reasons from the use of the same Greek words in different places, without regard to the fact that the corresponding Hebrew words are different; e.g. ἔθερα, which answers to the Hebrew verb יָרָא, nathan, as in Gen. i. 17, compared with Gen. ii. 8, where the same verb corresponds with the verb נָתַן, sum, whilst Chrysostom affirms that "sacred Scripture uses the same word in both places." Again, Chrysostom comments on Gen. ii. 2 in apparent ignorance that the Hebrew has "the seventh day," where the Greek has "the sixth." When explaining the meaning of the name Abraham in the Thirty-ninth homily on Genesis, Chrysostom adopts the erroneous etymology which connects it with עָבַר, transivit, and observes that "they know this who are skilled in the Hebrew tongue;" whilst in the following homily he adopts the common error of supposing that the change in the name of Sarah consisted in the addition of a second p, (r) i.e. in the change from Σάρα to Σάρρα, as he found the words transliterated in the Greek version.

In regard to the writings of St. Augustine we find several allusions to his own ignorance of that language, of which the following will suffice. In the 11th book of his Confessions Augustine writes thus: "Et si Hebraea voce loqueretur, frustra pulsaret sensum meum . . . si autem Latine, scirem quid diceret" (xi. 5). And again, in his De Doctrina Christiana (ii. c. 16) he but also the prevailing neglect of that language, when he expresses his conviction that "if any one could interpret the meaning of the Hebrew names, he would be of great value and service in solving the enigmas of Scripture." It would obviously be useless to multiply proofs of the truth of Augustine's statement in regard to his own acquirements. It will serve, however, to illustrate still further the prevailing ignorance of Hebrew in his days if we refer to the eleventh chapter of his second book on Christian doctrine, where he adduces the two "Hebrew" words Racha and Hosanna as instances of words which cannot be translated into another language. It will suffice to observe that the former of these words is Aramaic or Syro-Chaldaic, not Hebrew, and although some difference of opinion exists as to the precise import of this word, which is one of common occurrence in post-Biblical Hebrew, it is difficult to understand how it was that those who were not only able (to use Augustine's words) "to mark and to ask about them," but who had access to the Greek and Latin versions of Ps. cxviii. 25, ὦ κύριε, σῶσον δὴ, Ὁ Δομινε saluum me fac, should not have obtained from those versions some idea of the meaning of the word Hosanna.^a

Socrates, in his Ecclesiastical History (vii. 5, A.D. 409), makes mention of one George, a presbyter belonging to the Arian faction, who devoted himself to the study of the Sacred Scriptures, and who "evinced in his public expositions of the Old Testament no inconsiderable acquaintance with the Hebrew language."

It deserves notice that Gildas, in the preface to his declamatory Epistle, refers to the fact that the fourfold Lamentations of Jeremiah are written in alphabetic order. It is indeed possible that this information was not given by Gildas as the result of his own examination of the Hebrew text. It is, however, quite correct; for whilst the first four chapters of the Lamentations are written in alphabetic order, the first, second, and fourth chapters, consisting of twenty-two verses each, alphabetically arranged, and the third chapter of sixty-six verses (three verses consecutively beginning with the same letter), the fifth chapter is not composed in alphabetic order.

^a One amongst numerous illustrations of the extent to which the value of the original text of the Old Testament was depreciated and the study of Hebrew neglected, in the time of St. Augustine, occurs in a letter addressed to St. Jerome (l. p. 262, Clarke's edition), in which he urges the following considerations in favour of a translation into Latin from the LXX rather than from the Hebrew. "For if your translation begins to be more generally read in many churches, it will be a grievous thing that, in the reading of Scripture, differences must arise between the Latin churches and the Greek churches, especially seeing that the discrepancy is easily condemned in a Latin version by the production of the original in Greek, which is a language very widely known; whereas, if any one has been disturbed by the occurrence of something to which he was not accustomed in the translation taken from the Hebrew, and alleges that the new translation is wrong, it will be found difficult, if not impossible, to get at the Hebrew documents, by which the version to which exception is taken may be defended. And when they are obtained, who will submit to have so many Latin and Greek authorities pronounced to be in the wrong? Besides all this, Jews, if consulted as to the meaning of the Hebrew text, may give a different opinion from yours: in which case it will seem as if your presence were indispensable, as being the only one who could refute their view; and it would be a miracle if one could be found capable of acting as arbiter between you and them."

Fabricius, one of the biographers of Aldhelm, bishop of Sherborn, who died about A.D. 709, speaks thus of his familiarity with the Hebrew language: Prophetarum exempla, Davidis Psalmos, Salomonis tria volumina, Hebraicis literis bene novit, et legem Mosaicam. (Aldh. Opp. ed. Giles, p. 357.)

There is one writer, however, of the Western church, whose works, though belonging to a later period, seem to demand a special notice, viz. the Venerable Bede.

BEDA, or VENERABLE BEDE, as he is commonly designated, was born between the years A.D. 672 and A.D. 674, in the immediate neighbourhood of the twin monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow. He was educated at one or both of these places under the care of Abbat Benedict, and was instructed in the Holy Scriptures, as he tells us in his Ecclesiastical History (iv. 4), by Trumbert, a monk who had been educated under Ceadda, bishop of Lichfield. Bede possessed considerable knowledge of Greek as well as of Latin, and appears to have had some acquaintance with Hebrew, as may be gathered from his commentaries, which were confessedly, for the most part, compilations from earlier works, particularly from those of Basil, Ambrose, and Augustine, none of whom appear to have been acquainted with the Old Testament in its original tongue.

It is quite clear, indeed, that Bede, in common with other early expositors of the Old Testament, was indebted for some of his Hebrew criticisms to the learning of others. There is undoubted evidence that the works of Jerome were familiar to him. At the same time, when the state of learning in the age and country in which Bede lived is taken into account, there is less probability than in the case of most of his predecessors that he was able to have recourse for aid to those who were familiar with the Hebrew language, and consequently in those cases in which his information does not appear to have been derived from Jerome, there is the greater probability that he was in the habit of consulting the Hebrew Scriptures for himself.

The following instances from the Commentary on Genesis, in which Bede generally adopts the Vulgate as the basis of his remarks, but occasionally refers to an older translation, will suffice as illustrations of Bede's mode of reference to the Hebrew.

(1) In his notice of the account of the second day's work of creation, Bede observes that in this case only the words are not added, "And God saw that it was good." Now, when it is remembered that these words are found in the LXX it is scarcely probable that Bede would have made this statement on the authority of the Vulgate without reference to the original.¹

(2) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 2, Bede notices the variation of the Vulgate from the LXX, which latter version reads "sixth" instead of "seventh," and observes concerning the Latin version "quae de Hebraicae veritatis fonte descendit" (ib. vii. p. 29).

(3) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 8, Bede notices the difference between the Greek and the Latin renderings of עֵדֶן, which is rendered in the LXX κατὰ ἀνατολὰς, ad orientem, and in the Latin, a principio, and he remarks concerning the latter version "quae de Hebraica veritate translata est." It is deserving of notice that Bede alludes to the opinion of certain persons that the site of the garden of Eden was far removed from all the regions of the earth which were inhabited by the human race, and that the waters of the flood which covered the surface of our world could not reach it. "Unde nec aquae diluvii, quae totam nostri orbis superficiem altissime cooperuerunt, ad eum pervenire potuerunt" (ib. p. 42).

(4) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 19, Bede observes in proof that Hebrew was the original language of the whole human race, that all the names which are found in the Book of Genesis up to the division of tongues, appear to belong to it (ib. p. 51).

(5) In his Commentary on Gen. ii. 23, Bede compares the etymology of the Hebrew words אָדָם, homo, and אִשָּׁה, mulier, with that of the words vir and virago, and he refers, by way of illustration, to the commonly received etymology of the word Israel, as if derived from עֵשָׂא, יִשְׂרָאֵל, and אֵל, vir videns Dominum (ib. p. 52). It will be observed that here as elsewhere, e.g. in his etymology of Abel, "luctus sive miserabilis" (ib. p. 67), Bede follows Jerome.

(6) Bede's Commentary on Gen. iv. 7 is as follows, "Juxta idioma linguae Hebraicae indicativum modum pro imperativo posuit, qualia habes innumera." Now although it is evident that Bede had the Quaestiones in Genesim before him, and that he adopted some of the very words of Jerome (as e.g. "quia liberi arbitrii es, moneo"), nevertheless these words shew that Bede was capable of examining the Hebrew text for himself. It is true that Jerome uses the words "sed tu magis dominare ejus," but it is extremely improbable that Bede should, on the strength of these words, have inferred that here, as elsewhere (e.g. in the Decalogue to which he here refers) the future tense is used in the Hebrew, not the imperative mood. On the other hand it is strange that Bede should insert in the text, and comment upon the words, "Egrediamur in agrum," corresponding to the Greek ἀιέλθωμεν εἰς τὸ πεδῖον, and to the Vulgate, "egrediamur foras," without noticing the fact that they are an interpolation, a fact, however, of which he could not have been ignorant, if the Quaestiones of Jerome were before him, inasmuch as the following words occur there: "Superfluum ergo est quod in Samaritanorum, et nostro volumine reperitur; transeamus in campum." It should be observed, moreover, that whilst we have evidence, both direct and indirect, of the use which Bede made of the writings of Jerome, he appears to have exercised his own judgment upon the information thus derived. Thus, e.g. in his Commentary on Gen. iv. 16, where Jerome, in his Quaestiones in Genesim, rejects altogether the view that Nod was the name of a country, and understands the word as denoting the wandering life of Cain, Bede writes thus, "Naid autem in profugum, sive, ut in libro Hebraeorum nominum invenimus, instabilem motum et fluctuationem vertitur, quod nonnulli, quibus et Josephus consentit, locum esse, in quo habitaverit Cain, autumant" (ib. p. 78).

(7) In his Commentary on Gen. iv. 18 and iv. 23, Bede shews that he was acquainted with the Jewish tradition respecting the death of Cain at the hands of Lamech, but not, as it should seem, through Jewish sources, but from the writings of Jerome: "sicut Hieronymus in quodam Hebraeo volumine scriptum esse testatur" (ib. p. 82).¹

(8) In his Commentary upon Gen. v. 3, Bede gives a full account of the discrepancies between the Hebrew text and the version of the LXX.

(9) In his Commentary on Gen. vi. 4, Bede refers, by way of illustration, to Ps. xix. 6, where the LXX have ὁς γίγας, and the Vulgate "ut gigas." He is, aware, however, of the fact that the Hebrew word there used is גִּימָל, and he writes thus: "Quamvis in Hebraicâ veritate memoratus psalmi versiculus ita scriptus sit: exultavit ut potens ad currendam viam" (ib. p. 93).

(10) In his Commentary on Gen. x. 13, Bede observes in regard to the names which occur in that verse that they seem to belong to nations rather than to individuals: "Nam et cuncta in im desinunt; quod est proprium numeri pluralis apud Hebraeos in genere masculino." In his Commentary on Habakkuk, Bede follows one of the ancient Latin versions, probably the Itala, which agrees for the most part with the LXX, but differs greatly from the Hebrew and the Vulgate. He is not, however, altogether unmindful of the Hebrew original. Thus, e.g., whilst adopting as the rendering of the beginning of v. 3, Deus a Libano veniet, where the LXX read 'Ο Θεὸς ἐκ Θάμνιν ἤξει, and the Vulgate has, Deus ab Austro veniet, Bede remarks as follows: "Notandum autem quod hic versus in Hebraicâ veritate ita habetur, Deus a Thacman, id est, ab austro veniet" (tom. ix. p. 408).

(11) Lastly, in regard to Bede's etymologies of proper names, we may observe that they are for the most part adopted verbatim, or with slight alteration from Jerome's Quaestiones in Genesim, or from his Treatise on Proper Names and Places. Thus, e.g., whereas Jerome gives Auditio Dei as the meaning of Ishmael, Bede gives Exauditio Dei as its rightful interpretation (Comment. in Gen. xvi. ib. p. 184). His explanation of the meaning of the change from Sarai to Sarah is almost identical with that of Jerome in his Quaestiones (ib. p. 191). His explanation of the meaning of Bela is the same as that of Jerome, devoratio. Bede's explanation of the meaning of Kadesh is Sancta, sive Commutata (ib. p. 213), the former of which is that of Jerome. And lastly, his interpretation of the meaning of Samuel is Ibi ipse Deus, sive Nomen ejus Deus,² the latter of which is that of Jerome in his De Nominibus Hebraicis; and his Interpretation of Jonathan is Columbae donum (ib. tom. viii. p. 51), which is derived from the same source. Upon the whole the inference from the above premises seems to be that whilst Bede's knowledge of Hebrew was very superficial it was sufficient to enable him to consult the original text of the Old Testament for himself, and to appreciate, at least, the value of the researches of his predecessors.

The results of this inquiry may be summed up in few words. With the exception of Jerome, and perhaps of Origen, none of the early Christian writers appear to have possessed any knowledge of Hebrew which was worthy of the name. The knowledge possessed by Epiphanius, to whom we may perhaps add Eusebius and Theodoret, was of an extremely superficial character, and served only, if indeed it extended so far, as to enable them to appreciate the value of the great work of Origen. Origen's scholarship was also very rude and elementary; and it yet remains to be ascertained to what extent the Hexapla represented the fruit of his own investigations, or the results of his wise and laborious appreciation of the knowledge of others. The name of Jerome stands out conspicuously alike upon the roll of his predecessors and of his successors until the time of the Reformation as by far the most distinguished perhaps the only Christian writer of antiquity who was qualified to make an independent use of his Hebrew acquirements, and to whom the whole Christian church will ever owe an inestimable debt of gratitude for the preservation of so large a portion of the results of Origen's labours, and still more for that unrivalled and imperishable work which has been not inaptly described as having "remained for eight centuries the bulwark of Western Christianity" (see Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, art. "The Vulgate," iii. p. 1701). [C. J. E.]

His predecessor Podda appears last in 747, and his successor Ceadda possibly in 770; his date cannot be more nearly approximated to. (Will. Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 288.) stantius, Julian, and Jovian. Under Constantius he practised at Constantinople, and professed himself to be a "fervent" Christian (διαπύρος χριστιανίζειν ὑπεκρίνατο); on which account he was selected by that emperor as one of the teachers of Julian, he being afraid that, if the young prince came under the influence of a pagan, he might be seduced to heathenism. (Socrates, iii. 1, 13.) After the death of Constantius, however, he followed the example of his former pupil, and became a "fierce pagan" (γοργὸς Ἕλλην; Socr. u. s. 13). He was in great favour with Julian, and appears to have been one of his familiar correspondents. (Julian, Ep. 19, ed. Heyler, p. 23; Ἐκηβόλῳ.) Under that emperor, Hecebolius also seems to have had some civil office at Edessa. The Arians of that city, "in the insolence of wealth," had violently attacked the Valentinians there. Julian wrote to Hecebolius to say, that, "since they had done what could not be allowed in any well-governed city," "in order to help the men the more easily to enter the kingdom of heaven as it was prescribed," by their "most wonderful law, he had commanded all moneys to be taken away from the church of the Edessenes, that they might be distributed among the soldiers, and that its property should be confiscated to his private treasury; that being poor they might become wise and not lose the kingdom of heaven which they hoped for." (Julian, Ep. 43, ed. Heyler, p. 82; Baronius, s. a. 362, xiii.; Soz. vi. 1.) Such appropriation of church property was one of the great crimes of which Julian was accused after his death. (Greg. Naz. adv. Jul. Orat. iii.) The emperor adds that he had charged the inhabitants of Edessa to abstain from "riot and strife," lest "they themselves" should suffer "the sword, exile, and fire." The last sentence in the letter appears to intimate that he would hold Hecebolius personally responsible for the future good conduct of the city. After the death of Julian, and the reversal of the imperial policy, which immediately followed, Hecebolius ostentatiously professed extreme penitence for his apostasy, and on one occasion prostrated himself at the church door, and cried to all that entered, "Trample upon me—the salt that has lost its savour" (πατήσατε με . . . τὸ ἅλς τὸ ἀναλίσθητον; Socrates, iii. 13; Baronius, s. a. = Matt. v. 13.) Baronius assumes the identity of the magistrate of Edessa with the "rhetor" of Constantinople (s. a. 362, xiii. xiv.) but Tillemont regards them as different persons (Mém. vii. 331, 332). Libanius also mentions a Hecebolius, but gives us no clue to his history. (Ep. 309.) [T. W. D.]

HED ABBUS. [EWAIN.]

HEDDA (1) (HAEDDI, HEADDI, see AETLA), fifth bishop of the Gewissi, or West Saxons (M. H. B. 619). He was appointed, according to Bede, to succeed Leutherius, during the time of the West Saxon anarchy, in or about 676, and was consecrated at London (H. E. iv. 12). If he was identical with the pupil of St. Hilda, whom Bede calls Aetla, and makes bishop of Dorchester (H. E. iv. 23), he must from the beginning have had the two sees of Dorchester and Winchester as his predecessor had held them; if they were two different persons, Aetla must be supposed to have had but a short tenure of Dorchester, and then to have made room for Hedda. One of the most important acts of his administration must have been the final fixing of his see at Winchester, a measure which was completed by the translation of the body of St. Birinus (Bede, H. E. iii. 7). This event is placed in the Winchester Annals in the year 683 (Ang. Sac. i. 193), but the authority is slight, and the chronological signs discordant. Rudburn, the later Winchester annalist, has preserved a curious fragment of archbishop Theodore's legislation, which helps, if genuine, to shew that Hedda was opposed to the subdivision of the West-Saxon diocese, which was thus deferred until after his death. The subdivision of dioceses generally had been mooted at the synod of Hertford in 673, but passed over, no doubt in consequence of the difficulties of the times (Bede, H. E. iv. 5). Leutherius was then bishop of Wessex, and Bede mentions, as something special, that he held the two sees by synodal decree. The attempt was renewed by Theodore in 679, when he succeeded in dividing the Mercian dioceses, and may have so far succeeded in Wessex as to appoint Aetla to Dorchester. According to the decree preserved by Rudburn (Ang. Sac. i. 193; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 126, 127), the archbishop determined that as Hedda had by the translation of St. Birinus, at the command of pope Agatho, added so greatly to the honours of Winchester, his diocese should not be diminished so long as he lived. Nothing certain, however, can be affirmed about this transaction. Hedda's opposition to the division of his diocese continued as long as he lived. In the year 704, a synod was held in which the West Saxons were excluded from communion unless they would obey archbishop Brihtwald's injunction, 'in ordinatione episcoporum.' They were still contumacious in 705; but the measure was adopted as soon as Hedda died. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 269, 275.) More satisfactory is the evidence of Bede as to this prelate's character;

"he was a good man and just, and practised the life and learning of a bishop rather by the instruction of his own innate love of virtue than by lessons (lectionibus)"; from which we may infer that he was not a great scholar, another point in which a distinction between him and Aetla, the pupil of St. Hilda, might be discerned (H. E. v. 18). He was a close ally of Theodore; and the verses found at the end of Theodore's Penitential shew that he had influence with him. They are supposed to be written by a transcriber, but might be translated so as to appear the words of Theodore himself:

"Te nunc sancte speculator
Verbi Dei digne dator
Hæddi pie præsul precor,
Pontificum ditum decor,
Pro me peregrino,
Preces funde Theodoro."—

Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 263.

With Ine also Hedda was closely associated, and his name appears in the preamble of the laws of that king as one of the counsellors and advisers by whose help he was legislating; (Thorpe, Ancient Laws, p. 45; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 214, 218.)

It can hardly be questioned, the inference from Bede's words being so clear, and the coincidence in time being significant, that Hedda opposed the division of Wessex into dioceses. The reason for this must be sought in the distracted condition in which he found the kingdom at the beginning of his episcopate. In 676 Wessex was divided among its ealdormen; that year Centwine succeeded in establishing his power, but on no very certain basis; he reigned until 685, when Caedwalla took the kingdom; his whole reign was devoted to war; Ine succeeded in 688; but by that time it was tolerably clear that if the West Saxons were to remain one kingdom, they must remain one diocese; after fifteen years of good government it was different, and a subdivision impossible in 679 was quite practicable in 705. Wessex was passing, moreover, through the first stage of monastic and missionary fervour; and the foundation of the abbeys of Malmesbury, Glastonbury, and Abingdon, with other smaller houses, such as those at Tisbury and Nursling, no doubt dates from the episcopate of Hedda. Hence his name frequently appears in charters, whether spurious or genuine. Thus in 680 he attests a grant of Caedwalla (whose proper reign began in 685) to Wilfrid (Kemble, C. D. 18); the same year he himself appears as granting three cassates at Lantocal to Hemgisl, abbat of Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 19; Mon. Angl. i. 47), in 681 he consents to a grant by a king Baldred to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 20; Mon. Angl. i. 48); in 682 he attests a grant of Caedwalha to Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. 24; Mon. Angl. i. 258); in 688, a grant of Baldred to Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. 28; W. Malmesb. G. P. lib. v.); in 692 the grant of Oethilred to Barking (Kemble, C. D. 35), and in 695 a grant of Erkenwald to the same house (Kemble, C. D. 38); in 701 he attests Ine's charter to Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. 48; Ang. Sac. ii. 12); in 702 a grant to Glastonbury (ib. 49; Mon. Angl. i. 48). Bede places the death of Hedda at the beginning of the reign of Osred of Northumbria, whose reign commenced in 705: his memory was observed on the 30th of July. (Smith's note on Bede, H. E. v. 18.) The venerable historian had heard from Pecthelm, who served St. Aldhelm as deacon, that miracles were wrought at his grave, and that a deep ditch was made in the place by the practice of visitors carrying off portions of the dust, which possessed miraculous powers of healing.

William of Malmesbury (G. P. lib. ii. § 75) adds some particulars to Bede's account; asserting that Hedda, before he was bishop, had been a monk and abbat; and his name as abbat is appended to a charter of Leutherius (spurious), K. C. D. 11; the abbacy is generally supposed to have been Whitby (Rudburn, Ang. Sac. i. 192), but this seems to depend on the identification with Aetla; and Whitby was properly ruled by an abbas. William of Malmesbury also asserts that he had read letters of Hedda to Aldhelm, "non nimis indocte compositas," and therefore doubts Bede's assertion about him. He has, however, preserved no letter of Hedda, although (G. P. lib. v. § 195) he gives a letter of Aldhelm to him, in which he gives an account of his studies (Aldh. Opp. ed. Giles, Ep. 5, p. 96; Mon. Moguntina, ed. Jaffé, p. 32). The same historian found his name on one of the ancient illegible 'pyramids' at Glastonbury (Antt. Glouc. ed. Gale, p. 306).

HEDDA (2), eighth bishop of the Mercians, holding a see at Lichfield (M. H. B. 623). Very little is known about Hedda, except that he fills a place among the bishops of Mercia, which would otherwise be vacant. We learn from Eddius (V. Wilfr. c. 44, ed. Gale, p. 75) that when Wilfrid in 692 was driven by king Aldfrith into Mercia, he found that Saxulf, who was bishop there, was lately dead, and undertook the administration of his see. Saxulf appears to have united the dioceses of Leicester and Lichfield after the death of Cuthwin: and on his death Wilfrid is enumerated among the bishops of Leicester, Hedda taking the same place among those of Lichfield. (M. H. B. 623, 624; Will. Malmesb. G. P. lib. iv. § 172, ed. Hamilton, p. 307.) When Wilfrid returned to Northumbria, Hedda reunited the sees (ibid.). Although this evidence is comparatively late, it rests on the foundation of the ancient lists, and has some confirmation from charters and tradition. According to the Lichfield History (Anglia Sacra, i. 428), Hedda built the church of Lichfield, which was dedicated Dec. 31 (or 24) 700; and translated the bones of St. Chad; dying in the year 721. His name appears among the attestations to the act of the council of Clovesho in 716 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300) in company with that of his successor Wor, a difficulty which may be explained by supposing one to have sat at Leicester and the other at Lichfield. In some other documents there is a difficulty in distinguishing the signature of Hedda of Lichfield from those of his contemporary and namesake Hedda of Dorchester and Winchester, but the following probably belong to the former: a charter of Ethelred of Mercia to bishop Offor of Worcester in 691 or 692 (Kemble, C. D. 32; Mon. Angl. i. 584), two spurious charters granted to Worcester by the same king (K. C. D. 33, 34), a charter of Oshere (K. C. D. 36; Mon. Angl. i. 585), a grant of Suebraed of Essex to Wadhre bishop of London, dated June 13, 704 (Kemble,

C. D. 52). As all these fall between 676 and 705, they may possibly belong to the West Saxon bishop, but as they are connected more or less closely with Mercia, it seems more natural to refer them to the bishop of Lichfield. The Hedda who attests the charter of Osric in 676 (K. C. D. 12) is not Hedda of Winchester, for Leutherius also signs: Hedda and Saxulf sign together, so that if the charter be genuine, Hedda must have been already consecrated. (Canon. Lichf. Ang. Sac. i. 427, 428.) It is curious that this prelate is not even mentioned by Bede.

A story is told in the life of St. Guthlac (Mab. Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. pl. 1, p. 270) in which bishop Hedda is mentioned. The bishop was on his way to visit Guthlac; his attendants were discussing the stories of his sanctity; one of them, Wigferth or Wilferth, declared that he could distinguish by certain signs between a true and a false anchorite. On arriving at Crowland Hedda prevailed on Guthlac to be ordained priest, and to accept an invitation to dine. At dinner Guthlac looked at Wigferth, and asked him what he thought of the clerk whom he had undertaken to judge. Mabillon supposes this Hedda to be the bishop of Winchester, but it is much more reasonable to refer the story to the bishop of Lichfield, in whose diocese Crowland would probably be at the time. HEDDO, bishop of Strasburg. [ETHO.]

HEDESIUS, martyr. [AEDESIUS.]

HEDEBIA (EDIBIA), a lady in Gaul, who corresponded with St. Jerome (then at Bethlehem) about A.D. 405. She was of a remarkable family, descended from the Druids, and holding the hereditary office of priests of Belen, who was identified with Apollo, at Bayeux. Her grandfather and father (if maiores is to be taken strictly) Patera and Delphidius (the names being in each case derived from their office) were remarkable men. Of Patera, Jerome says in his Chronicle, at the year 339, "Patera rhetor Romae gloriosissime docet." Delphidius was a writer in prose and verse, and also a celebrated advocate, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus (xviii. 1), who tells a story of his pleading before the emperor Julian. They each in turn became professors at Bordeaux, and as such are celebrated by Ausonius (Carmen, Prof. Burd. iv. and v.) in two short poems, from which the details above given are derived. The wife and daughter of Delphidius became entangled in the Zoroastrian teaching of Priscillian, and suffered death in the persecution of his followers (Sulp. Sev. Hist. Sac. ii. 63, 64; Prosper Aquit. Chron.; Auson. Carmen, v.).

Hedibia was a diligent student of Scripture, and, finding no one in her neighbourhood who could assist her, she sent, by the hand of her friend Apodemius, a list of questions to Jerome, begging him to answer them. He did so in a long letter (e. 120, ed. Vall.). We hear of her again as a friend of Artemia, wife of Rusticus, (q. v.), on whose account she again wrote to Jerome (ep. 122, ed. Vall.). [W. H. F.]

HEDONE, an Aeon in the system of VALENTINUS, the consort of Autophyes, according to the account of Irenaeus (I. i. p. 6; II. xiv. p. 135), but of Acinetus according to that of Epiphanius (Haer. 31, p. 169). Some light is thrown on the introduction of the name into the system by the phrase in the Valentinian fragment, Epiph. Haer. 31, p. 170: ἡ Ὀγδοὺς συνήλθε μετὰ ἡδονῆς ἀγνητέου καὶ ἀφρόδρου μίξεως.

HEGEMONIUS, a writer said by Photius (cod. 85) to have written out (ἀναγράφοντα, perscripsit) the disputation of Archelaus against Manes. Ceillier (ii. 455) thinks that Hegemonius may have translated Archelaus's work into Greek, or have re-edited it with additions.

HEGESIPPUS (1), commonly known as the father of Church history, although his works, with the exception of a few fragments which will be found collected in Routh (Rel. Sac. i. pp. 207-219), and in Grabe (Spicilegium, ii. 203-214), have perished. Nothing positive is known of his birth or of the early circumstances of his life. From his use of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, written in the Syro-Chaldaic language of Palestine, his insertion in his history of words in the Hebrew dialect, and his mention of unwritten traditions of the Jews, Eusebius infers that he was by birth a Hebrew (E. H. iv. 22). The inference appears to be correct, although it is possible, as conjectured by Weissäcker (Herzog, Encyc. v. 647), that Eusebius, by the mention of these particulars, may only intend to confirm a fact which he had ascertained from other sources. The Jewish birth of Hegesippus, however, and his conversion from Judaism to Christianity afford no sufficient ground for the conclusion that he belonged in after life to the Judaizing rather than the Catholic section of the Christian church. Many Christians, Jews by birth, were in the second century entirely free from Judaizing tendencies. We owe whatever information we possess as to the time at which Hegesippus flourished to a statement of his own preserved by Eusebius (v. 22), who quotes him as saying that he made a voyage to Rome, spending many happy days at Corinth by the way. Hegesippus then adds, γενόμενος δὲ ἐν Ῥώμῃ διαδοχὴν ἐποιήσαμην μέχρις Ἀνικλήτου, οὗ διάκονος ἦν Ἐλεῦθερος, which is understood to mean that when at Rome he compiled a succession of the bishops of the Roman see to the time of Anicetus, whose deacon was Eleutherus. After this statement Hegesippus is represented as adding, "and to Anicetus succeeds Soter, after whom Eleutherus." Much as the meaning of these words, in their connexion with those preceding them, has been disputed, it does not seem difficult to gather the sense. Hegesippus means that the list of bishops compiled by him at Rome was drawn from the authentic records of the church there. That list closed with Anicetus. He was afterwards able, either from his own knowledge or through information gained from other sources, to add the names of Soter and Eleutherus. It thus appears that he was at Rome in the days of Anicetus, and that he made his inquiries then, although he did not publish them till a considerably later date. But Anicetus, according to the careful calculations of Lipsius (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe), was bishop of Rome from A.D. 156 to A.D. 167. Eleutherus again presided over the see from A.D. 175 to A.D. 189. We are thus furnished with two dates on which it seems possible to rely. Hegesippus had written much of his history previous to A.D. 167. He published it in the time of Eleutherus, and perhaps early in his episcopate. Any difficulty in accepting these dates has been occasioned by the rendering given to another passage of Eusebius (iv. 8), where he again quotes Hegesippus as speaking of certain games (ἀγών) instituted in honour of Antinous, a slave of the emperor Hadrian, of which he says ἐφ' ἡμῶν γενόμενος (a better established reading than γινόμενος). But the meaning of these words seems simply to be that the games referred to had been instituted in his own time, thus illustrating the μέχρι νῦν of the preceding sentence. Hadrian possessed the throne from A.D. 117 to A.D. 138, so that if Hegesippus published about A.D. 180, being then well advanced in life, he might well remember the times of that emperor. What has been said derives confirmation from a statement of Jerome, generally regarded as somewhat extravagant, that the life of Hegesippus had bordered on the apostolic age (vicinus apostolicorum temporum. De Vir. Ill. c. 22). But there is no extravagance in the remark. If Hegesippus was born about A.D. 120, and he might have been born considerably earlier without being too old to publish in A.D. 180, he may well be described as having lived near the times of St. John, to whose death, close upon the end of the first century, the apostolic age continued. It appears then that all our information hangs well together, and that we shall not be far wrong, if we fix the bloom of Hegesippus's life about the middle of the 2nd century.

The work of which we have spoken as containing the list of the Roman bishops was by no means confined to this, or to particulars connected with it. It was entitled πέντε ὑπομνήματα ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραγμάτων, and it embraced, so far as we may judge from its fragments, numerous miscellaneous observations, recollections, and traditions, arranged without any regard to order, and jotted down just as they might have occurred to its author, or come under his notice during his travels. This must be the meaning of Jerome when he tells us that the work contained the events of the church from Palestine to Rome, and from the death of Christ to the writer's own day. Anything like a regular history of the church is not to be thought of, Weizsäcker well remarking that, in that case, the story of James the Just ought to have been found in the first book, not in the last.

The general style of the work was thought plain and unpretending, sermone simplici, says Jerome, ut quorum vitam sectabatur dicendi quoque exprimeret characterem. With this description what remains of it sufficiently agrees. The question as to its trustworthiness is of greater moment, for the account given in it of James the head of the church in Jerusalem must, according to the degree of credibility we attach to it, greatly affect our view both of that distinguished man and of the relations subsisting between Judaism and Christianity in the period immediately following the crucifixion of our Lord. That account has led to many charges against Hegesippus as not having been careful enough to prove what he relates, and as having followed too readily the wonderful stories which could not fail to spring up and circulate in the infant church with regard to its apostles and martyrs. In particular it has been thought to be contradicted by Josephus, who tells us that "Ananus, the high-priest, assembled the Sanhedrin of judges, and brought before them the brother of Jesus who was called Christ, whose name was James, and some others. And, when he had formed an accusation against them, he delivered them to be stoned." (Antiq. xx. 9, 1.) We may be permitted to doubt, however, whether the sentence thus referred to was carried out, for not only was it unlawful for the Sanhedrin to inflict the punishment of death without consent of the Roman authorities, but Josephus informs us in the immediately following portion of his narrative that, when the most equitable of the citizens complained to the Procurator of what had been done, their charge against Ananus was, that it was not lawful for him to assemble a Sanhedrin without the Procurator's assent. Nothing is said of the stoning to death. When we add both that Eusebius, who has preserved the narrative, together with the other early fathers who allude to it, appear to have placed in it implicit confidence, and that there is nothing improbable in most, if not even in all, of the particulars mentioned, we may be permitted to doubt whether the charges against Hegesippus founded upon this passage are substantiated. In no other passage of our author's writings that has come down to us is there any evidence of a too easy credulity, or of a love of the marvellous that might throw suspicion upon the general accuracy of his statements. It is clear that Eusebius had a high opinion of him. He both speaks of him in the most commendatory terms, and quotes him on numerous occasions (see E. H. ii. 23; iii. 11, 16, 20, 32; iv. 8, 11, 22), illustrating his own words in iv. 8, πλείσταυς κεχρήμεθα φωναῖς. Such confidence appears to have been deserved. Hegesippus was possessed of an inquiring mind; as we have already seen he travelled much; he endeavoured in the course of his journeys to learn all that he could both of the past and present state of the churches that he visited; at Corinth the first epistle of Clement excited his curiosity; at Rome the history of its early bishops. Combine with all this his unpretending and unexaggerated style, and we are entitled to infer that he was very far indeed from being either a hasty observer or a credulous chronicler.

An important question relative to Hegesippus remains to be considered. What were his views of Christian truth? Was he of the Judaizing Christian party, or was he not? The question bears closely upon the estimate to be formed by us of the prevailing element in the Christian church of the first half of the 2nd century.

Baur has expressed himself strongly upon this point, looking upon Hegesippus as a representative of the narrowest section of the Jewish Christians of the time, as even one of the most declared enemies of the apostle Paul, and describing him as travelling like a commissioned agent in the interest of the Judaizers. (K. G. i. p. 84.) The same view has been advocated by Schwegler (Nachap. Zeit. i. p. 342, &c.). It is founded mainly upon an extract from his works, preserved in Photius (see in Routh, R. S. i. p. 219), where he is quoted as saying in reference to the words, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for the just," "Such words are spoken in vain, and those who use them lie against the Holy Scriptures and the Lord who says, 'Blessed are your eyes for they see, and your ears for they hear.'" As the same, or nearly the same, quotation is found in 1 Cor. ii. 9, it is argued that in this extract from Hegesippus we have a direct attack upon the apostle Paul, an attack made in a still more covert manner when, in another passage, the historian says that those whose aim was to destroy the sound rule of the doctrine of salvation as yet hid themselves in holes of darkness (in Euseb. E. H. iii. 32). Thus fiercely opposed to St. Paul, the inference is that Hegesippus was keenly Judaic; and, inasmuch as he speaks (in his history) of the church of Christ having remained till the time at which he was writing a pure and uncorrupted virgin, the conclusion is easy that the churches of Corinth and Rome, and indeed generally, must have been strongly pervaded in the middle of the 2nd century by the Judaic element, and that they cannot have been as yet catholic in spirit. The point deserves a few moments' consideration.

And (1) it may be noticed that in the extract preserved in Photius there is no mention of, or express reference to, the apostle Paul. (2) That the writer speaks distinctly not of one person but of many, or at least of several. He uses the plural number, "those who say," thus making it probable that he refers to more than one, if it can be shewn from independent sources that more than one then existed by whom the words were used. (3) There were such persons. We know that the Gnostics were in the habit of so using the words, and that they described by means of them the very essence of that spiritual insight which the neophyte who had just sworn the oath of allegiance to them received, "And when he (i.e. he who is about to be initiated) has sworn this oath, he goes on to the Good One, and beholds 'whatever things eye hath not seen, and ear hath not heard, and which have not entered into the heart of man'" (Hippolytus, Ref. of all Heresies, i. p. 193, T. and T. Clark). By much the more probable inference, therefore, is that Hegesippus refers to this Gnostic misinterpretation of the words and not to the apostle

Paul (comp. Routh, R. S. i. p. 281; Ritschl, Die Entstehung der Altk. Kirche, p. 267; Hilgenfeld, Die Apost. Väter, p. 102). (4) The words quoted are not given in the form in which they appear in 1 Cor. ii. 9, where instead of "the just" we have "them that love Him." The substitution of the one expression for the other suggests at once that Gnostic arrogance which so often sought satisfaction in titles of that kind. (5) The inference now drawn as to the object of the first quotation is rendered still more probable by the fact that it is impossible to apply to St. Paul the words of the second quotation spoken of above. To describe that apostle as hiding himself in a hole of darkness is to present him in a light the very opposite of that which is most prominent in his whole character and life and labours. (6) The probability that Hegesippus had Gnostics and not St. Paul in view, is still further increased when we consider that Eusebius, who had his whole work before him, speaks in decided language of his soundness in the faith, and of his having recorded the pure tradition of apostolic preaching (iv. 8), language that he would certainly not have used had he not had ample evidence that the opinions of his author were in accordance with catholic truth. Besides this, he tells us that Hegesippus had in his work given the "fullest testimony as to his own opinions" (E. H. iv. 22). He was not, therefore, judging hastily. (7) Hegesippus himself, when relating what he had found in each succession of bishops examined and in each city visited by him, declares that he found all things in a condition conformable to what was required by "the law and the prophets and the Lord," authorities which Ritschl (u. s. p. 268) has shewn to be precisely those of the Catholic church of the time, to which it made its appeal, and in which it instructed its catechumens. (8) If Neander be right in thinking (Ch. Hist. ii. p. 464, T. and T. Clark) that the mode in which Hegesippus speaks of the first epistle of Clement shews that he believed himself to find in it the pure doctrine of Christ, the conclusion to which all these remarks lead may be considered incontrovertible, for the Pauline colouring of Clement's epistle is denied by no one. (9) It may still further be noticed, as not without a bearing upon the point before us, that Hegesippus, who approved of the epistle of Clement, must have known that this father quotes in Ch. xxxiv., and for a purpose precisely similar to that of the apostle, the very passage in question, though with a slight variation in the words. How, then, was it possible that he should hold the very contrary opinion as to the use made of it by St. Paul? It is obviously a particular application of the passage, different from that of the apostle, that he has in view.

In the light of all these considerations it is not too much to say that Hegesippus appears to have been not a Judaizing but a Catholic Christian; and, if so, he becomes a witness not only for the catholicity in the main of the Christian church of the 2nd century, but for the extent to which Catholic truth prevailed in it, and for the hold which that truth had acquired over the minds of its members. It ought not to be forgotten throughout this whole controversy that, whatever Hegesippus witnesses for, his evidence has reference to the condition of the church upon a large scale. It is of no small corner that he speaks, but of a very large, and that probably the most active, portion of it. Either, therefore, over this wide extent the church was marked by a narrow Judaic spirit with some members perhaps, yet not worthy of mention, of a freer and a better one, or over the same wide extent the church was catholic in spirit, with heretical sects struggling to corrupt its faith. Which of the two views is most in correspondence with all that we know of the first half of the 2nd century, the reader may be safely left to say. If his verdict be in favour of the latter, it becomes impossible to look at Hegesippus in the light in which he has been presented by the Tübingen school. We must regard him as a Catholic, not as a Judaizing Christian, and his statements as to the condition of the church in his day become a powerful argument against, rather than in favour of, the conclusions of that school. [W. M.]

HEGESIPPUS (9) (EGESIPPUS), the alleged author of a work of which a translation from Greek into Latin, or what purported to be such, appeared somewhere about A.D. 400, and is commonly referred to under one of the titles De Bello Judaico, De Excidio Urbis Hierosolymitanæ. The work is in five books, the first four of which are taken from the corresponding ones of the Wars of Josephus; and the fifth in great part from the sixth and seventh books of the same. It is not a translation, properly so called. The translator freely adds to his author, sometimes from the later books of the Antiquities of Josephus, sometimes from the Roman historians and other sources. He also freely composes speeches for the actors in the scenes which he narrates.

It is clear that the author was a Christian, from the language in which he speaks of the death of our Lord and the subsequent persecution of His disciples by the Jews (ii. 12, p. 151); of Simon, and of the apostles Peter and Paul (iii. 2, pp. 170-173); and of Judaism (iv. 5, p. 230). The entire work indeed is that of one who was an earnest defender of the Christian faith. An approximation to his date is supplied by several passages; as when he speaks of Constantinople having long become the second city of the Roman empire (iii. 5, p. 179), and of Antioch, once the metropolis of the Persians, being in his time the defence of the Byzantines against that people. He also speaks of the triumphs of the Romans in "Scotia" and in "Saxonia," using language strikingly similar to that of Claudian (c. A.D. 398) on the subject (v. 18, p. 299; Claud. De iv. Cons. Honor. 31-34).

The work early acquired a considerable reputation. It may possibly be referred to by Cassiodorus towards the close of the 5th century, who, when speaking of the writings of Josephus, says that their translation has been attributed to Jerome, to Ambrose, and to Rufinus (Cassiod. de Inst. Div. Literar. in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxx. 1132). It was certainly made use of by Isidore of Seville (599-636), whose language in reference to the Dead Sea, the lake of Gennesaret, the Orontes, and other subjects, is often a literal translation from Hegesippus.

A MS. of the work ascribed to Hegesippus, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and of about the 7th century, has at the close of the first book "Egesippi liber primus explicit," and at the commencement of the second "Ambrosius Episcopus de Graeco transtulit in Latinum" (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. p. 13). Other manuscripts likewise ascribed the translation to Ambrose, while some attribute the original itself to that father; and these are followed by the editio princeps (Jodoc. Ascens. Paris, 1511). The Benedictines, however, strongly reject the Ambrosian authorship, asserting that the work contains nothing whatever in Ambrose's style; while Galland earnestly contends for it, and reprints an elaborate dissertation of Mazochius, which he regards as conclusive (Galland. Biblioth. Patr. vii. prolegom. p. xxix.). The editors of the Patrologia incline to the decision of the Benedictines, but print the work among the writings of Ambrose (xv. 1962). The latest and most correct edition (Marburg, 1858, 1864, 4to) is that which was commenced by professor C. F. Weber of Marburg, and completed after his death by professor Julius Caesar, who has elaborately discussed the question of the authorship and date (pp. 389-399). It is at least possible that Hegesippus was a misreading of an early copyist, who had before him Ex Josippo (Gronov. Observ. in Script. Eccl. Monobiblos. 1651, 1-20).

This work has been frequently translated; into Italian by P. Lauro, A.D. 1544, into French by J. Millet, A.D. 1556, into Dutch anonymously A.D. 1711, and A.D. 1722. [T. W. D.]

They again are subject to the twelve aeons who dwell in the next highest region. Seen from the sphere εἰμαρμένη, this world appears but as a speck of dust, and its light as utter darkness; but equally insignificant is the appearance of the sphere εἰμαρμένη as seen from the region of the twelve aeons. HEISTULFUS (ASTULPHUS, HASTULPHUS), apparently a Lombard, to whom Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia, wrote a letter from Frankfort, A.D. 794, severely reprimanding him for his barbarous treatment of his wife, whom he had murdered, on a probably false charge of infidelity which had been brought against her by one person only, a man of most disreputable character. Paulinus offered him the choice of retirement to a monastery, or a lifetime of penitential discipline, which he describes at some length. The letter early passed into the Canon Law, circ. A.D. 866. Wulfadus archbishop of Bourges prayed Hincmar archbishop of Rheims, the great canonist of his age, to send him a copy of it, as he needed its guidance in a similar case, which appears to have arisen in his own jurisdiction (Flodoard. Hist. Eccl. Remens. iii. 21, in Patrol. Lat. cxxxv. 204). In the early part of the 11th century Burchardus bishop of Worms adopted it as authoritative in his Decreta (vi. 40, Ep. Paulin. . . . ad Heistulf. in Patr. Lat. cxl. 774). Towards the close of that century Ivo bishop of Chartres similarly adopted it both in his Decretum and his Panormia. He, however, ascribes the letter to pope Stephen V. A.D. 816-817 (Decr. viii. 126, Hastulpho, in Patr. Lat. clxi. 610, Panorm. vii. 16, Astulpho in Patr. Lat. ib. 1283.) Gratian also adopts it in his Decretum, but like Ivo ascribes it to Stephen V. (cxxxiii. 9, ii. c. 8, Hastulpho in Patr. Lat. clxxxvii. 1512). Labbe published the letter from a Rheims MS., which seems to confirm Burchardus both as to the orthography of the inscription and as to the authorship of the letter (Concil. vii. 1064; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcix. 186). [T. W. D.]

HEITO, bishop of Basle. [HETTO.]

HEIU, a Northumbrian lady, the first person in that province who took the veil, which she received at the hands of bishop Aidan. She founded a nunnery at Hereteu, or Hartlepool, in the county of Durham, over which Hilda subsequently presided. The burial-ground of this ancient house of religion was discovered in 1838, and some remarkable slabs were found bearing crosses and inscriptions in Latin or Runes. After a short residence at Hartlepool Heiu retired to Calcaria, where she established another house of devotion. The Roman Calcaria is the English Kaelcacaestir, and is generally considered to be the modern Tadcaster, a small country town about six miles to the south-west of York. It is possible that the neighbouring village of Healaugh means Heiu's laeg, or lee, and that her residence was there. In the cemetery of that place Mr. D. H. Haigh detected an ancient gravestone bearing Heiu's name. The sole authority for the events of Heiu's life is Bede, H. E. iv. 23.

The author of the Life and Miracles of St. Bega, who wrote in the 12th century, identified her with Heiu, making her reside on the Cambrian headland which bears her name before she settled at Hereteu. He also brings Bega to Hackness as the Begu whom Bede mentions as one of the companions of Hilda in that place. There is no authority whatever for these appropriations; Leland, and others after him, have quoted the assertions of the biographer of St. Bega (Vitae et Mirac. S. Begae, ed. Tomlinson, 1842; Smith's note to Bede, H. E. iv. 23).

In the Transactions of the Yorkshire Archaeological Society, parts xi. and xii. pp. 349-91, is a paper by Mr. D. H. Haigh, on 'The Monasteries of St. Heiu and St. Hild,' with engravings of the inscribed stones at Hartlepool and Healaugh; see also Archaeologia, xxvi. p. 479 et seqq.; Stephens, Runic Monuments, 392, &c.; Hübner's *Inscr. HELAIR, HELARIUS, Irish saint of Inis Locha-Cre (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 239, 427.) [ELAIR.] [J. G.]

HELAN (1), a priest in the district of Rheims, in the 6th century. He is said to have come from Ireland soon after Clovis was converted to Christianity (A.D. 496), together with six brothers, of whom he was the second in age, the eldest being St. Gilrianus (May 8), and a younger St. Tressan (Feb. 7), and three sisters. Presenting themselves to St. Remigius, archbishop of Rheims, "the father of the stranger," they were received by him with kindness. They lived in part by the generosity of others, but principally by the labour of their own hands. At their desire Remigius settled them upon the banks of the Marne, at no great distance from each other. To Helanus's lot fell a spot called Buxiolum, where he passed his life in soberness, piety and justice, instructing his neighbours in religion, and at length happily died. Another account places their date in the 7th century. Nothing trustworthy is known of them. Helanus's name appears in late martyrologies on Oct. 7. (Molanus, Auct. ad Usuardum, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 552; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 903-5; Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iv. 9; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, cap. xvi. vol. ii. 488-490.) [S. A. B.]

HELAN (2). Another Helan is mentioned by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 340), referring to Colgan. He was probably an Irishman, and accompanied St. Eloquius (Dec. 3) into Gaul and Belgium where, according to Molanus and Miraeus, he was honoured as patron of Solemniacus in Gaul and of Isegegimius in Belgium. He died in the monastery of Vassor, near the Meuse, in Namur (Walciodorensi coenobio), and is commemorated on Jan. 7, having flourished in the middle of the 7th century. (Colgan, Acta SS. 96 c. 6, among the disciples and companions of St. Fursey; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 285, ii. 377, 379.) [J. G.]

HELARIANUS, third bishop of Oleron in Gams's Series (p. 590), succeeding Licerius, and followed by Artemon, was sitting in A.D. 614. He is omitted from the list of the Gallia Christiana (i. 1264), and it is very doubtful whether he is to be ascribed to this see. [S. A. B.]

HELENA (1), said to have been the companion of SIMON Magus. According to Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 26) and Irenaeus (i. 23, p. 99), who possibly makes use of a lost work of Justin's, she was a prostitute whom Simon had purchased from a brothel at Tyre, and whom he led about with him, holding her up to the veneration of his disciples. Giving himself out to be the Supreme Power and the Father above all, he taught, says Irenaeus, that "she was the first conception of his mind, the mother of all things, by whom in the beginning he conceived the thought of making the angels and archangels; for that this Conception [ENNOEA] proceeded forth from him and, knowing her father's wishes, descended to the lower world, and produced the angels and powers, by whom also he said that this world was made. But after she had produced them, she was detained by them through envy, since they were unwilling to be considered the offspring of any other being; for he himself was entirely unknown by them; but his Conception was detained by those powers and angels which were put forth from her, and suffered every insult from them that she might not return upward to her father; and this went so far that she was even confined in a human body, and for ages passed into other female bodies, as if from one vessel into another. He said, also, that she was that Helen on account of whom the Trojan war was fought; for reviling of whom by his verses, Stesichorus was struck blind, and afterwards, on account of his penitence and palinode, restored to sight; that after passing from one body to another, and constantly meeting with insult, at last she became a public prostitute, and that she was 'the lost sheep.' On this account he had come that he might first of all reclaim her and free her from her chains, and then give salvation to men through the knowledge of himself." The same story is told by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 19, p. 174); Tertullian (de Anima, 34); Epiphanius (Haer. 21); Philaster (Haer. 29); Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 1). Tertullian evidently knows no more than he read in Irenaeus, but Hippolytus, who himself read the Μεγάλη Ἀποκάλυψις, gives some additional particulars, as for instance, that Simon allegorized the story of the wooden horse and of Helen and her torch. The wooden horse must also have been mentioned in the earlier treatise against heresies, used by Epiphanius and Philaster, both of whom state that Simon expounded it as representing the ignorance of the nations. Epiphanius, then, it may be believed, did not invent some other particulars, in which he differs from or goes beyond Irenaeus. He states that Simon gave to this Ennoea of his, the names Prunicus and Holy Spirit; and he gives a different account, in some respects, of the reasons for her descent into the lower world. According to this account, she was sent in order to rob the Archons, the framers of this world, of their power, by enticing them to desire her beauty, and setting them in hostility to one another.

The honour paid to Helena by the followers of Simon was known to Celsus, who tells (v. 62) that certain of the Simonians were also called Heleniani, from Helena, or else from a teacher Helenus. We are told, in addition, by Irenaeus and Hippolytus, that the Simonians had an image of Simon in the form of Jupiter, and of Helen in that of Minerva, and that they honoured them, calling the former lord, the latter lady. This adaptation of the myth of Athene springing from the head of Zeus to the alleged relation of Ennoea to the first Father, is of a piece with the appropriation of other Grecian myths by these heretics.

The doctrine attributed to Simon in these representations, has close affinity with that of other Gnostic systems, more especially with the Ophite system, described at the end of the first book of Irenaeus, except that in the Simonian system, one female personage fills parts which in other systems are distributed among more than one. But in several systems we have the association with the First Cause of a female principle, his thought or conception; and we have (see, for instance, PISTIS SOPHIA) the myth of the descent of a Sophia into the lower material regions, her sufferings from the hostility of the powers who rule there, her struggles with them, and her ultimate redemption. What is peculiar to Simon is his doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and his identification, by means of it, of himself and his female companion with the two principal personages of the Gnostic mythology. The fictions that have been invented concerning other founders of heresies do not at all resemble this story, for Simon persuaded his followers not only to condone his connexion with a degraded person, but to accept the fact of her degradation fully admitted as only a greater proof of his redemptive power. And we find it easier to believe, therefore, that the story had a foundation in fact, than that it was imagined without any. On the other hand, it does not seem likely that the hero of this story could have been the first Gnostic, it being more credible that he turned to his account a mythology already current, than that he could have obtained acceptance for his tale of Ennoea, if invented for the first time for his own justification.

Baur has suggested (Christliche Gnosis, p. 308) that Justin in his account of the honours paid at Samaria to Simon and Helena may have been misled by the honours there paid to Phoenician sun and moon divinities of similar names. On this and other questions connected with the subject of this article, see SIMON. Suffice it here to say that one strong fact in support of his theory, viz. that in the Clementine Recognitions (ii. 14, preserved in the Latin of Rufinus) the companion of Simon is called Luna, may possibly have originated in an early error of transcription. She is Helena in the corresponding passage of the Clementine Homilies, ii. 23; and we find elsewhere the false reading Selene for Helene, as for instance in Augustine (de Haer. 1). We attach little weight in this argument to the statement of the Clementine Homilist already quoted under DOSITHEUS, Vol. I. p. 902, that as Jesus, the Sun, had twelve apostles corresponding to the twelve months of the year, so John the Baptist, the Moon, corresponding to the twenty-nine and a half days at the month, had in his circle twenty-nine men and this woman. [G. S.]

HELENA (2), ST., or FLAVIA JULIA HELENA AUGUSTA, first wife of Constantius Chlorus, and mother of Constantine the Great, born about A.D. 248, died about 327.

2. Invention of the Cross.

1. Life.

Little is known for certain of the life of St. Helena beyond the two facts that she was mother of Constantine the Great and that at the age of about eighty years she undertook a remarkable pilgrimage to Palestine, which resulted in the adornment and increased veneration of the holy places in that country.

The date of her birth is only arrived at by inference from her age at the time when she undertook this pilgrimage. The place where she was born is also doubtful; but the most probable of those which are mentioned is Drepanum in Bithynia, which Constantine is said to have called Helenopolis in her honour (Procopius, de Aedificiis, v. 2, vol. iii. p. 311, ed. Bonn; Chron. Pasch.). The story that she was daughter of a British prince, Coel, and born at York, Colchester or London, is merely a portion of the legend which afterwards arose connecting the origin of her famous son with Britain. [CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, Vol. I. p. 625.]

She was doubtless of humble parentage, being, according to one story, the daughter of an innkeeper (Anon. Valesii 2, 2, "matre vilissima," St. Ambros. de Obitu Theodosii, § 42, p. 295, "Stabulariam hanc primo fuisse adserunt, sic cognitam Constantio seniori, qui postea regnum adeptus est. Bona stabularia quae tam diligenter praesepe Domini requisivit," etc.). Constantius at the time when he made her acquaintance was a young officer in the army, of good family and position, nearly related, by the female line, to the emperor Claudius, and he appears to have at first united her to himself by the looser tie which was then customary between persons of such different conditions (St. Hieron. Chron. anno 2322; Orosius, vii. 25; Chron. Pasch. A.D. 304, vol. i. p. 516, ed. Bonn; Zos. ii. 8). The relation of "concubinatus" might be a lifelong one, and did not necessarily imply anything of immorality. In outward appearance it differed nothing from the ordinary civil marriage by mutual consent of the parties to live together, and was sometimes called "conjugium inaequale."^a

Her son Constantine, who was also apparently her only child, was born probably in the year 274, at Naissus in Dardania, the country where his father's family had for some time been settled (Nish, recently acquired by Servia). After his birth it is probable that Constantius advanced Helena to the position of a lawful wife.

^a Cod. Just. "de liberis naturalibus," v. 27, 3, a law of Theodosius and Valentinian II. Cf. the section "de concubinis" in the Digest, xxv. 7, especially § 3, "in concubinato potest esse et aliena liberta et ingenua, sed maxime ea quae obscuro loco nata est." This is very like Eutropius's "obscurum matrimonium." See, for further details, Dict. Christ. Ant. s.v. "Concubinage;" Herzog, Theol. Encycl. s.v. "Concubinatus" iii. p. 105, foll.; and Puchta, Institut. iii. § 287.

That she had this position is expressly stated by some of our authorities, but the very emphasis of their assertion implies that there was something peculiar about the case (Euseb. H. E. viii. 13, 12, παῖδα γνήσιον . . . καταλιπόν and the inscription from Salerno given below). Respect for Constantine would naturally prevent the writers who lived in his reign from stating the circumstances in detail. It may be conjectured, however, that the law to legitimate the children of a concubine "per subsequens matrimonium" was suggested to that emperor by his mother's experience.^b

After living with Constantius some twenty years Helena was divorced by him on the occasion of his elevation to the dignity of Caesar in 292. The Augustus Maximian, in choosing him for his colleague, required him to take this step, as a matter of policy, in order that he might marry his own step-daughter, Theodora, and Galerius was obliged to do the like by Diocletian (Eutrop. Brev. ix. 22; Victor, de Caesaribus, 39; Epitome, 54). Such a proceeding has its parallels, especially in Roman history, e.g. Valentinian similarly repudiated Marina Severa, the mother of Gratian. The looseness of the marriage tie among the Romans is quite a sufficient explanation of these acts without supposing any offence or misconduct on the part of the wife, or any special heartlessness on that of the husband. We know nothing of her life during the remainder of her husband's reign. When Constantine succeeded him in 306, it would seem probable that he recalled his mother to the court, but direct evidence on this point is wanting. We have a coin stamped HELENA.N.F. i.e. nobilissima femina, with a head on one side and a star in a laurel crown upon the other, which may have been struck in her honour whilst Constantine was still Caesar.^c

The statement of Eusebius that Constantine paid his mother great honours, and caused her to be proclaimed Augusta to all the troops, and struck her image on gold coins, is no doubt generally quite correct, but it is unfortunately unaccompanied with any dates (Vita Const. iii. 47). Silver and copper coins are found with the name Flavia Helena Augusta, struck in her lifetime. Others with the remarkable epigraph Fl. Jul. Helenae Aug. were struck at Constantinople and Treves as memorials after her death, and at the same time Theodora was commemorated in like manner, to mark the reconcilia-

^b See Cod. Just. v. 27. 5. and Godefroi's note Cod. Theod. iv. 6. 1. It seems likely that Constantine's abridgment of the rights of inheritance possessed by natural children was intended to induce their parents to marry.

^c Eckhel, vol. viii. pp. 143, 145, conjectures it to belong to a wife of Crispus, cf. p. 102, and so does Banduri. But Helena, wife of Crispus, is herself only a conjecture from the law of Constantine, Cod. Theod. ix. 38, 1, addressed to Maximus, prefect of Rome in 322, "propter Crispi atque Helenae partum omnibus indulgemus praeter veneficos, homicidas, adulteros;" and Godefroi very plausibly emends "partum" into "paratum" or "apparatum," and refers it to a journey to Rome. The late Count J. F. W. de Salis was of opinion that there was no evidence from coins in favour of the existence of such a person as Helena, wife of Crispus, see CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, Vol. I. p. 640, and the following article.

tion of the two branches of the family. But as yet none of gold have come to light. She is also styled Augusta in inscriptions, but in none I believe necessarily earlier than 320. (Mommson, Inscr. Neap. 106, given below; Inscr. Urbis Romae, C. I. L. vol. v. 1134-1136.)

Eusebius also tells us that it was through Constantine that she became a Christian (V. C. iii. 57). His authority on such a point is good, and it is supported (whatever the support may be worth) by the probably spurious letters preserved in the acts of St. Silvester (see CONSTANTINE, p. 646). We must therefore reject the other story which ascribes his conversion to his mother's influence (Theodoret. i. 18, τὴν τῆς εὐσεβείας αὐτῇ προσεργικοῦσα τροφήν, and the late and fabulous Eutychius Alexandrinus, pp. 408, 456, ed. Oxon.).

In the year 322, according to Godefroy's probable emendation of the law in the Theodosian code, Constantine granted a release of prisoners on account of a journey of Crispus and Helena to Rome (Cod. Theod. ix. 38, 1). This is one of several indications of the close tie existing between the aged empress and her eldest grandson, with whom she naturally took part rather than with the children of Fausta, half-sister of her rival Theodora. The following inscription from Salerno belongs to one of the next years and marks the power of Helena in her son's court. It must have been set up after the younger Constantius was appointed Caesar, Nov. 8, 323, and before the death of Crispus, whose name was afterwards erased (Mommson, Inscr. Neapol. 106, Orell. 1074, Wilmanns 1079).

i.e. "To our sovereign lady Flavia Augusta Helena, the most chaste wife of the divine Constantius, the mother of our Lord Constantine, the greatest, most pious and victorious Augustus, the grandmother of our Lords Crispus and Constantine and Constantius, the most blessed and fortunate Caesars, this is erected by Alpinus Magnus, vir clarissimus, corrector of Lucania and Bruttii, devoted to her excellence and piety."

In the year 326 Crispus was put to death on an obscure charge by his father's orders [see CONSTANTINE, p. 630]. Tradition connects this dark act with the name of Fausta; and Helena's bitter complaints about her grandson's death are said to have irritated Constantine to execute his wife by way of retribution (Victor, Epit. 41, Fausta coniuge ut putant suggerente Crispum filium necari iussit. Dehinc uxorem suam Faustam in balneas ardentis coniectam interemit, cum eum mater Helena dolore nimio nepotis increparet).

We may fairly suppose that it was as much distress and penitence for these tragic and cruel acts, as thankfulness for the success of the Nicene council, that roused Constantine to found and endow a number of churches at this time, and to give other material advantages to the Christian church. Helena no doubt shared in her degree in the same feelings, and made a vow to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land (Eus. V. C. iii. 42).

The details of her journey, as regards the holy places, are given in the next section. Eusebius speaks strongly of her youthful spirit, notwithstanding her great age, nearly eighty years (V. C. iii. 42, ἡκε δὲ σπεύδουσα πρὸς τὰς ἁγίας, cf. ch. 46). She received almost unlimited supplies of money from her son and spent it in royal charities to the poor and bounties to the soldiery; as well as using her power to free prisoners and criminals condemned to the mines and to recall persons from exile (ib. 44). She was a frequent attendant at the church services, and adorned the buildings with costly offerings (ib. 45). The date of the death of Helena is uncertain, but it cannot have been earlier than 327, because she did not take her journey to Palestine until after the death of Crispus. Tillemont therefore puts it in 328, and it may have been later. (See further in Clinton, F. E. ii. 80, 81.) Her body was carried with great pomp to 'the imperial city,' that is probably to Constantinople (Eus. V. C. iii. 47; Socrates, i. 17, thus glosses the phrase—εἰς τὴν βασιλεύουσαν νέαν Πόλιν: see CONSTANTINE, p. 632). It was believed however in the Western church that she was buried at Rome, and there is a tradition that in the year 480 her body was stolen from thence by a monk Theogistus and brought to Hautvilliers, in the diocese of Rheims. Others say that it is still in the porphyry vase in the church of Ara Coeli (Tillemont, Mém. Hist. Eccl. tom. vii. note 7).

The place too of her death is strangely uncertain. Eusebius's silence would lead us to conclude that she died in Palestine; but if the traditions of her bounty to the people and church of Cyprus on her way home are of any value it must have been somewhere nearer Rome or Constantinople. These traditions may be seen in M. de Mas Latrie's Histoire de l'île de Chypre sous les Lusignan, Paris, 1852-1861; Church Quarterly Review, vol. vii. p. 186 foll.

[J. W.]

Invention of the Cross.—It is in connexion with this famous story that the name of Helena is especially interesting to the student of church history. Its truth has been much discussed, and in order to enable the reader to form a dispassionate judgment, the best course will be to summarize briefly the evidence of our ancient authorities, noticing the points on which they agree and those on which they differ.

1. In the very interesting itinerary of the anonymous Pilgrim from Bordeaux to Jerusalem, which is generally referred to the year 333, seven years after the date assigned to the finding of the cross (Migne, Patr. xiii. 771), we have a description of the city, and many traditional sites of events both in the Old and New Testament are mentioned. Among these are the house of Caiaphas, with the pillar at which our Lord was scourged, the praetorium of Pontius Pilate, the little hill (monticulus) of Golgotha, and, a stone's throw from it, the cave of the Resurrection. On the latter spot a beautiful basilica erected by Constantine is noticed, as also on Mount Olivet and at Bethlehem. Yet there is no allusion to the cross or any part of it, nor is the name of Helena once mentioned.

2. Our second authority is Eusebius, whose life of Constantine was written probably in 338, five years after the visit of the Bordeaux Pilgrim. He records the visit of Helena to Jerusalem, but does not connect her name in any way with the place of Crucifixion, nor with the Holy Sepulchre.

He tells us that Constantine built a house of prayer on the site of the Resurrection, and that he also beautified the two other caves connected respectively with our Lord's birth and His Ascension, and that he did so in honour of his mother's memory, who went to Palestine and built two churches, one at Bethlehem, the other on the Mount of Ascension. We therefore have this remarkable fact, that, of the three famous caves, Eusebius connects Helena not with that of the Resurrection, but only with the other two. It is true that he says afterwards that these were not the only churches which she built, but it is hardly conceivable that he should have left the one on the site of the Resurrection unspecified.

The original motive of her journey, he says, was to return thanks to God for His peculiar mercies to her family, and to enquire as to the welfare of the people of the country. His account of the discovery of the tomb by Constantine is not free from difficulty. It is not easy to say whether he represents the discovery of the sepulchre as being before or after the death of Helena. His language is quite general, but the presumption, as has been said, is that, if it had been before it, her name would have been connected with the event.

He does not imply that any difficulty was experienced in finding the site of the tomb, but there is nothing as to the cross. All the words which he uses in his minute description bear upon the Resurrection, not the Passion, of our Lord. But in Constantine's letter to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, which he inserts, there are one or two expressions of which the same cannot be said. Allowing for the excesses of hyperbolic language, it is still hard to understand the words that, "when the cave was opened, the sight which met the eyes excelled all possible eulogy, as much as heavenly things excel earthly," unless some kind of memorial other than the tomb itself was discovered; and immediately afterwards we have two expressions referring definitely to our Lord's passion. The first is, τὸ γὰρ γινώρισμα τοῦ ἀγιοτάτου ἐκείνου πάθους ὑπὸ τῇ γῇ πάλαι κρυπτόμενον, and the second, ἀφ' οὗ (since) τοῦ σωτηρίου πάθους πλῆστιν εἰς φῶς προήγαγεν (sc. the tomb). At the same time it is difficult to believe that, had the cross or any part of it been discovered, it should not have been more exactly described, and the most probable explanation is that πάθος is used to describe the whole scene of Redemption, of which the Resurrection was a part (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 26-42, Patr. Gr. xx. 1086). The fact that the place very soon came to be venerated is proved by Eusebius's own statement in his Commentary on Ps. lxxvii. 18, that marvels (θαύματα) were even then wrought at the tomb of Christ.

3. Our next authority is St. Cyril of Jerusalem, whose catechetical lectures were delivered, he says, upon the very spot where our Lord was crucified, and, as we know from other sources, not more than twenty years after the alleged discovery (viz. in 346). In these there are three allusions to the wood of the cross (iv. 10, x. 19, xiii. 4). The most definite is in x. 19, where he describes it as "until to-day visible amongst us (μέχρι σήμερον παρ' ἡμῶν φαινόμενον)," "and now filling nearly the whole world by means of those who in faith take from it." In his letter to Constantius, which, however, is of doubtful authenticity [CYRIL], it is distinctly stated that the cross was discovered in the reign of Constantine (cap. 3). The first quotations are quite sufficient to prove the existence of a belief in his day that the real wood of our Lord's cross had been discovered, but they do no more than this. They do not give us the grounds of the belief. We know how credulous many were in the matter of relics, and there is nothing to shew us that St. Cyril was more discriminating than his contemporaries, and we must not forget that the name of Cyril is not free in another matter from the suspicion of insincerity and unscrupulousness in the use of means to attain what he regarded as a good end. [CYRIL.] Nor, though he speaks of the cross, does he connect it with the name of Helena. The context certainly does not require it, since the fact of the discovery, and not the author of it, is what he is insisting upon. Still, as regards Helena herself, it remains true that none of our three earliest authorities speak of her as the discoverer.

4. St. Chrysostom, writing probably before the year 387, speaks of the wood of the true cross and of the anxiety felt by many to procure a piece of it (Quod Christus sit Deus, cap. x., Patr. Gr. xlviii. 826).

5. Sulpicius Severus, who must probably be placed next in order (circ. 395), tells us that Helena built three basilicas (not two, as in Eusebius), one on each of the great sites of the Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension. No other writer, except Paulinus, mentions separate churches of the Passion and Resurrection. The site of the passion, he says, was discovered by Helena, but he does not add that it was by supernatural help. At the Mount of Ascension were found the footsteps of Christ, and the ground by its hardness resisted all attempts to pave it. Three crosses were discovered, and the right one ascertained by the miraculous restoration to life of a dead body. (Hist. Sacr. i. 33, Patr. Gr. xx. 148.)

6. St. Ambrose, writing in 395, agrees with Eusebius that the main object of Helena's visit was to pray for the prosperity of her son, but adds that on her arrival she was inspired by the Spirit with the desire to search for the cross, that she distinguished the true cross by its title (thus differing from Sulpicius and all later writers), that two of the nails were used by the emperor, one being fixed in his crown and the other employed as a bit for his bridle (de Obitu Theodosii, cap. 41 foll., Patr. Gr. xvi. 1399).

7. Rufinus (writing in 400, according to the Life in Migne's edition) tells us further that not only was the journey inspired by God, but that the place of the Passion was miraculously revealed; that the three crosses were found "confuso ordine," and the title separately; that the true cross was discovered by the miraculous healing of a sick lady (not the revival of a corpse, as above); that part of the wood was sent to Constantine, and part left at Jerusalem in a silver casket (cf. μεχρι σήμερον φαινόμενον in Cyril's description above). (Hist. Eccl. i. 7, 8, Patr. Gr. xxi. 475.)

8. Paulinus of Nola, writing about 403, to Sulpicius Severus, and sending him a piece, as he says, of the true cross brought from Jerusalem by Benedicta Melanius, adds an account of its original discovery, because, as he says, it is so difficult to credit. He says that Helena went for the purpose of rescuing the holy places, that she adorned the site of our Lord's birth in addition to the other three sites, and that she discovered the place of the Passion by the concurrent testimony of many inhabitants of the city, both Jewish and Christian. He also adds that, though pieces were frequently taken from the cross, its original bulk was miraculously preserved. (Ep. xxxi. 4, Patr. Gr. lxi. 325.)

9. St. Jerome, in his Commentary on Zech. xiv. 20 (Patr. xxv. 1540), which probably was written A.D. 406, mentions the nail from the cross which was used for the emperor's bridle, according to the story which we find in many other writers, and also in Ep. lviii. (Patr. xxii. 581), speaks of the image of Jove which stood until the time of Constantine on the site of the Resurrection, and that of Venus on the site of the Passion.

10. St. Cyril of Alexandria (about 420), mentions as a report (φασί) that the wood of the cross had been found at different times (κατα καιρούς) with the nails still fixed in it (Comm. on Zech. xiv. 20, Patr. Gr. lxxii. 271).

11. Socrates (about 430) informs us that Helena was told in a night vision to go to Jerusalem; that she found the site of the Passion with difficulty, though he alludes to no supernatural aid; that Macarius suggested the means of distinguishing the true cross, viz. by applying it to a woman on the point of death; that the empress erected "new Jerusalem" on the site (a phrase evidently taken from Eusebius); and that one of the nails was put by the emperor on his statue at Constantinople, a fact witnessed to by many inhabitants (Hist. Eccles. i. 17, Patr. Gr. lxvii. 118).

12. Sozomen, about the same date, claims good authority for his account, and states that Constantine, in gratitude for the council of Nicaea, wished to build a church on Golgotha; that Helena about the same time went to Palestine to pray and to look for the sacred sites. He does not, however, mention any divine impulse. The difficulty of discovery was caused, he says, by the Greeks, who had defiled them, in order to put a stop to the growing θρησκεία; the site of the sepulchre was made known, as some say, by a Hebrew living in the East, from documentary evidence, but more probably by signs and dreams from God. He says further that the crosses were found near the same spot (ἐν ἐπαύσει περὶ τὸν αὐτὸν τόπον) as they had been left by the soldiers, and therefore naturally in confused order, and that the tablet had its inscription still remaining. He mentions two miracles: one the healing of a woman with an incurable disease, the other the raising of a corpse, combining the other accounts; adding that the greater part of the cross was still preserved at Jerusalem. (Hist. Eccles. ii. 1, 2, Patr. Gr. lxvii. 929.)

13. Theodoret (about 448) inserts the letter of Constantine to Macarius, and follows the order of Eusebius, representing, however, Helena's journey more definitely than Eusebius does, as consequent upon the finding of the sepulchre by Constantine. Yet immediately afterwards he speaks of her as bringing the spot to light; so that his account seems inconsistent with itself. The crosses, he says, were found near the Lord's tomb—παρὰ τὸ μνήμα τὸ Δεσποτικόν (Hist. Eccles. i. 16, 17, Patr. Gr. lxxii. 955).

14. St. Leo (454), in writing to Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, speaks of the constant witness borne at Jerusalem to the reality of Christ's Passion by the existence of the cross (Ep. cxxxix. 2, Patr. liv. 1106).

15. St. Gregory of Tours (died 595) adds the following details: that the date of the discovery was May 3, 326; that during a great storm which occurred soon after Helena put one of the nails into the sea, which was at once calmed, that two more were used for the emperor's bridle, and the fourth placed on the head of his statue; that the lance, crown of thorns, and pillar of scourging were also preserved, and were effectual in working miracles (Liber Mirac. i. 5, Patr. lxxi. 709); and that the cross was found by the aid of a Jew, afterwards baptized as Quiriacus (Hist. Franc. i. 34, Patr. lxxi. 179).

So much then for our authorities. We observe that no detailed story is found until nearly seventy years after the event, and then not in the East, but in the West. The vagueness of tone in St. Cyril of Alexandria is particularly observable. Small differences of detail have been noticed, and the last author cited adds several particulars not included in the other accounts. There are many features in the story which look like invention or exaggeration, e.g. the fact that in the process of discovering the true cross the other two are almost invariably said to have been first applied in vain, just such a detail as is added in a fable to give it completeness. On the whole, considering what has been already noticed, that our earliest authorities do not represent Helena as the discoverer, and that the story gradually grows as time goes on, it seems most probable that she had no part in the discovery at all, even if it took place, which itself seems exceedingly doubtful. That the site of the Holy Sepulchre was discovered, or supposed to be discovered, in the reign of Constantine, there seems every reason to believe; and considering the temper of the times, it is easy to understand how marvels would grow up around it. One of the objections to the story is the vagueness of the topographical touches. The Bordeaux Pilgrim alone is definite, describing the tomb as a stone's throw from Calvary. Most of the other writers confound the two, the crosses being represented as found in the tomb and yet in confused order just as they fell. It may easily have happened that, after the discovery of the tomb, some devout person may have fancied that he had found a piece of the cross, and persuaded others to believe it too; and when once this had been done, the assigning, as time went on, of the discovery to the royal pilgrim Helena is perfectly natural, and an instance of an exceedingly common tendency. [M. F. A.]

HELENA (3) CRISPI. A Helena, wife of Crispus eldest son of Constantine the Great, has been imagined by some historians on account of the following text of the Theodosian Code, ix. 38, 1:—"Imp. Constantinus A. ad Maximum P[rae]f[ectum] p[raetorio] Propter Crispi atque Helenae partum omnibus indulgemus, praeter veneficos, homicidas, adulteros. acc[eptum] III kal. Nov. Romae Probianus et Juliano coss." (322). Godefroy, in his commentary on this passage, emends "propter Crispi atque Helenae paratum" or "apparatum," that is to say, "preparations for their journey to Rome," the persons being in that case Crispus and his grandmother, not Crispus and his wife. This seems more probable than that there should be an utterly unknown Helena, mentioned in this public manner, especially as nothing is elsewhere recorded of Crispus's children. Banduri assigns to this supposed Helena the coin with the epigraph Helena n[obilissima] f[emina], and Eckhel is inclined to follow him (Doct. Num. Vet. viii. pp. 102, 145). But this is probably an early coin of the mother of Constantine; see the preceding article.

Constantine's daughter Helena was born perhaps about the date of this law (see next article); but even if partus Helenae could mean the "birth of Helena," Crispi partus is inexplicable.

[J. W.]

HELENA (4) JULIANI, daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta. Historians sometimes give Constantine three daughters: Constantina, wife in turn of Hanniballian and Gallus; Constantia, a virgin and a saint; and Helena. But Tillemont has shewn that the second of these is probably a legendary person (Empereurs, vol. iv. p. 624, note 18 to Constantine). Constantina was called Augusta by her father, according to Philostorgius, iii. 22, 28, and so we may probably suppose was Helena (Eckhel, Num. Vet. viii. p. 142). She was thirty-one or thirty-two years old, according to the account of Ducange, when she was married by her brother Constantius (on the advice of his wife Eusebia) to her cousin Julian, in Nov. 355; but it is not easy to discover the authority for this statement of her age, which may merely be a hazardous inference from the Theodosian Code quoted in the preceding article (Fam. Byzantinae, p. 51). If this date however is correct, she must have been born about the year 323, and her husband was about eight years younger than herself. It is not improbable that he cared very little about her, viewing her rather as part of the family compact which he made with her brother. He refers to her several times, but without expressing any feeling of attachment or dislike, whereas he speaks with great regard of Eusebia, his cousin's wife (ad Ath. p. 248 B; cp. Or. iii. Laudes Eusebiae, p. 123 D, esp. the phrase, ὅπως δὲ ἐμοὶ μετὰ τοῦ βασιλέως τὸν γάμον ἤρμωσεν [Eusebia], as if the marriage was merely a matter of policy).

Julian and Helena had one child born in Gaul, but it died directly after birth, through the unskilfulness or malice of the midwife. Ammianus, who reports this fact, tells us further that Helena was afterwards taken by Eusebia with her to Rome, under the pretext of affection, and there given poison by her sister-in-law to cause her miscarriage. (Amm. xvi. 10, 18; cp. Cedrenus, vol. i. p. 529, ed. Bonn, who says of Eusebia, τῇ τῆς μητρομανίας περίεργον ἔδει.) The motive of this cruel act is supposed to have been jealousy, as Eusebia herself was barren; but it is not necessary to believe the story, which is just the kind of scandal that is capable neither of proof nor disproof. Ammianus, it may be remarked, says nothing of it in his laudatory character of Eusebia in recording her death (xxi. 6, 4).

The date of Helena's journey to Rome may have been 356, when we know that Eusebia visited Rome, whilst her husband was engaged with the barbarians from beyond the Rhine (Jul. Orat. iii. p. 129 B, C; cp. Amm. xvi. 12, 15, 16; Clinton, F. R. i. p. 437). Or it may have been in the following year, 357, when Constantius and his wife spent the month of May in the city, and this is what we should gather from Ammianus as most probable (Amm. xvi. 10, 13, 18; cp. Clinton, F. R. i. p. 434).

Helena was still alive when Julian was proclaimed Augustus by the troops at Paris in the spring of 360 (Jul. ad Ath. p. 248 B). She died in the autumn of the same year, just about the time when her husband was celebrating his quinquennalia, the fifth anniversary of his appointment as Caesar and their marriage. Julian sent her body to Rome to be buried beside her sister's—"in suburbano viae Nomentanae condenda, ubi uxor quoque Galli quondam, soror eius, sepulta est Constantina" (Amm. xxi. 1, 5).

We know nothing whatever of her character, which is remarkable considering her connexion with Julian, of whom we know so much.

Some antiquaries suppose that this Helena appears as Augusta on coins, but this cannot be considered as by any means proved, and was denied by the late Count J. F. W. de Salis, whose authority is entitled to great weight (cp. Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. viii. pp. 142-145).

More difficult is the question of the coins with the epigraph Isis Faria. It is discussed in the article on Julian, in the section on the coins. Whether they refer to her or not, it is probable that they were struck after her death.

[J. W.]

HELENA (5), virgin of Auxerre, commemorated May 22. She is named in the acts of St. Amator as having been present at his death, witnessing the miracles which attended the event. St. Amator died in 418; how long afterwards Helena may have survived is uncertain. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 152.) [R. T. S.]

HELENA (6), virgin of Troyes, commemorated May 4. The inhabitants of Troyes in the 13th century believed that they possessed the undecayed remains of Helena a Corinthian martyr, which had been brought from Greece by a warrior who had taken part in the fourth crusade. Some held that she was Helena, the mother of Constantine. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. i. 530.) [R. T. S.]

HELENIANI, followers of Simon Magna [HELENA (1).]

HELENUS (1) (ELENUS), bishop of Alexandria (Soudaret, Iskenderun) in Cilicia, mentioned in the Menologium Graecorum Dec. 24, (Canisius, Thesaur. Monum. iii. 498), as having baptized the martyr Eugenia in the reign of Commodus. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 903.)

[J. de S.]

HELENUS (2), bishop of Heliopolis in Egypt. He is mentioned in the Martyrologies (cf. Lipomani de Vitis SS. ed. Surius, December 25) as the companion of St. Eugenia. But so many inconsistencies appear in the narrative that Le Quien seems fully justified in regarding it as almost wholly mythical. (Or. Christ. ii. 563.)

[J. de S.]

HELENUS (3), bishop of Tarsus and metropolitan. He was involved in the controversy as to rebaptism, and we learn from a letter of Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vii. 5) that, during the dispute between Cyprian and Stephen of Rome, A.D. 256, Stephen renounced communion with him and Firmilian, together with the bishops of Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Galatia, because they insisted on rebaptizing those who had been baptized by heretics. He attended the two synods held at Antioch on the heretical views of Paul of Samosata, A.D. 265 and 272. Before the opening of the former synod, Helenus, with the other leading bishops, wrote to request the venerable Dionysius of Alexandria to give them the benefit of his theological learning and practical wisdom. The advanced age of Dionysius prevented him from complying with the request, but he wrote a letter giving his judgment on the points in controversy (Euseb. H. E. vi. 46, vii. 27, 28). On the assembling of the second synod in 272, Firmilian of the Cappadocian Caesarea, the former president, being dead, Helenus presided over the meeting, which is expressly termed in the Libellus Synodicus "Synodus Heleni" (Labbe, Concil. i. 893, 901; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 870.)

[E. V.]

HELERIUS—July 16. A reputed martyr in Jersey at the hands of the Vandals. His acts are corrupt and legendary. (Acta SS. Boll. Jul. iv. 145-152.)

[G. T. S.]

HELL, martyr with Zoticus and Lucianus in Scythia, in the reign of Licinius; commemorated on Sept. 13. (Basil. Menol. i. 35.)

[C. H.]

HELIADES, bishop of Zeugma on the Euphrates, in the province of Commagene, one of the Easterns who accompanied John of Antioch to the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, where he signed the letters and decrees of the rival council of John, and was consequently cut off from the communion of the orthodox (Mansi, iv. 1270, 1426, v. 776). It appears that Heliades did not persist in his obstinacy, as his name is not found in the list of fourteen bishops who were ultimately ejected from their sees. (Mansi, v. 965; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 942.)

HELLANUS (1) (ELIANUS), one of the forty martyrs of Sebaste. His relics were said to have been transferred to Beneventum in 763. (Borgia, Mem. Istor. della Pontif. Cit. di Benevento, i. 199.)

[FORTY MARTYRS.] [C. H.]

HELIANUS (2), a bishop in Palestine, one of those to whom the letter of Theophilus patriarch of Alexandria, in condemnation of Origen in the year 400, was addressed. (Jerome, ep. 92, ed. Vall.)

[W. H. F.]

HELIAS (ELIAS), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, deposed by the emperor Anastasius I. before 512. On the accession of Justin I., Hormisdas bishop of Rome pleaded with him for the restoration of Elias to his see, which had long being occupied by Soterichus. At the same time he wrote to the empress Euphemia, to Justinian, whose influence with his uncle was already paramount, to Germanus, a Vir Illustrius, to his own legates Germanus bishop of Capua and Blandus a presbyter, to solicit their intercession in his behalf, and to Helias, and two of his fellow sufferers, to inform them of what he had done (Hormisd. Pap. Epp. 57-60; in Pat. Lat. lxiii. 486; Mansi, viii. 471; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. pp. 68, 69). He only succeeded, however, in obtaining a promise that on the death of Soterichus Helias should be his successor. Soterichus was still bishop A.D. 536 (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 377), and it may be inferred that Helias died before him. The letters of Hormisdas are not dated, but as the reply of Justinian was written on June 7 in the consulship of Vitalian, i.e. A.D. 520 (Chron. Pasch. Ol. cccxxv.) they must have been sent from Rome A.D. 519 (Baronius, ann. 519, cxxxiv.)

[T. W. D.]

HELIO, ST., one of the children assigned to king Brychan of Brecknock. He is said to have settled on the Cornish coast, giving his name to the parish of Eglos-hayle (William of Worc. Itin. 130). Cornwall, Devon, and the opposite coast of Wales seem to have been under the same rulers of the old Celtic race even after Ceawlin's victories had severed the connexion by land, which led the way to the occupation of Bristol, perhaps in the time of Ethelbald of Mercia (Rees, Welsh Saints, 160; Kerslake, St. Ewen, Bristol, and the Welsh Border, 1874; Freeman on King Ine, pp. 47, 53).

[C. W. B.]

HELICON, a sophist or professor of rhetoric at Constantinople, who composed in ten books an Abstract of Chronology and History from Adam to the reign of Theodosius the Great, taking it down to 395 (Suidas, s. v.). Simlerus and Vossius state that the work still exists in manuscript in Italy. (Simlerus, Bibliotheca, p. 270; Vossius, de Historicis Graecis, ii. 19, p. 256; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. v. 90; vii. 446; viii. 82; xi. 633; Ceillier, vi. 290.)

[W. M. S.]

HELICONIA (Bas. Men.), HELICONIS (Rom. Mart.)—May 28. A native of Thessalonica martyred at Corinth, under the proconsul Perennius, during the reign of Gordian and Philip, A.D. 243. Her acts are preserved in Greek and Latin with a pretended edict of Gordian for a general persecution. (Dodwell, Dissert. Cyprian xi.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vi. 736-744.)

[G. T. S.]

HELIG FOEL, Welsh saint, without any known church dedication, descended from Caradog Fraichfras. He owned a low-lying tract of land on the coast of Carnarvonshire, which became submerged in the 7th century, and now forms the Lafan Sands in Beaumaris Bay. In the Cambrian Quarterly Magazine (iii. 39-48) there is a translation of the Hanes of Helig ab Glanwg, with an account of his lands which were lost, his sons who were saints, and his other descendants. (Myo. Arch. ii. 45; Rees, Welsh Saints, 298, 301-2; Williams, Emin. Welshm. 213.) [J. G.]

HELIGWYDD (HELIGUID), clerical witness to a grant of Ithael ab Morgan king of Glamorgan, late in the 6th or early in the 7th century. (Lb. Landav. by Rees, 186, 446-8.) [J. G.]

HELMENAS (HELENAS, ELIMENES), presbyter and martyr with the presbyters Parmenius and Chrysotelus, at Cordula; commemorated on Ap. 22. (Mart., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom. Wand., Notker.) [C. H.]

HELINGAUDUS. [HELMGAUDUS.]

HELIO (1) (Ἡλίου), a civil officer of high rank under the emperor Theodosius II. It was by him that Theodosius sent the diadem to his nephew Valentinian, A.D. 424. Helio was then patricius and magister officiorum (Olympiodor. ap. Phot. Biblioth. cod. lxxx. p. 63 B, Migne, Patr. Gr. ciii. 280 c, in the Latin version Helicon; Socr. H. E. vii. 24). Some years afterwards he was sent by Theodosius to conclude a peace with the Persians, one result of which was that the persecution, which the Christians of that country had long suffered, ceased (Socr. H. E. vii. 20; Theophanes, Chron. a. a. 421, Migne, Patr. Gr. cviii. 234). [T. W. D.]

HELIO (2) (Ἡλίου), addressed by Firmus bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who expresses his delight in writing to him, and his desire that he will return the favour (Firm. Epist. 28). [E. V.]

HELIODORUS (1), bishop of Laodicea (Latakiah) in Syria. The only mention of his name is by Dionysius of Alexandria, who relates that he succeeded Thelymidres. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 5; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 791.) [J. de S.]

HELIODORUS (2), bishop of Zabulon in Palestine, present at the first general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 693; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 673.) [J. de S.]

HELIODORUS (3), bishop of Nicopolis, the metropolis of Vetus Epirus, subscribed the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Mansi, iii. 39; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 133.) [L. D.]

HELIODORUS (4), Arian bishop of Sozysa in Libya Prima, on the coast of the Mediterranean. He signed the declarations of the Seleucian council, A.D. 359. He was deposed, together with other semi-Arian bishops, in the following year. (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. ii. 28; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 617.) [J. de S.]

HELIODORUS (5)—April 9. Martyr at the hands of Sapor II. king of the Persians. He was bishop of Bezabde, a town on the banks of the Tigris. In 362 Sapor invaded Mesopotamia and swept away a vast number of exiles, including

Heliodorus, who fell sick after his capture and died. Before his death he consecrated as bishop a priest variously named Desas, Dosas, and Dausas, and delivered to him the portable altar which Eastern bishops when travelling carried with them. (Asseman. Acta Mart. i. 134; Basil. Men. iii. 49, in Migne, Patr. Gr. cxvii.; Sirlet's Menolog. Graec. Ap. 9.) [G. T. S.]

HELIODORUS (6), bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. He introduced into Thessaly the custom of episcopal marriage, and was the author of certain erotic books called Aethiopica (Socrates, H. E. v. 22). Though these works were written in his youth, yet so great was the scandal caused by them that Heliodorus was deprived of his bishopric by the provincial synod (Nicephorus Callist. H. E. xii. 34). He must have lived before the 5th century. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 117; Migne, Patr. Gr. cxlvi. 296.) Photius, who describes the Aethiopica (cod. 75), states that the author was of Phoenician origin, and was said to have become a bishop. Valesius disbelieves in the author being the bishop of Tricca, while Reading identifies the writer with the Heliodorus of Jerome's epistles. (Vales. and Varior. notes on Soc.) [L. D.]

HELIODORUS (7), bishop of Altinum near Aquileia, cir. 400. He had served originally as a soldier (derelicta militia—Jerome, ep. xiv. 6, ed. Vall.), but had left that calling and been ordained before the time when we first hear of him. He formed one of the band of friends who were drawn together at Aquileia, about the year 372, for the study of Scripture and the practice of asceticism, which included St. Jerome, Evagrius afterwards bishop of Antioch, Rufinus, Bonosus, and Chromatius afterwards bishop of Aquileia. The passion for asceticism and the troubles which arose about Jerome made the companions resolve, under the guidance of Evagrius, to go to Syria. They went by land, probably passing Constantinople, and going through Asia Minor to Antioch (Jerome, ep. iii. 3, ed. Vall.). There they stayed some time. Heliodorus went to Jerusalem, where he enjoyed the hospitality of Florentius, who, having devoted himself to the ascetic life, employed his wealth in the entertainment of pilgrims (Jerome, ep. iv. ed. Vall.). He there heard that Rufinus had arrived in Egypt with Melania (Jer. ep. iii. 2). Returning to Antioch he found Jerome, who had been ill, resolved to go into the solitude of the desert of Chalcia. But he determined not to go with him. He was himself a presbyter and had a call for the pastoral life, and he had a sister and a nephew, who were dependent on him (Jerome, ep. lx. 9, ed. Vall.). He therefore determined, with regret, to return to his native place, Aquileia, holding out to his friend some hopes that he might rejoin him one day in the desert (ibid.). Jerome wrote to him on his return to Italy (ep. 14) a letter which afterwards had a great effect in furthering the cause of asceticism, and became so celebrated that a Roman lady, Fabiola, knew it by heart (Jerome, ep. lxxvii. 9, ed. Vall.). It was a remonstrance to Heliodorus on his having gone back from that which alone Jerome believed at that time to be the way of the perfect life, and it reproached him with turning his back upon the higher service of Christ, and bade him think of the account he must render for this at the day of judgment (ep. xiv. 11). At other times Jerome charged himself with having by his sins driven his friend away (ep. vi.). But their friendship was never broken. Heliodorus continued in the pastoral office, and not long afterwards became bishop of Altinum. His nephew Nepotianus, like himself, was brought up for a military career, but was afterwards ordained; and Jerome, writing to him in the year 394 (ep. lii.), bids him take his uncle as a model of a Christian pastor. Heliodorus was present in 381 as a bishop at the council of Aquileia. In after years he was closely allied with Chromatius bishop of Aquileia, and in common with him kept up a communication with their former friend Jerome, then residing at Bethlehem. On the death of Nepotianus in 396, Jerome wrote to Heliodorus a letter of consolation, in which all the affection of the friend is expressed. Heliodorus on his side took a warm interest in Jerome's translation of the Scriptures. He, with Chromatius, frequently wrote to him, exhorting him to complete the work, which was for a long time delayed. They supported amanuenses to assist him; and by the grateful mention of their aid in the prefaces to the books last translated, their names are for ever associated with the great work of the Vulgate. ("Preface to the Books of Solomon and to Tobit," Jerome's Works, vol. ix. 1305, x. 26; Migne's edition of Vallarsi's Jerome). Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 516, 610) reckons his successor in the see of Altinum to have been Ambrosius, A.D. 407. [W. H. F.]

HELIODORUS (8), bishop of Amathus in Cyprus, subscribed the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Soter bishop of Theodosiana. (Mansi, vii. 160; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1064.) [L. D.]

HELIODORUS (9), bishop of Pinara in Lycia. His name was subscribed to the synodal letter of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458, by archdeacon Nicolaus, where Narensis is an evident error for Pinarensis. (Mansi, vii. 580; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 975.) [L. D.]

HELIODORUS (10), bishop of Cufruta in Byzacene, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. p. 58; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 147.) [R. S. G.]

HELIODORUS (11), 12th bishop of Sedunum (Sion), between Agricola and Honorius, represented at the second council of Mâcon in A.D. 585 (Mansi, ix. 958; Gall. Christ. xii. 735). [S. A. B.]

HELIODORUS (12), one of the solitaries of Nazianzus, lauded in a poem by Gregory Nazianzen. (In Opp. ed. Bill. tom. ii. p. 100, carm. 47; in Migne, Poemat. lib. ii. sec. 2, poem i. ver. 203. Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 1466 A.) [E. V.]

HELIODORUS (13), presbyter, a friend of St. Hilary of Poitiers. It appears that Hilary was in the habit of seeking from Heliodorus explanations of those points which he could not understand in Origen's commentaries. (Hieron. ep. 34, al. 141, ad Marcellam, § 5.)

[J. G. C.]

HELIODORUS (14), presbyter, commemorated by Gennadius. He wrote a work against the Manichaeans, entitled, De Natura Rerum Exordium, proving that the universe and all things in it had one only Creator, and refuting the idea of a coeternal power who was the author of evil. (Gennad. de Scriptor. c. 6; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 208.) [E. V.]

HELIODORUS (15), presbyter of Antioch c. 440, who is mentioned by Gennadius as the author of an excellent treatise De Virginitate, well furnished with Scripture proofs. (Gennad. de Scriptor. c. 29; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 430.) [E. V.]

HELIODORUS (16), a monk addressed by Nilus, who cautions him that his temperament being of so warm a nature in respect of the female sex, his only safe course is to avoid all converse with women, never even to behold them without absolute necessity, whether they might be living under monastic rule or otherwise. (Nil. Epp. lib. ii. ep. 46, p. 138, in Patr. Gr. lxxix. 208.) [C. H.]

HELIODORUS (17), martyr with Dosa, perhaps under Constantine Copronymus; commemorated by the Greeks on Aug. 20. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 96.) [C. H.]

HELIODORUS (18), martyr at Antioch in Pisidia with Marcus, Nico, Neo, and others, under Diocletian; commemorated on Sept. 28. (Bas. Men. i. 74.) [C. H.]

HELIOGABALUS. [ELAGABALUS.]

HELIOTROPITAE (Ἡλιотρόπται), according to Joannes Damascenus, a heretical sect who worshipped the plant heliotrope, which they conceived to turn round towards the sun in virtue of a divine power which dwelt in it. Damascenus speaks of the Heliotropitae as having arisen between the reigns of the emperors Marcian and Heraclius (Jo. Damas. de Haeres. cap. iv. § 89, p. 108 in Migne, Patr. Gr. xciv. 738, 758, 762). [T. W. D.]

HELIUS, a deacon, present at the time when Silvanus committed the act of tradition of which he was afterwards convicted. [SILVANUS.] (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 170, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

HELIX (HELICO), a heretic, the evidence for whose existence consists in the fact that Anastasius in the 7th century gives passages which purport to be extracts from a work of Hippolytus against Beron and Helix. In the article HIPPOLYTUS the reasons are given for thinking this tract not to be a work of that father; and if it be a forgery of the time of the Monophysite controversies, Beron and Helix, who are heard of nowhere else, are likely to be imaginary personages. Fabricius got rid of the name Helix altogether, conjecturing, but apparently without sufficient reason, that the true reading was κατὰ Βήρονος καὶ ἡλικιωτῶν αἰρετικῶν. [G. S.]

HELLADIUS (1) (ELLADIUS), 4th bishop of Auxerre, between Valerianus and Amator. He was present at the synod of Valence, 374, lied in 387, and was commemorated on May 8. (Mansi, tom. iii. p. 491; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 300; Q. d. Chr. xii. 261.) [R. T. S.]

HELLADIUS (2), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who succeeded Basil the Great in that see A.D. 379. We appear to know nothing of Helladius's history before he attained the episcopate, beyond the fact of his marriage; and our only authorities for his conduct in the fulfilment of his office are the two Gregories, who can hardly be considered unprejudiced witnesses. His relations with both of them were on more than one occasion of an unfriendly nature, and he can hardly be acquitted of having treated Gregory Nyssen with great rudeness (Greg. Nyss. ad Flavian. vol. iii. p. 645). [GREGORY NYSSEN.] The step he took in removing Sacerdos from his office as governor of the hospital founded by Basil at Caesarea gave umbrage to Basil's friends, and especially to Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote several letters on the subject to Helladius, in which he uses some very hard language (Greg. Naz. Epist. 216, 217). He also gave Gregory Nazianzen great offence by the opposition he shewed to his resignation of his office as bishop of Nazianzus, and the consecration of his successor Eulalius (ibid. 225). Gregory Nazianzen, however, on more than one occasion, had recourse to his good offices in behalf of his relatives, Nicobulus, and his son Nicobulus the younger (ibid. 218). Helladius got considerable discredit by ordaining (Soz. viii. 6) Gerontius bishop of Nicomedia, in return, it was said, for his good offices in obtaining by his court influence a high military office for his son. [GERONTIUS (7).] He attended the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and was declared by the emperor, together with Otreius of Melitene and Gregory Nyssen, a centre of Catholic communion for Pontus and Bithynia (Theod. H. E. v. 8; Soz. H. E. vii. 9; Soc. v. 8; Labbe, Concil. ii. 956; Mansi, iii. 569). He was again at Constantinople in 394, at the synod held at the time of the consecration of Rufinus's church, to decide the rival claims of Agapius and Bagadius to the see of Bostra (Labbe, ii. 1151, Palladius being a manifest error for Helladius). A biography of his great predecessor Basil is erroneously ascribed to Helladius by Joannes Damascenus (de Imagin. lib. i. p. 59). (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 373; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 267; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. iv. p. 298.)

HELLADIUS (3), a Cappadocian bishop addressed by Gregory Nazianzen, perhaps to be distinguished from Helladius of Caesarea, the subject of the preceding article. Gregory wrote him his thanks after Easter, 382, for a paschal present and letter. Gregory wishes Helladius a long life, but for himself a speedy death; Helladius could confer on him no greater boon than were he and his comprovincial bishops to appoint a bishop to Nazianzus. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 172 in Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 282; Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. ix. "Grég. de Naz." note lvi.)

HELLADIUS (4), bishop of Tarsus c. 430. He was a disciple of St. Theodosius of Antioch, and after his death (c. A.D. 412) presided over the monastery he had founded near Rhodus in Cilicia. Having spent sixty years in monastic life, he was raised to the episcopate as successor to Marianus bishop of the metropolitan see of Tarsus (Theod. Vit. Patr. c. 10). His episcopate illustrates the stormy period of the council of Ephesus. He was one of those who protested against commencing the council before the arrival of John of Antioch and the oriental bishops (Baluz. Nov. Concil. Coll. p. 697), and he joined the opposition council, conciliabulum, presided over by John upon his arrival. He supported the counter-remonstrances addressed to the emperors by Nestorius (ibid. 703). His name is also appended to the synodal letter to the clergy and laity of Hierapolis (ibid. 705), and to that to John of Antioch and Theodoret and the other members of the Oriental deputation to Theodosius (ibid. 725). Helladius steadily ignored the deposition of Nestorius, and withheld all recognition of Maximian as his successor. John of Antioch wrote, commending him for what he had done (ibid. 752, c. 48). When the leaders of the rival parties were taking steps for the restoration of peace, Helladius kept aloof, and on the receipt of the six articles drawn up by John at a council held at Antioch, which ultimately opened the way for reconciliation, he united with Alexander of Hierapolis in his rejection of the terms, and spurned all thought of communion with Cyril. He wrote to Alexander that, wearied out by the struggle and sick at heart at the defection of those who had once been his fellow combatants, he longed to retire to a monastery, and that nothing kept him back but his care for his flock (ibid. 770, c. 68). So passed the summer of 432. The year 433 saw the concordat between Cyril and John confirmed, to the indignation of the irreconcilable party. A synod held by Helladius at Tarsus indignantly repudiated the "execrable agreement" made with Cyril, and declared that the condemnation could not be removed from "the Egyptian" until he had "anathematized his own anathematisms." The firmness of Helladius rejoiced Alexander, who wrote back that he intended to hold a synod himself, begging Helladius, whom he regarded as the leader he was resolved to follow, to attend it and sign its decrees (ibid. 713, c. 110; 814, c. 111; 815, c. 114). The next step taken by Helladius in conjunction with Eutherius of Tyana was to draw up a long letter to pope Sixtus, giving their account of the proceedings of the council of Ephesus, and begging him as a new Moses to save the true Israel from the persecution of the Egyptians. This letter was sent round to obtain the signatures of other bishops (ibid. 817 sqq. c. 117). At this period we have a letter from Theodoret, complaining that Helladius refused to answer him, and seemed to regard him as a deserter. Theodoret had accepted Cyril's letter because he found it orthodox, but he would never desert Nestorius (ibid. 813, c. 110). From this point the resolution of Helladius began to break down. The concordat was accepted by an increasing number of the Oriental prelates, and he found himself left more and more alone. John wrote to complain of his obstinacy (ibid. 842, c. 140). Theodosius felt that it was impossible to allow his imperial authority to be any longer set at nought, and threatened to put the civil power in motion against him and the other recusants. Helladius, together with Alexander, Theodoret, and Maximian, were ordered to accept the concordat or resign their sees. All eventually yielded but the stubborn old bishop of Hierapolis. The quaestor Domitian, who was entrusted with the execution of the imperial decree, exhorted Helladius to consult the peace of the church, and resume communion with John and consequently with Cyril (ibid. 829, c. 125). Theodoret also wrote to his old friend, telling him that he and John had found Cyril's letter orthodox, entreating him not by his obstinacy to destroy his flock (ibid. 859, c. 160). The path was much cleared by the death of Maximian, April 12, 434, and the succession of the saintly Proclus (Socr. H. E. vii. 41). The orthodoxy of the new bishop of Constantinople was readily acknowledged by Helladius, who was evidently glad to be helped out of his dilemma by the removal of the first intrusive occupant of Nestorius's see (ibid. 850, c. 148). Having determined on yielding, Helladius wrote to Alexander to explain his conduct. The bishops of Cilicia Secunda had resumed communion with John and Cyril, and he was compelled by the urgency of the bishops and clergy of his own province to follow their example to avoid worse evils (ibid. 862, c. 164). Alexander bitterly reproached Helladius with his weakness (ibid. 863, c. 164). Helladius, however, lost no time in convoking the bishops of his province, whose synodical letters were drawn up and despatched to Theodosius, declaring in the most decided language their complete acceptance of all that was required of them: admission of the decrees of the council of Ephesus, communion with Cyril, the ratification of Nestorius's sentence of deposition, and the anathematization of him and his adherents (ibid. 887, c. 192). Helladius had saved himself from deposition and exile at the expense of consistency. He had now to justify his conduct to Nestorius, whom he had repeatedly promised never to forsake. The task was no easy one; nor can we say that he fulfilled it with any honour to himself. He wrote Nestorius a short letter to the effect that though through men's evil deeds everything from beginning to end had turned out directly contrary to his prayers, his feeling towards him remained unchanged, and that as he knew he was still struggling for true piety, he believed that he would joyfully endure all that was laid upon him, and that he hoped he might be reckoned with him at the last judgment, when his soul, tried by so many and great temptations, would shine forth. He excuses himself for joining Theodoret and those who with him had accepted the concordat, on the ground that the letters produced from Cyril were in perfect harmony with apostolical traditions (ibid. 888, c. 193). At this period Helladius passes off the stage, and we know no more of him. The letters are printed by Chr. Lupus in his Epistolae Ephesinae, No. 68, 111, 114, 144, 154, 193. They are also given by Baluze, Concil. Nov. Collect. in the Tragoedia Irenaei, c. 68, 111, 114, 117, 130, 164, 192, 193. Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. tom. xiv.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. tom. ii. p. 874; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 418.) [E. V.]

of a woman who having devoted herself to a religious life had fallen into gross licentiousness, and with the aid of her paramour had plundered another lady of her property, and carried off her slaves, and had fled to the city of which Helladius was bishop. Firmus desires Helladius to punish her as she deserves, and pronounce excommunication upon her, if not perpetual, at least until she repents and reforms (Firm. Ep. 41, and Muratori's note). [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (6), bishop of Ptolemais (Acre) in Phoenicia, present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431, taking part with the Orientals in opposition to its conclusions. (Mansi, iv. 1269; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 815.) [J. de S.]

HELLADIUS (7), bishop of Adramyttium, present at the council of Ephesus, 431. (Mansi, v. 612; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 701.) [L. D.]

HELLADIUS (8), a Gallic bishop who signed the synodical epistle of Ravennius archbishop of Arles to pope Leo the Great in 451 (Leo. Mag. ep. 99 in Pat. Lat. liv. 966 B), and was addressed among the rest by Leo in reply (id. ep. 101, ib. 985 A). [C. H.]

HELLADIUS (9), bishop of Stectorium, in Phrygia Salutaris. At the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon his name was subscribed in his absence to the definition of faith read before the emperor Marcian by Marianus of Synnada, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 164, where Tectorii should be altered to Stectorii; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 849.) [L. D.]

HELLADIUS (10), bishop of Panemotichus in Pamphylia, present at the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 1147; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1034.) [L. D.]

HELLADIUS (11), bishop and martyr in the east, ἱερομάρτυρ, commemorated on May 28, a zealous and successful preacher among the pagans (Basil. Menol. iii. 116). According to others his day was May 27, and his period perhaps the 6th or 7th century. (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vi. 711 C.) [C. H.]

HELLADIUS (12), ST., archbishop of Toledo, 615-633. He was the son of Helladius, a cousin of the kings Liuva and Leovigild, and held in his youth a high office at court, but his worldly habit disguised the vows and works of a monk. Even before he took the vows, he used when he was travelling on business to stop at the monastery of Agali, near Toledo, and join the monks in gathering sticks for the oven. He is said to have attended the third council of Toledo in A.D. 589 as the king's representative. He became a monk of the monastery of Agali about A.D. 602, abbat in A.D. 605, and was made archbishop in A.D. 615. He died in A.D. 633 on Feb. 18, on which day he is commemorated (Boll. AA. SS. Feb. iii. 79; Ceillier, xi. 699; St. Ildefonsus, de Vir. Illust. c. 7, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 202). [F. D.]

HELLADIUS (13), a member of the household of the prefect of Cappadocia, much esteemed by Basil for his Christian virtues. Basil wrote to him in 372 in behalf of a widow lady named Julitta, begging him to make interest for her with the prefect, with whom he knows Helladius has considerable influence. (Basil. Epist. 107 [287], 109 [422].) [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (14), cousin of Gregory Nazianzen, and brother of Eulalius bishop of Nazianzus, with the latter of whom he embraced an ascetic life. He was dead before A.D. 372. [EULALIUS (10).] [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (15), pagan grammarian, a priest of Jupiter. He was distinguished as a professor at Alexandria until A.D. 389, when the demolition of pagan temples under Theodosius made him retire to Constantinople, and there Socrates the historian, then a very young man, received instructions from him. (Soc. H. E. v. 16.) In 425 Theodosius II., by an edict conferred upon him and other public professors at Constantinople the rank enjoyed by ex-vicarii (Cod. Theod. VI. xxi.) Besides other works Helladius compiled a Greek Lexicon described by Photius as λέξεως παντοίας χρησις κατὰ στοιχείων (cod. 165), and τῶν λέξεων συλλογή (cod. 158, sub fin.), to which work Suidas was indebted, as appears from the mention of Helladius among the authors at the commencement of his Lexicon. See also the Index Scriptorum de quibus Suidas (Migne, Pat. Gr. cxvii. 1269). [T. W. D.]

HELLADIUS (16), a Luciferian, interlocutor with "Orthodoxus" in Jerome's Dialogus contra Luciferianos (Hieron. Opp. tom. ii. p. 171, in Pat. Lat. xxiii. 156 A). [C. H.]

HELLADIUS (17), a layman of rank, occupying a high official position at Caesarea in Cappadocia, addressed by Firmus, who congratulated him on having escaped the dangers of a tempestuous voyage and reached Caesarea in safety, begging him to do what he could to relieve the famine under which the city was labouring, and lessen the burdens caused by the presence of the troops and their frequent transit. In a second letter Firmus thanks him for the proofs of his friendship and promises him his prayers. (Firm. ep. 12, 26.) [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (18) (ELLADIUS), a cleric attached to the Byzantine court, styled by Palladius "Presbyter of the Palace," who suffered in the persecution after Chrysostom's exile, and had to take refuge on a small estate of his in Bithynia (Pallad. c. 20). Chrysostom had great confidence in his discretion and intelligence, and begged Olympias to send some important letters to Hilaris by him (Chrys. Epist. 14, ad fin.). [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (19), one of the friends made by Chrysostom during his stay at Caesarea on his way to Cucusus, to whom he wrote on his arrival, acquainting him with his comfortable condition, and begging him to write to him often. (Chrys. Epist. 172.) [E. V.]

HELLADIUS (20), an anchorite, afterwards bishop, to whom Cassian addressed the first ten books of his Collationes or treatises on the monastic life, about the year A.D. 423. (Jo. Cassian. Collat. praef., in Pat. Lat. xlix. 478, 479 A.) [I. G. S.]

HELLADIUS (21), a presbyter, who with his son Lucianus restored the walls of Assos in

Mysia. Their names are recorded in an inscription on the walls of the city copied by Boeckh (Corp. Inscript. iv. 8838), who fixes the date about the time of Justinian, and by Fellows (Asia Minor, p. 50). To his exertions it may be due that the wall is still perfect on the west side, and that, as Leake observes (Asia Minor, p. 128), the whole gives the most perfect idea of a Greek city which anywhere exists. [G. T. S.]

HELLANICUS (1), bishop of Tripolis in Phoenicia. He was present at the first general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325, and was subsequently driven from his see through Arian influence, according to the statement of Athanasius. (Hist. Arian. ad Monachos, § 5; Patol. Gr. xxv. 700; Mansi, ii. 693; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 823.) [J. de S.]

HELLANICUS (2), bishop of Rhodes, the metropolis of the province of the Cyclades, sat and subscribed amongst the metropolitans at the oecumenical council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, v. 612; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 924.) [L. D.]

HELLEBICHUS or HELLEBICIUS. [HELEBECHUS.]

HELLENIUS, surveyor of customs at Nazianzus, the confidential friend both of Basil and Gregory Nazianzen. He was an Armenian by birth, was married and the father of a family, and, together with his brother, who, like himself, had acquired reputation by his eloquence, was employed in the administration of justice (Greg. Naz. carm. 47, Opp. t. ii. p. 106, ed. Bill., or in Migne, Pat. Gr. xxvii. 1451, Carm. lib. ii. sec. 2, p. 995). We find him in 371 conveying a letter from Gregory to Basil (Basil. Epist. 71 [33]), and in 372 a message from the bishops of Lesser Armenia (ibid. 98 [259]). Having asked Gregory to send him a homily, he received in 372 the above poem instead, in praise of the solitaries of his district. [E. V.]

HELMGAUDUS (ELMGAUDUS, HELINGAUDUS, HELMENGAUDUS), the spelling is very uncertain) was an officer (comes) of Charlemagne sent on an embassy along with the bishop of Amiens to the court of the Greek emperor in 802. (Einhardi Annales sub anno; Monum. Carolina, ed. Jaffé, pp. 309-312, 315.) [T. R. B.]

HELOGARUS, fifth bishop of St. Malo, succeeding St. Armaelus, and followed by Emmorus, was abbat of St. Mevennius (Méén) at the same time, as we learn from a charter of Louis the Pious, dated in 817, which confirms concessions granted to that monastery by Charles the Great (Migne, Pat. Lat. civ. 1042; Gall. Christ. xiv. 997). [S. A. B.]

HELPIDIUS. See also ELPIDIUS.

HELPIDIUS (1), Donatist bishop of the place whose name is variously written Thusdrus, Tusdrus, Tisdrus, Tiedra, Tysdrus, and later, Turdus, and perhaps Dydris, a town of Byzacene, about thirty-two miles equidistant from Leptis Minor and Usula [El Jemme] (Ant. Itin. 59, 1; Hirt. Bell. Afr. 76; Shaw, p. 157), present at the Maximianist council of Cabarsussis, A.D. 394; Aug. En. in Ps. xxxvi. 30; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 258, ed. Oberthür. [H. W. P.]

HELPIDIUS (2), a bishop of Cyprus at the close of the 4th century. To him and the other suffragans of Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, the letter condemning Origen was addressed by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in the year 400. The letter was translated by Jerome. (Ep. 92, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

HELPIDIUS (3), bishop of Aquae, a town of Mauritania Caesariensis, thirty-five miles south-east of Caesarea [Hammam Mrid-ja] (Ant. Itin. 31, 4), present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411 (Labbe, Concilia, ii. 1335; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 432, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

HELPIIS, wife of Boethius. [ELPIIS (2).]

HELVAEUS, HELVACUS (ELUEUS, ELUIUS), bishop of Menevia. [A. I. F. W.] His name is inserted in the second edition of Wilson's English Martyrology, and in the Sarum Brev. at March 1. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 27 Feb. iii. 678) identify him with the Munster bishop Helvaeus, who in Vit. S. Davidis, baptized St. David, and is probably St. Ailbhe. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, iii. 9, 10.) [J. G.]

HELVE, form of AILBHE.

HELVIANDUS. [ELVIANDUS.]

HELVIDIUS, alphabetically, though not chronologically, the first of those westerns who, like Novatian and Pelagius, Jovinian and Vigilantius, put forward opinions on anthropological subjects opposed to the generally received teaching of the church in their day, that have nevertheless been revived in modern times. In the East, where the interest for pure theology has never cooled, any serious discussion of such questions is still all but unknown.

The only contemporary notice preserved of Helvidius is the short tract against him by St. Jerome (Opp. ii. p. 203-30, ed. Vallars), written when they were both at Rome, while pope Damasus was alive, as we learn from the latter. It appeared, according to Vallarsius, A.D. 383. St. Jerome says he had put off answering him for some time: "ne respondendo dignus fieret, qui vinceretur;" and he describes him throughout as "hominem rusticanum, et vix primis quoque imbutum literis" (§ 1); besides being wholly unknown to him: "Ego ipse, qui contra te scribo, quum in eadem urbe consistam, albus, ut aiunt, aterve sis, nescio." St. Jerome speaks of his own work in writing to Pammachius as "librum contra Helvidium de beatæ Mariæ virginitate perpetuâ" (ep. xlviii. § 17), this being what his opponent had denied in the first instance, though the outcome of his opinions had been to rank virginity below matrimony. Helvidius sought countenance for his first point in the writings of Tertullian and Victorinus. St. Jerome shews (§ 17) he had misrepresented the latter; of Tertullian, whose writings may still speak for themselves, he merely says "Ecclesiae hominem non fuisse." But, in any case, he retorts with much force: what avail straggling opinions against primitive truth? "Numquid non possum tibi totam veterum scriptorum seriem commovere: Ignatium, Polycarpum, Irenaeum, Justinum Martyrem, multosque alios apostolicos et eloquentes viros, qui adversus Ebionem, et Theodotum Byzantium, Valentinum, haec eadem sentientes, plena sapientiae volumina conscripserunt. Quae si legisses aliquando, plus sapereas." This argument is just as suitable to our own, as it was to patristic times, never losing anything by repetition. What had Helvidius to oppose to it in this case? Nothing, unless his adversary misrepresents him, but novel interpretations of Scripture by himself. St. Jerome therefore refutes him only so far as to point out, that there is no necessity for understanding any of the passages adduced by him otherwise than the church had understood them hitherto; but that, in any case, the interpretations of them offered by Helvidius are delusive. One specimen must suffice. Πρωτότοκος is a term which is applied to our Lord by St. Matthew and St. Luke conjointly with marked emphasis. And St. Luke further deposes to its being applied to him in a strict legal sense. Helvidius, heedless of this, drew his own inference: "Nititur approbare primogenitum non posse dici, nisi eum qui habeat et fratres: sicut unigenitus ille vocatur qui parentibus solus sit filius" (§ 10). But the fact of the matter was, this word, legally construed, had exclusive reference to two things: first, the act of the mother; and secondly, the sex of the child. The first born of a woman was not a legal first-born, unless it was a male; and the first born in wedlock was not a legal first-born, unless it was the first born of the woman. But these conditions having been fulfilled in any given case, the son was a first-born in the eyes of the law from that time forth, whether any subsequent issue followed or not; and such Jesus was decided to have been when He was presented in the temple: "Omnis unigenitus est primogenitus: non omnis primogenitus est unigenitus," as it has been tersely put. The "sisters" attributed to Him in two Gospels, and the "brethren" in all four, St. Jerome further shews are no proof of any subsequent issue by His virgin-mother, for either they may have been half-brothers and sisters—children of St. Joseph by a former marriage—or else, simply first-cousins, children of the sister of the Virgin, married to Cleophas, who was also called Mary; as in both cases, Hebrew usage would justify the application to them of the closer tie. St. Jerome winds up his argument in these words: "Natum Deum esse de virgine credimus, quia legimus: Mariam nupsisse post partum, non credimus, quia non legimus. Nec hoc ideo dicimus, quo nuptias condemnemus, ipsa quippe virginitas fructus est nuptiarum: sed quod nobis de sanctis viris temere aestimare nihil liceat" (§ 19). In what follows he admits being over rhetorical and declamatory. Still as, even in this, he nowhere charges Helvidius with having been "a disciple of Auxentius," the Arian bishop of Milan; or "an imitator of Symmachus," the champion of idolatry, we may well ask with Vallarsius where Gennadius, who wrote more than a century later, got authority for both statements (de Script. Eccl. c. 33), which Cave repeats in part (Hist. Lit. i. 278). Neither St. Ambrose nor St. Augustine mention him in their treatises on Virginity, where they make common cause with St. Jerome in condemning his views. His followers, indeed, constitute the eighty-fourth of the heresies enumerated by the latter.

HEMELE, HEMELL The eleventh bishop of Lichfield (M. H. B. 623). He became bishop according to the Cottonian MS. of the Lichfield Fasti (Ang. Sac. i. 428) in 752, according to the interpolated notes to Florence of Worcester in 755 (M. H. B. 544). Neither of these is good authority, but neither can be very far from the mark: Hwitta, Hemele's predecessor, attended the council of Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360, 362), and attests a charter of 749 (Kemble, C. D. 99), and Hemele's death is recorded by Simeon of Durham in 765; (M. H. B. 663). The Lichfield annalist gives him an episcopate of fifteen years (Ang. Sac. i. 428). Of any personal action of Hemele, during the extremely disturbed period that closed the reign of Ethelbald and began that of Offa, we have no record. His name is attached to a questionable grant of Eadbert to Worcester, referred by Kemble to 757 (K. C. D. 102). [S.]

HEMELIN, confessor. [HIMELINUS.]

HEMERIUS (Ἡμερίος, HIMERIUS), a civil catholicos (see Dict. Chr. Antiq.). According to Athanasius he was enjoined by the emperor Constantine to have a church erected for the presbyter Ischyra. Athanasius has preserved a letter of Hemerius addressed to the exactor of Marcotis, one of his subordinates, giving instructions relating to the work in question. (Athanas. Apol. contr. Arian. 85, in Pat. Gr. xxv. 402). Wernsdorf mentions him among the Himerii in his life of Himerius the sophist prefixed to his edition of that author's works (p. xxxv.). [T. W. D.]

HEMETHERIUS, one of the twelve sons of the centurion Marcellus, martyred with him in Spain under the praeses Agricolaus, A.D. 298. (Baron. Annal. ann. 298, ix.) [C. H.]

HEMGISLUS, HEMGISEL (HAEMGILS), abbat of Glastonbury. In the ancient list preserved in the Cotton MS. Tiberius B. 5, Haemgils appears as the first English abbat. William of Malmesbury assigns the first place to Beorhtwald, who was afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (693), and places Hemgisel second. As there is no probability that archbishop Berhtwald was ever abbat of Glastonbury, the place remains open for Haemgils. According to William of Malmesbury (Ant. Glast. ap. Gale, p. 308) Hemgisel became abbat in 678 and held office for 25 years; in another place he gives the date 680 to 705 (ib. 328). It may be inferred that he was the chief agent of Ine and Haeddi in the restoration of the abbey, although the record of his acts and the charters which bear his name cannot stand critical investigation. He is the recipient of the grant of Lantocal, made by bishop Haeddi, July 6, 680 (K. C. D. 19; Mon. Angl. i. 47); in 681 a king, Baldred, with the consent of Kentwin, gives him land at Pennard (K. C. D. 20; Mon. Angl. i. 48; Malmes. Antt. Glast. p. 308); in 704 Ine bestowed large immunities on the abbey, which was still under Haemgils (K. C. D. 51; Mon. Angl. i. 25). William of Malmesbury gives an account of a charter of Kentwin dated 678, in which he states that, with the consent of Haeddi and at the petition of the monks, he has made Hemgisel abbat and gives him lands on Quantock, Caric, and Crucan (Antt. Glast. p. 308), but the original charter, which might possibly be the foundation charter of Glastonbury, is apparently not forthcoming. According to the same authority Haemgils died and was buried in the old church of Glastonbury in 705. His tomb seems to have been regarded with special honour, and to have been in the wooden church (K. C. D. 93). The Cotton MS. names as his successors Wealhstod, Coengils, Beorhtwald, Cealdhun, and Muca; the last of whom was present at the council of Clovesho in 803 (K. C. D. 1024); William of Malmesbury gives instead Beorwald, 705-712; Aldberht, 712-719; Atfrith, 719-729; Hemgisel 729; and six obscure abbats between Hemgisel and Muca, to whom he assigns the years 802-824. Of these Walthun (754-786) may represent Cealdhun; Beorwald is known as a contemporary of the early days of Boniface (Mon. Mog. p. 439; and see BEORWALD) 710-716 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 295, 296); and Coengils is the recipient of a letter preserved among those of St. Boniface, but without trustworthy mark of date (Mon. Mogunt. p. 126). Whilst neither of these lists can be regarded as satisfactory, the more ancient one is more in agreement with other data, and was probably manipulated by William of Malmesbury to agree with spurious charters. HENOTICON, THE, or "INSTRUMENT OF UNION," a document owing its existence to Acacius, the patriarch of Constantinople, and probably the production of his pen, put forth by the emperor Zeno, A.D. 482, on his restoration to the throne, after the discomfiture of the usurper Basiliscus, with the view of putting an end to the dissensions caused by what Gibbon designates "the obstinate and sanguinary zeal of the Monophysites." The attempt was well meant, and we may accept that historian's verdict, that it is "in ecclesiastical history that Zeno appears least contemptible." But like every endeavour to cover radical differences by a vague comprehensiveness, it contained in itself the seeds of dissolution, and became eventually the fruitful source of still fiercer enmities between those who had been forced by it into a fictitious agreement. Not only did the "Henoticon" fail in securing the union which was its professed object, and aggravate the divisions it was intended to cure, but it created a schism which divided the churches of the East and West for nearly forty years, lasting down to the reign of Justinian and the popedom of Hormisdas.

The immediate cause of the issuing of the "Henoticon" was the dissension between the rival occupants of the patriarchal see of Alexandria. On the death of Timotheus Salophaciolus in A.D. 482, John Talaia, the oeconomus of the Alexandrian church, was elected by the orthodox party. He at once, according to custom, despatched synodical letters to the chief bishops of Christendom, to notify his election. Those addressed to Simplicius of Rome and Calandion of Antioch were duly received; but the letters intended for Acacius and Zeno were sent under cover to Illus, the "magister officiorum," whom it was rumoured he had made his friend by large bribes from the treasures of the church, requesting him to present the documents to the emperor and patriarch, and use his influence to secure their favourable reception. Unluckily, Illus was at Antioch on important business when the messenger arrived; and before the parcel of papers reached him and the letters could be placed in the hands of those for whom they were intended, Acacius had heard of John's appointment from another quarter. Fired by a neglect which he deemed a studied insult, Acacius resolved to get rid of the man who had so slighted him. It happened that Gennadius, bishop of Hermopolis Minor, a relation of Timotheus Salophaciolus, and "apocrisarius" or legate of the see of Alexandria, was then at Constantinople. He conceived that he too had been slighted by the new patriarch, and gladly united with Acacius in compassing his overthrow. They represented to Zeno that Talaia was unworthy of the patriarchate, both as having replaced the name of Dioscorus on the diptychs, and as having perjured himself by accepting the see of Alexandria, after having, as was asserted, taken an oath that he would not seek for it. Zeno readily gave credence to these charges, and when it was further represented that, if he recognised Peter Mongus, the deposed patriarch, who, by his agents, had been practising on Acacius, peace would be restored, he wrote to Simplicius, stating his grounds for hesitating to sanction the appointment of John, and urging that the restoration of Peter Mongus would put an end to the distractions of the church. Simplicius replied, June A.D. 482, that, though he had been on the point of recognising John as patriarch, he delayed doing so until the grave charges brought by Zeno could be investigated. At the same time he utterly refused to allow the elevation of a convicted heretic, such as Peter Mongus, to the patriarchal see. His return to the true faith might restore him to the communion of the church, but could not render him worthy to be one of its chief rulers (Liberat. Diac. Breviar. cc. 16, 17; Evagr. H. E. iii. 12). This opposition to his wishes roused the indignation of Zeno, who, without delay, issued imperative commands to Pergamius, the new prefect of Egypt, then about to sail for Alexandria, and to Apollonius the governor, to expel John Talaia and seat Peter Mongus in his place. This was the time chosen by Acacius to persuade Zeno to present himself to the world in the novel character of an expounder of the faith of the Catholic church. Peter Mongus had agents at Constantinople, of whom an abbat named Ammon was the leader, actively working for his restoration under colour of seeking the peace of the church. Their strong representations that nothing would be so effectual for this end as the recognition of Mongus, were only too readily credited. The "Henoticon" was drawn up, which since, as will be seen, it did not directly mention the council of Chalcedon, and the hypothetical allusion contained in it was capable of being construed in a depreciatory sense, might be accepted by those who, like Mongus, had hitherto rejected its decrees. Ammon and his companions engaged for Mongus that he would adopt this instrument of union, and on their word he was recognised by Zeno and Acacius as the canonical patriarch and his name inserted in the diptychs.

This "Henoticon" was directed to the bishops and people in Alexandria, Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; but, as Tillemont has remarked (Mém. Eccles. xvi. 327), it was really addressed only to those who had separated themselves from the church, i.e. to the Monophysites or semi-Eutychians. The original document is given by Evagrius (H. E. iii. 14), and in a not very clear Latin translation by Liberatus (Breviar. c. 18; Labbe, Concil. v. 767). It commences by stating that "certain abbats, hermits, and other reverend persons, had presented to the emperor a petition, supplicating him to restore the unity of the churches, and enlarging on the lamentable results of the late divisions, which had caused vast numbers to depart this life destitute of the sacred laver and of Holy Communion, and produced such countless acts of homicide that not the earth only, but the air, reeked with blood." On this account, and knowing also that the strength and shield of the empire rested in the one true faith declared by the holy fathers gathered at Nicaea, and confirmed by those who met at Constantinople, and followed by those who had condemned Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, the emperor declares that "the creed so made and confirmed is the one only symbol of faith, and that he has held, holds, and will hold no other, and will regard all who hold another as aliens, and that in this alone those who desire saving baptism must be baptized." All who hold other views he anathematizes, and recognises the twelve chapters of Cyril as a symbolical book. The document then proceeds to declare the orthodox faith, viz. "that our Lord Jesus Christ is the only begotten Son of God, and Himself God, incarnate, consubstantial with the Father according to His Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to His manhood, that He came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and that He is One Son, not two." That "it was this One and the same Son of God who wrought miracles, and endured the sufferings which he underwent voluntarily in His flesh." Those "who divide or confound the natures, or admit only a phantastical incarnation," are to be rejected, "since the incarnation without sin of the Mother of God did not cause the addition of a Son, for the Trinity remained even when one Person of the Trinity, God the Word, became incarnate." It asserts that this is no new form of faith, and anathematizes all who have ever thought, or do think, "anything to the contrary, either now or at any other time, either at Chalcedon or in any other synod," especially Nestorius and Eutyches and their followers. The document closes with an earnest appeal to all to unite them

Such was the document which was to "combine all the churches in one harmonious confederacy." It was "a work of some skill, of some adroitness, in attempting to reconcile, in eluding, evading difficulties; it is subtle to escape subtleties" (Milman, Hist. of Lat. Christ. bk. iii. ch. i. vol. i. p. 248). The crucial test of the unity or duality of the natures of the Incarnate Word is cleverly avoided; this being treated as an open question, on which a difference of opinion might be lawfully permitted. Gibbon's verdict is by no means an unfair one, that "it accurately represents the Catholic faith of the incarnation without adopting or disclaiming the peculiar terms of the hostile sects" (vol. vi. p. 44, ch. xlvii.). But its fatal error was its feebleness. Zeno and Acacius, the promulgators of the "Henoticon," lacked the vigorous intolerance with which Cyril of Alexandria stamped out opposition, and endeavoured to substitute for real, even though unwilling and enforced, unity of doctrine, a fictitious cohesion of discordant elements. Each was left to hold his own views undisputed, provided that he would not disturb others, and refrained from stigmatizing their opinions as heretical. The Monophysites who subscribed the instrument were to be admitted into the communion of the church, without being required to give up their distinctive doctrines, while their opponents, the so-called Catholic party, were left free to maintain the authority of the decrees of Chalcedon, and the tome of Leo. The peace resulting from such a concordat was naturally more apparent than real, and satisfied no one. The Catholic party, zealous in their advocacy of the council of Chalcedon, had no liking for a document which disparaged its authority, and suggested the possible erroneousness of its decisions. The Monophysites, on the other hand, complained that it did not go far enough, and clamoured for a more definite condemnation of a council which they regarded as heretical. The strength of the malcontents lay on one side with the high Chalcedonian party, chiefly consisting of the monastic orders, who condemned the "Henoticon" as tainted with Eutychianism, and on the other with the Eutychians or Monophysites, who, indignant with Mongus for turning traitor to their cause, separated themselves, and, forming a distinct body without any chief leader, and not holding communion with the patriarch, were designated "the headless sect," "Acephali." A third body of dissidents was formed by the high ecclesiastical party, who were offended at the presumption of the emperor in assuming a right to issue decrees and spiritual matters, "a right," writes Milman (u. s. p. 235), "complacently admitted when ratifying or compulsorily enforcing ecclesiastical decrees, and usually adopted without scruple on other occasions by the party with which the court happened to side." To these three parties a fourth was added, the party of the centre or the moderates, who, without very strong feelings either in the Nestorian or Eutychian direction, were weary of strife, or, as loyal subjects, were disposed to accept without much question the imperial decrees on subjects involved in so much mystery, together with those who were too cowardly to resist the power which held the sword. This party of the centre was in communion with Peter Mongus, who had at once signed the "Henoticon," and given it all the weight of his authority to secure its general reception. Immediately after it had reached Alexandria, he took advantage of a public festival to have the "Henoticon" read in church, and openly commended it to the adoption of the faithful. The "Henoticon" was singularly unfortunate in its chief patron. Mongus was a thoroughly bad man. Violence and falsehood characterized all his conduct. As soon as he felt himself safe in his seat, his overbearing temper knew no bounds. He at once removed from the diptychs the names of Proterius and Timotheus Salophaciolus, disinterring the remains of the latter, and casting them out of the church, and inserted those of Dioscorus and Timotheus Aelurus, and anathematized the council of Chalcedon and the tome of Leo. When called to account by Acacius, he coolly denied the anathemas, and professed his acceptance of the faith as declared at Chalcedon. He wrote to the same effect to Simplicius, expressing a desire to be received into communion by him. (Evagr. H. E. iii. 17; Liberat. Breviar. c. 18.) Such disgraceful double-dealing estranged a considerable number of his own party, and the discussions of which the unhappy "instrument of union" was the parent were still further aggravated by the cruel persecution of the orthodox, carried on not in Alexandria alone, but through the whole of Egypt by the new patriarch. In bold defiance of the prohibitions of the emperor, conveyed by officials despatched on purpose, all, whether clerics, monks, or laymen, who refused to accept the "Henoticon," were subjected to expulsion and serious maltreatment (Evagr. H. E. iii. 22). At this crisis Simplicius died, A.D. 483. The first act of his successor, Felix II., was an indignant rejection of the "Henoticon," as an insult to the council of Chalcedon, and an audacious act of the emperor Zeno, who dared to dictate articles of faith, and as a seed-plot of impiety. (Theod. Lect. ap. Milman, u. s. p. 236.) He also anathematized all the bishops who had subscribed this edict. This anathema included nearly all the bishops of the East, for though the "Henoticon" was originally addressed to the church of Egypt alone, it was imposed by Zeno and by his successor Anastasius, on all, under penalty of deposition and exile. A strong admonitory letter was addressed by Felix to Acacius, and another in milder terms to Zeno, the authors of the "Henoticon." All remonstrance proving vain, Felix fulminated an anathema against Acacius, deposing and excommunicating him, July 28, A.D. 484. (Liberat. c. 18; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1072.) This anathema severed the whole of the Eastern church from the West for nearly forty years. [ACACIUS.] Neither emperor nor patriarch took much heed of the condemnation of the Roman see, and continued to press the "Henoticon" everywhere, ejecting the bishops who withheld their signatures, and refused to communicate with Peter Mongus. (Theoph. p. 114; Liberat. c. 19; Vict. Tunn. Chron.; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. xvi. p. 168; Acee, Art. xcv.) Calandion, the patriarch of Antioch, was deposed, and Peter the Fuller reinstated. Thus the three chief sees of the East were in constrained communion, and nearly the whole of the suffragan bishops had been either silenced or deposed. Zeno and Acacius had "made a solitude and called it peace." It would be tedious to narrate in detail the subsequent issues of this unhappy attempt to force discordant elements into external union, continued under Acacius's successors in the see of Constantinople, and the emperor Anastasius. Anastasius, in his earnest desire for peace, required toleration of the bishops of the empire, who were forbidden to force the decrees of Chalcedon on a reluctant diocese, or to compel one which had accepted that council to abandon it. No change was to be introduced in either direction, and those who violated this law of toleration were deposed with impartial severity. (Evagr. H. E. iii. 30.)

Euphemius was deposed from Constantinople A.D. 495. Macedonius, his successor, began by subscribing the "Henoticon," but overawed by the obstinate orthodoxy of the "Acoemetæ" and the other monastic bodies of Constantinople, whom he had undertaken to reconcile to that instrument, he became an ardent partisan of the council of Chalcedon, and, after having headed the religious tumults in the city, which at one time threatened Anastasius's throne, was in his turn deposed, and was succeeded by Timotheus, A.D. 511. The new patriarch not only signed the "Henoticon," but pronounced an anathema on the council of Chalcedon. Flavianus, accused of being a concealed Nestorian, was ejected from Antioch in A.D. 512, where the Monophysite Severus, who had raised religious riots in the streets of Alexandria and Constantinople, reigned supreme. Elias of Jerusalem, in spite of his large concessions to the Catholic party, refusing to go all lengths with them, was deposed the next year. "Throughout Asiatic Christendom it was the same wild struggle. Bishops deposed quietly, or, where resistance was made, the two factions fighting in the streets, in the churches. Cities, even the holiest places, ran with blood." (Milman, u. s. p. 245.)

The "Henoticon," having proved so fruitful a source of dissension in the East, was destined to become the watchword of rival parties in the West. Gelasius, the successor of Anastasius II., had sought to re-unite the churches by the proposal, couched in the very spirit of the "Henoticon," that Acacius's name, which Gelasius had proposed to expunge, should be quietly left on the diptychs, and that no more should be said on the subject—a crime against rigid orthodoxy for which Dante consigns him to eternal torments.* On his death, in A.D. 498, a contested election ensued, which was exasperated by differences of opinion on the "Henoticon" and the schisms in the East. Two rival pontiffs were consecrated on the same day, Dec. 22, A.D. 499, Laurentius and Symmachus. The former was the advocate of union, the latter its uncompromising opponent. Theodoric, to whom the claims of the rival pontiffs were submitted, decided in favour of Symmachus, who had received the largest number of votes. This choice was fatal to the restoration of peace in the East on the terms of the "Henoticon." The pope and the emperor hurled at one another charges of heresy and messages of defiance. The turbulent orthodox party at Constantinople was supported in its obstinate resistance to the emperor by the Roman see. The rebellion of Vitalian, characterized by Gibbon as "the first of the religious wars," whose battle-cry was the council of Chalcedon, was not obscurely countenanced by Symmachus's still more haughty successor, Hormisdas, who reaped the fruits of the humiliation of the aged Anastasius, and became "the dictator of the religion of the world." The first demand of Hormisdas of the public anathematization of the authors and maintainers of the "Henoticon" was indignantly rejected by Anastasius. But far from retracting, the pontiff rose in his demands. Anastasius, however, to his honour, though enfeebled by age and calamity, stood firm. He refused to anathematize the memory of Acacius, whose only crime had been that of carrying out measures of toleration with a view to union, and he broke off all communication with Hormisdas. The conflict only ended with the life of Anastasius, who died worn out by strife at the age of nearly ninety years, A.D. 518. His successor, Justin, was an unlettered soldier of unbending orthodoxy. The new patriarch, John of Cappadocia, "a man of servile mind though unmeasured ambition," was prepared to adopt any course which would secure his power. He had seconded all the measures of Anastasius, but at the demand of the mob he now hastily assembled a synod of forty bishops, by which anathemas were passed on all upholders of the "Henoticon," the banished bishops were recalled, and the so-called usurpers deposed. All heretics, i. e. those who refused the council of Chalcedon, were made incapable of civil or military office. Hormisdas profited by the favourable opportunity to press his demands, which were admitted without question. The names of the patriarchs Acacius, Fravitta, Euphemius, and Macedonius, together with those of the emperor Zeno and Anastasius, were erased from the diptychs, and Acacius was branded with a special anathema. The acknowledged orthodoxy of the two last-named patriarchs, though earnestly pleaded by John, their successor, could not outweigh the damning crime of their having dared to recognise Acacius as a legitimate bishop. Fresh disturbances were created by this rigour, especially when it was found that Hormisdas demanded the condemnation of all who had communicated with Acacius, and turned a deaf ear to the repeated applications both of the emperor and the patriarch for some relaxation of these terms. (Evagr. H. E. iv. 4; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1542; Natal. Alexand. Hist. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 448.) Hormisdas at last consented that Epiphanius, John's successor, should act for him in receiving churches into communion. Some honoured names were allowed to remain on the diptychs, and eventually Euphemius and Macedonius, with Flavian of Antioch, and Elias of Jerusalem, and some others who had died during the separation, were admitted to the Roman Calendars (Tillem. Mém. Eccl. tom. xvi. p. 697; Bolland. 25 Apr. p. 373).

Thus ended the unhappy schism which had separated the East and West for nearly forty years. The "Henoticon," the parent of all these divisions, without being formally repealed, was allowed to sink into oblivion. The four oecumenical councils, including that of Chalcedon, were everywhere received, save in Egypt, and one common creed expressed the religious faith of the Christian world.

He was deposed by the Acacian council of Constantinople 360, as having been ordained metropolitan without the consent of the bishops of the province (Sozomen, iv. 24). He was present, however, and active in the council of Lampsacus, A.D. 364 or 365 (Mansi, iii. 213, 377), where he united with a number of other Macedonian bishops in sending a legate to Liberius bishop of Rome with a libellus formally declaring their submission (Socrates, iv. 12), and Liberius wrote them a congratulatory letter in reply. The "letter" is not dated, but Liberius died in the September of A.D. 366. (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. Rom. p. 17.) (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 861; Ceillier, iv. 578.) He is sometimes called EORTASIUS.

HERACLAS, patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 233–249. He was the brother of the martyr Plutarch, one of Origen's converts (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 3), and from being a pupil he became an assistant in teaching to Origen, who left the school to him when he retired from Alexandria to Caesarea (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 15, 26). Heraclas retained the school but a short time, for on the death of Demetrius, he was elected to the archiepiscopal throne. Though a disciple of Origen Heraclas did not adopt any of his peculiar views, but voted for his deprivation both from his office as teacher and from his orders, and for his excommunication at the two synods held by Demetrius, nor when elected bishop did he make any attempt to rescind these sentences. Heraclas seems to have been a man of ability, from the fact that he was Origen's successor in the catechetical school. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 31) narrates a visit paid Heraclius by Africanus the annalist on the report of his great learning, as also (H. E. vii. 7) on the authority of his successor Dionysius the rule which he followed respecting the treatment of heretics. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 392; Photius, Cod. 118; Acta SS. Boll. Jul. iii. 645–7. He was commemorated on Dec. 4 (Cal. Aethiop.). [I. D.]

HERACLEIDAS. [HERACLIDAS.]

HERACLEON (1), a Gnostic described by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 9, p. 595) as the most esteemed (δοκιμώτατος) of the school of Valentinus; and, according to Origen (Comm. in S. Joann. t. 2, § 8, Opp. tom. iv. p. 66), said to have been in personal contact (γνώριμος) with Valentinus himself. He is barely mentioned by Irenaeus (ii. 41) and by Tertullian (Adv. Valent. 4). The common source of Philaster and Pseudo-Tertullian (i. e. probably the earlier treatise of Hippolytus) contained an article on Heraclion between those on Ptolemaeus and Secundus, and on Marcus and Colarbasus. Lipsius has conjectured that the sketch of Valentinianism, given in the later treatise of Hippolytus (book 6), is derived from a work of Heraclion, the reason for his guess being that Hippolytus, in the preface to this section, promises to give an account, amongst others, of the doctrines of Heraclion, and that this promise remains unfulfilled, unless we assume that the general account of the teaching of Valentinus really represents that of Heraclion. But a closer examination of the method of Hippolytus shews that this argument has no force. Hippolytus in his preface follows the order of the earlier treatise, and proposes to treat of the doctrines of Valentinus, of those of Secundus, Ptolemaeus and Heraclion, of those of Marcus and Colarbasus. The theory of Lipsius requires Hippolytus to treat separately of each of these heretics, yet it makes him depart from this programme at first starting; for if the section on Valentinus be taken as the fulfilment of the promise to detail the opinions of Heraclion, what becomes of the promise to detail the opinions of Valentinus? It is in any case plain that Hippolytus does not treat separately of Colarbasus. Actually this part of the work divides itself, in conformity with its preface, into three sections. In the first, which is the only original section, he gives a general account of Valentinianism, and tries to shew that it is derived from the heathen philosophy of Pythagoras. Hippolytus (vi. 42, p. 203) appears to claim to have a direct knowledge of the writings of Valentinus; but if we allow that he may have here taken for his guide a treatise, not by Valentinus himself, but by one of his followers, we have no special reason to think of Heracleon. Hippolytus then copies with abridgment what Irenaeus had said about Secundus, Ptolemaeus, and certain unnamed members of the school; and then what Irenaeus had said about Marcus. There is every reason to think that Hippolytus identified with Heracleon one of the unnamed heretics of the second section, having possibly been taught to do so by Irenaeus in his privé voce lectures at Rome. For Irenaeus in the passage in question names it as a point which divided the Valentinians, that some of them commenced their aeonology with a dyad, consisting of a male and female principle, others with a monad, or single principle without consort. Now, Philaster and Pseudo-Tertullian agree in specifying it as the distinctive feature of the teaching of Heracleon, that he commenced with a single principle; though their accounts differ in this, that the former would lead us to think that the original principle, together with its first emanation, formed the first pair of aeons; whereas the latter, and probably more correctly, would make the original principle give being to a pair, and would not include itself in the system of pairs of aeons. Hippolytus (vi. 35, p. 195) mentions another subject of dispute which divided the Valentinians into sects; one school, the Italian, asserting our Lord's body to have been animal (ψυχικόν); the other, or Eastern school, maintaining it to have been spiritual. Heracleon and Ptolemaeus are mentioned by Hippolytus as belonging to the first school, Axionicus and Ardesianes [BARDESANES] to the second. Lipsius has analysed the section in Epiphanius on Heracleon (Haer. 36), and shewn that it possesses no independent authority. It is almost all made up by putting together notices in Irenaeus of different unnamed Valentinians. On the whole, it seems to us that the best way of reconciling the celebrity of Heracleon with the small space given to him by writers against Valentinianism is to suppose that he was not the author of any formal exposition of Valentinian doctrine, but only of exegetical works in which the principles of Valentinus were assumed. At all events it is only of such works of his that we have any express knowledge.

In fact, the chief interest that now attaches to Heracleon is that he is the earliest commentator on the New Testament of whom we have knowledge. Origen, in the still extant portion of his commentary on St. John, quotes Heracleon nearly fifty times, usually controverting, occasionally accepting his expositions. We thus recover large sections of Heracleon's commentary on the 1st, 2nd, 4th, and 8th of John. We have no doubt lost many extracts, owing to the mutilated condition in which Origen's commentary on St. John has come down to us; and the phrase used by Origen, ἐν οἷς καταλέλοιπεν ὑπομνήμασι, suggests that Heracleon's commentary may have reached Origen himself in a like condition of mutilation. Photius (134, Ep. ad Aspath. p. 178; Amphiloch. 246), speaking on the text John i. 17 repels the idea that the words, "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," were spoken in disparagement of the law which "was given by Moses," remarking, "Heracleon might say this, and the disciples of Heracleon." He probably refers to an extract from Heracleon contained in one of the lost sections of Origen's work; for Origen is the only father who quotes Heracleon's commentary, which is not likely to have survived to the time of Photius. There is reason to think that Heracleon wrote commentaries on St. Luke as well as on St. John. He is twice quoted by Clement of Alexandria in one of the places (Strom. iv. 9) Clement expressly says that his citation is from Heracleon's exposition of Luke xii. 8; in the other (25 Ecl. ex Script. Proph. p. 995), Clement's quotation is in connexion with the verses Luke iii. 16, 17, so that it seems probable that it is from an exposition by Heracleon of these verses. The fragments of Heracleon were collected by Grabe (Spicileg. ii. 85, &c.), and reprinted as an appendix to Massuet's, Stieren's, and Migne's editions of Irenaeus. Three short notices may be mentioned in addition; De la Rue, iv. 117, 140, 226; the second recording that Heracleon in John i. 28 read Bethany, not Bethabara; the third referring to the use made by Heracleon of the "preaching of Peter."

The first of the passages quoted by Clement bears on an accusation brought against more than one of the Gnostic sects, that they taught that it was no sin to avoid martyrdom by denying the faith. No exception can be taken to what Heracleon says on this subject. Possibly his judgment might have been different from that of the orthodox as to the occasions when "reason would require" public confession before the magistrates; but his words do not go beyond a perhaps necessary protest against the exaggerated veneration given at the time to such confession. He says, "Men mistake in thinking that the only confession is that made with the voice before the magistrates; there is another confession made in the life and conversation, by faith and works corresponding to the faith. The first confession may be made by a hypocrite: and it is one not required of all; there are many who have never been called on to make it, as for instance Matthew, Philip, Thomas, Levi [Lebbaeus]; the other confession must be made by all. He who has first confessed in his disposition of heart will confess with the voice also when need shall arise and reason require. Well did Christ use concerning confession the phrase 'in me' (ἐὰν ὁμολογήσῃ ἐν ἐμοί), concerning denial the phrase 'me.' A man may confess 'Him' with the voice who really denies Him, if he does not confess Him also in action; but those only confess 'in Him' who live in the confession and in corresponding actions. Nay, it is he whom they embrace and who dwells in them who makes confession 'in them'; for 'He cannot deny Himself.' But concerning denial, He did not say whosoever shall deny 'in me,' but whosoever shall deny 'me'; for no one that is 'in Him' can deny Him. And the words 'before men' do not mean before unbelievers only, but before Christians and unbelievers alike; before the one by their life and conversation, before the others in words."

The reader must be struck with the manner in which this exposition assumes the significance of every word in the sacred text commented on; and this characteristic runs equally through the fragments of Heracleon's commentary on St. John, prevailing alike whether the words commented on be our Lord's own or only those of the Evangelist. Thus he calls attention to the facts that in the opening statement of the gospel "all things were made by him," the preposition used is διὰ, that Jesus is said to have gone down to Capernaum and gone up to Jerusalem; that he found the buyers and sellers ἐν τῇ λέπῃ, not ἐν τῇ ραῖ; that he said salvation is of the Jews not in them, and again (iv. 40) that our Lord tarried with the Samaritans, not in them; notice is taken of the point in our Lord's discourse with the woman of Samaria, where he first emphasizes his assertion with "Woman believe me"; and though Origen occasionally accuses Heracleon of deficient accuracy, for instance in taking the prophet (i. 21) as meaning no more than a prophet, "in three days" (ii. 19) as meaning no more than "on the third day," yet on the whole the minuteness of Heracleon's examination of the words on which he comments, could not be exceeded by the strongest believer in verbal inspiration at the present day. He attempts to reconcile differences between the Evangelists, as for instance our Lord's ascription to the Baptist of the titles "Elias" and "prophet," with John's own disclaimer of these titles. He finds mysteries in the numbers which occur in the narrative, in the forty and six years which the temple was in building, in the six husbands of the woman of Samaria (for such was his reading*), in the two days which our Lord abode with the people of the city, in the seventh hour at which the nobleman's son healed. He thinks it necessary to reconcile his own doctrine with that of the sacred writer, even at the cost of some violence of interpretation. Thus he declares that the Evangelist's assertion that all things were made by the Logos must be understood only of the things of the visible creation, his own doctrine being that the higher aeon world was not so made, but that the lower creation was made by the Logos through the instrumentality of the Demiurge.^b Instances of this kind where the interpreter is forced to reject the most obvious meaning of the text are sufficiently numerous to shew that the gospel was not written in the interests of Valentinianism; but it is a book which Heracleon evidently recognized as of such authority that he must perforce have it on his side.

When striving to find Valentinianism in the Gospel, the instrument he usually employs is the method of spiritual interpretation. Thus the nobleman (βασιλικός, iv. 47) is the Demiurge, a petty prince, his kingdom being limited and temporary, the servants are his angels, the son is the man who belongs to the Demiurge. As he finds the ψυχικοί represented in the nobleman's son, so again he finds the πνευματικοί in the woman of Samaria. The water of Jacob's well which she rejected is Judaism; the husband whom she is to call is no earthly husband, but her spiritual bridegroom from the Pleroma; the other husbands with whom she previously had committed fornication, represent the matter with which the spiritual have been entangled; that she is no longer to worship either in "this mountain" or in "Jerusalem," means that she is not, like the heathen, to worship the visible creation, the Hyle, or kingdom of the devil, nor like the Jews to worship the creator or Demiurge; her watering-pot is her good disposition for receiving life from the Saviour. It must be observed that, though the results of Heracleon's method are heretical, the method itself is commonly used by orthodox fathers. They do not merely find spiritual interpretations for the details of parables, but they do not find it inconsistent with their full faith in the literal truth of the scripture histories, to trace a spiritual significance in many of the things recorded. Heracleon's doctrine is not orthodox, but his principles of interpretation cannot be said to differ essentially from those of Origen himself. Many orthodox parallels, for instance, could be adduced to Heracleon's exposition, that the cords with which our Lord drove out the traffickers from the temple, represent the power of the Holy Spirit; and the wood to which he assumes they were attached, the wood of the cross; and in the same context, Origen gives explanations of the colt and ass on which our Lord rode into Jerusalem, of the village in which He found them, the branches cut from the trees, the crowds that accompanied Him, and so forth. Origen even occasionally blames Heracleon for being too easily content with more obvious interpretations. Heracleon, for instance, at first is satisfied to take "whose shoe latchet I am not worthy to loose," as meaning no more than "for whom I am not worthy to perform menial offices," and he has Origen's approbation when he tries, however unsuccessfully, to investigate what the shoe represented. Heracleon understands the Jews' question "will he kill himself?" (viii. 22), as most readers do now; Origen observes that the Jews could not rationally have supposed Jesus to mean that he was going to a place worse than that reserved for them; they must have had a traditional knowledge that the Saviour was not to have His life taken from Him, but to yield it of Himself; and they must have supposed Him to mean to claim the power of doing this, and so of ascending to a place which they could not attain. It does not appear to us that Heracleon used his method of interpretation controversially to establish Valentinian doctrine, but rather that being a Valentinian of the second generation, thoroughly imbued with a belief of the truth of the familiar doctrines of that sect, he found those doctrines indicated in the passages on which he commented, precisely in the same way that orthodox commentators have found the doctrines which they believed to be true.

One other of Heracleon's interpretations deserves to be mentioned. The meaning which the Greek words, John viii. 44, most naturally convey, is that of the pre-Hieronymian translation "mendax est sicut et pater ejus," and so they are generally understood by Greek fathers, though in various ways they escape attributing a father to the devil. Origen here makes τὸ ψεύδος the nominative to λαλῇ, and understands

* So Origen expressly says; otherwise we should suppose that Heracleon made out his six by counting the former five husbands and the then present one. In this way St. Jerome, for instance, counts six husbands (Adv. Jovin. l. 14, vol. ii. p. 263).

^b In this Heracleon differs from the Valentinians controverted by Irenaeus, who takes pains to shew (l. 22, ii. 2, 5, iii. 11, 1) that St. John's "all things" include the lower world as well as the higher.

it to mean any lying spirit: Epiphanius (Haer. xi. 6, p. 297; lxvi. 64, p. 677) makes Judas the liar and Cain the father; Cyr. Alex. in loc. refutes the opinion of some of his predecessors, who inferred from the text that the chief and father of the devils had been in our Lord's time already consigned to the abyss, and that it was a subordinate devil who tempted the Jews. His own opinion is that the father of the Jews is Cain, and his father the devil. We learn from a catena that this was also the interpretation of Ammonius. Photius (Quaest. Amphil. 88) considers that the speaker of the lie is the Jew, and his father the devil. Hilgenfeld and Volkmar consider that the Evangelist shews that he embraced the opinion of the Valentinians and some earlier Gnostic sects that the father of the devil was the Demiurge or God of the Jews. But this idea was unknown to Heracleon, who here interprets the father of the devil, as his essentially evil nature; to which Origen objects that if the devil be evil by the necessity of his nature, he ought rather to be pitied than blamed.

To judge from the fragments that remain, Heracleon's bent was rather practical than speculative. He says nothing of the Gnostic theories as to stages in the origin of the universe; the prologue of St. John does not tempt him into mention of the Valentinian Aenology. Indeed it is to be noted that he does not use the word aeon in the sense employed by other Valentinian writers, but rather where according to their use we should expect the word Pleroma;* and this last word he uses in a special sense, describing the spiritual husband of the Samaritan woman as her Pleroma, that is to say the complement, or supply of what was lacking to perfection. We find in his system only two beings unknown to orthodox theology, the Demiurge, and apparently a second Son of Man; for on John iv. 37 he distinguishes a higher Son of Man who sows from the Saviour who reaps.^d Heracleon gives as great prominence as any orthodox writer to Christ and to His redeeming work. But all mankind are not alike in a condition to profit by His redemption. There is a threefold order of creatures; first the Hylie or material, formed of the ὕλη, which is the substance of the devil, incapable of immortality. Secondly, the psychic or animal belonging to the kingdom of the Demiurge; their ψυχή is naturally mortal, but capable of being clothed with immortality, and it depends on their disposition (θέσις) whether they become sons of God, or children of the devil; and, thirdly, the pneumatic or spiritual, who are by nature of the divine essence, though entangled with matter and needing redemption to be delivered from it. These are the special creation of the Logos; they live in Him, and become one with Him. In the second class Heracleon seems to have had the Jews specially in his mind, and to have regarded them with a good deal of tenderness. They are the children of Abraham, who if they do not love God, at least do not hate Him. Their king, the Demiurge, is represented as not hostile to the supreme, and though shortsighted and ignorant, yet as well disposed to faith and ready to implore the Saviour's help for his subjects whom he had not himself been able to deliver. When his ignorance has been removed, he and his redeemed subjects will enjoy immortality in a place raised above the material world.

* Possibly this may have been the earlier use of the word; see the manner in which the phrase "incorruptible Aeon" is used (Irenaeus, i. 30).

^d Heinrich refers to Irenaeus i. xii. 4, but the question there discussed is quite different, viz. whether the title Son of Man has reference to the Aeon Anthropos or to the first Principle, which in the older Gnostic systems was given the title Man.

Besides the passages on which he comments Heracleon refers to Gen. vi.; Isaiah i. 2; Matt. viii. 2; ix. 37; xviii. 11; Rom. i. 25; xii. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 54; 2 Tim. ii. 13. Neander and Cave have suggested Alexandria as the place where Heracleon taught; but Clement's language suggests some distance either of time or of place; for he would scarcely have thought it necessary to explain to his readers that Heracleon was the most in repute of the Valentinians if he were at the time the head of a rival school in the same city. Hippolytus, as has been mentioned, makes Heracleon one of the Italian school of Valentinians; but the silence of all the authorities makes it unlikely that he taught at Rome. It seems, therefore, the most likely conjecture that he taught in one of the cities of the south of Italy; or it is possible that "Praedestinatus" may have happened to be right in laying in Sicily the scene of his inventions about Heracleon.

The story Praedestinatus tells is that the heresy of Heracleon consisted in his teaching that a baptized person cannot be affected by sin, no matter what actions he may commit; that as snow melts when brought into contact with fire, so the quality of sin disappears out of all his actions. He tells that certain Sicilian bishops assembled a synod against him, which drew up a letter to Alexander (bishop of Rome about A.D. 115), begging him to send some one to confute Heracleon; that Alexander accordingly both wrote a book against him and sent a presbyter, Sabinianus, who confuted the heretic so effectually that he took ship by night and fled no one knew whither. Sbaralea, quoted by De Rossi (Roma. Sott. ii. 207), and after him by Lipsius (Chron. der röm. Bisch. p. 253), conjectures that this strange account may have originated in a distortion of the story of the anti-pope HERACLIVS, who "vetuit lapsos peccata dolere," and who possibly may, like his competitor Eusebius, have been banished to Sicily. But it seems to us rather too complimentary to "Praedestinatus" to assume that a story peculiar to him has been built on any substratum of fact.

Considerable interest attaches to the determination of the date of Heracleon on account of his use of St. John's Gospel, which clearly had attained so high an authority when he wrote that it must then have been a work of considerable standing. It seems to us, however, that the mere fact that a book was held in equal honour by the Valentinians and the orthodox proves that it must have attained its position before the separation of the Valentinians from the church; and, therefore, that as far as the controversy concerning the fourth Gospel is concerned, it is of less importance to determine the exact date of Heracleon. To us it seems that the decade 170-180 may probably be fixed for the centre of his activity. This would not be inconsistent with the truth of the report that he had been personally instructed by Valentinus, who continued to teach as late as 160. And it would allow time for Heracleon to have gained celebrity before Clement wrote, one of whose references to Heracleon is in what was probably one of his earliest works. He had evidently long passed from the scene when Origen wrote. Concerning Heracleon may be consulted Neander (Gen. Entwick. 143, and Ch. Hist. ii. 135); Heinrici (Val. Gnosis, 127); Westcott (N. T. Canon, 299).

HERACLEON (2) (TRACLEON), bishop of Tralles (Evanthia), in the plain of the Maeander in the ecclesiastical province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus, 431. (Mansi, v. 588 c, 613; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 696.) [L. D.]

HERACLEONAS, FLAVIUS (also called HERACLIUS by Niceph. Cp. and Suidas), emperor, A.D. 641, son of the emperor Heraclius and his second wife Martina. Many particulars of his short reign are given by Nicephorus patriarch of Constantinople in his Breviarium, and a few circumstances are given by Theophanes. He was born in the province of Lazica in Colchis, which his father was traversing, accompanied by Martina, in his expedition against Persia (Brev. p. 17, ed. Petav. in Patr. Gr. tom. c. p. 899). This was the first expedition of Heraclius into the east, and Petavius fixes 622 as the year, while others give 626. In 631 Heracleonas was created Caesar by his father (Br. 26); about 639 he was crowned (ib. 30), and soon afterwards named consul (ib. 31). On his father's death Heracleonas and his half-brother Constantinus reigned jointly for one hundred and three days (Br. 33), from March 11 to June 22, 641, as Petavius reckons, until the death of Constantinus, after which Heracleonas shared the throne with his mother. One of the first acts of Heracleonas was to dedicate to God in the great church his father's crown, valued at seventy pounds of gold. It had been buried with Heraclius, but was afterwards removed from the church by Constantinus. He also restored Cyrus patriarch of Alexandria to his see. But acts of tyranny against the nobility and the ministers of the crown brought the capital to the verge of civil war, and the troops under command of Valentinus took up a hostile position at Chalcedon. Martina and her son, as well as the patriarch Pyrrhus, were accused of plotting against the life of young Heraclius Constans the orphan son of Constantinus. In vain Heracleonas stood sponsor for the infant at the font and crowned him with the diadem of his great father, and made every ostentatious profession of affection and goodwill before the people. The patriarch was expelled in a riot, Martina and her son were banished, she suffering the loss of her tongue and he of his nose. Valentinus also, who had come to terms with the court, seems to have been implicated in the same charge, as he shared in the sentence of exile. Theophanes states that Heracleonas reigned six months after Constantinus, and Petavius computes the expulsion to have occurred in Dec. 641, though some assign the event to Jan. 642. Heracleonas was succeeded by his nephew Heraclius Constans already mentioned. (Theoph. Chron. A.C. 632, p. 253; Du Cange, Fam. August. 101.) [C. H.]

HERACLIANUS (1), bishop of Pisaurum (Pesaro), c. A.D. 347. He was a disciple of St. Severus archbishop of Ravenna, who appointed him bishop of Pesaro. He was present at the council of Sardica. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 948; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 341.)

[R. S. G.]

HERACLIANUS (2), heretic, addressed in a letter by Gregory Nyssen in defence of the Nicene faith. The letter contains nothing personal to Heraclianus. (Greg. Nyss. ep. 24, in Patr. Gr. xlv. 1087.)

[C. H.]

HERACLIANUS (3), sixth bishop of Sens. [HERACLIANUS.]

HERACLIANUS (4), seventh in the series of the bishops of Toulouse, his predecessors for nearly a century being unknown. He was present at the council of Agde, in A.D. 506, and was succeeded by St. Germerius not many years afterwards (Gall. Christ. xiii. 7; Mansi, viii. 337).

[S. A. B.]

HERACLIANUS (5) (HERACLIUS), count of Africa, succeeding Bathanarius. In the opinion of some he was the husband of Thermantia, niece of the emperor Theodosius (Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 61). In the reign of Honorius, A.D. 413, he revolted, and his brief usurpation seems to have brought a temporary triumph to the Donatists (Hieron. Dial. adv. Pelag. lib. iii. cap. 19, p. 804, Patr. Lat. xxiii. 588 c). Passing over with a fleet to Italy he was defeated at Utriculum by count Marinus, and returning to Carthage was beheaded. Jerome in his commentary on Ezekiel refers to him as an illustration of Ps. lxxxii. 7, "Ye are gods," &c., as one of the highest rank forfeiting his honour and his life (Comment. in Ezek. lib. ix. cap. 28, p. 329, in Patr. Lat. xxv. 268 A).

[C. H.]

HERACLIANUS (6), bishop of Chalcedon, a vigorous opponent of the Manichaeans (Phot. Biblioth. cod. 231, p. 287). Photius (cod. 85) describes his work Adversus Manichaeos in twenty books, as composed in a clear, concise, and dignified style, refuting the Evangelium, the Liber Giganteus, and the Thesauri of the Manichaeans. Heraclianus reviews the authors who preceded him in writing against this sect, such as Hegemonius, Titus, George of Laodicea, Serapion, Diodorus, briefly supplying their omissions and citing in full their best arguments with comments of his own. A fragment of his letter to a certain Achillius, to whom his work appears to have been addressed, has been preserved by Maximus the Confessor. (Maxim. Confess. Opusc. Theol. p. 65, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xci. 125 c; and also in Cave, i. 551.) [C. H.]

HERACLIDAS (1), Manichaean. [APHTHONIUS, HIERACAS.]

HERACLIDAS (2), steward (procurator) of the imperial revenues in Africa, to whom reference was to be made in case of necessity, in order to provide money for distributing money to the Catholic clergy, at the command of Constantine, A.D. 312 (Euseb. H. E. x. 6).

[H. W. P.]

HERACLIDAS (3), a young friend of Amphilochius, with whom he renounced the profession of a barrister, and devoted himself to an ascetic life. Having passed through Caesarea on his way to join his friend, he was detained by Basil, whom he had visited for the purpose of receiving his instructions, and lodged by him in the hospital he had recently erected, c. 373. Basil wrote a long letter to Amphilochius in the name of Heraclidas, containing many counsels as to a religious life, and begging him to come and share with him the benefit of his instructions. (Bas. Epist. 150 [392].) [E. V.]

HERACLIDAS (4), bishop of Nyssa about 440, wrote two epistles in confutation of a Messalian book, using language which in the judgment of Photius (Cod. 52) furnished a proof of the antiquity of the veneration of images. [G. S.]

HERACLIDES (1)—June 28. A disciple in the school of Origen, and martyr at Alexandria. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.; Baronius, A.D. 205, num. 7; Ruinart, Acta Sincera, pp. 96-102; Euseb. H. E. vi. 4.) [G. T. S.]

HERACLIDES (2). In the subscriptions to the creed of the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381, is found Heraclides Tituensis, in the margin Pтынensis (Mansi, iii. 570). Heraclides is supposed to have been bishop of Petnelissus on the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia, or of Tyrus (Tyraeum) in Pisidia. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1023, 1047; Gama, Series Episc. 450, 451.) [L. D.]

HERACLIDES (3), bishop of Oxyrynchus in the Heptanomus, in Lower Egypt. He succeeded the heretical bishop Theodorus, c. 384, and is possibly referred to by Rufinus. (Ruf. Hist. Monach. cap. 5, in Patrol. Lat. xxi. 408; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 578.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIDES (4), a bishop in Cyprus in the end of the 4th century; one of those to whom the letter of Theophilus of Alexandria in condemnation of Origen was addressed, A.D. 400. (Jerome, ep. 92, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

HERACLIDES (5) CYPRIUS, bishop of Ephesus; a native of Cyprus, who had received a liberal education, was versed in the Scriptures, and had passed some years in ascetic training in the desert of Scetis under Evagrius. He then became deacon to Chrysostom, and was in immediate attendance on him. On the deprivation of Antoninus bishop of Ephesus, A.D. 401, there being a deadlock in the election through the number of rival candidates and the violence of the opposing factions, Chrysostom brought Heraclides forward, and he was elected by the votes of seventy bishops to the vacant see. The election at first only increased the disturbance, and loud complaints were made of the unfitness of Heraclides for the office, which detained Chrysostom in Asia. (Socr. H. E. vi. 11; Soz. H. E. viii. 6; Pallad. p. 139.) At the assembling of the synod of the Oak, A.D. 403, Heraclides was summoned to answer certain specified charges brought against him by Macarius, bishop of Magnesia, a bishop named Isaac, and a monk named John. Among these charges were those of having stolen a deacon's clothes at Caesarea, and of having unjustly scourged some persons at Ephesus and dragged them in chains through the city, and of entertaining Origenizing tenets.

The urgency with which the condemnation of Chrysostom was pressed forward retarded the suit against Heraclides, which had come to no issue at the time of his great master's deposition and banishment. The sudden recall of Chrysostom did not at once free Heraclides from the machinations of his persecutors. According to Socrates and Sozomen, whose account, however, is called in question by Tillemont (vol. xi. 599, "Chrysost." note lxxii), fresh accusations were brought against him after Chrysostom's return. His friends and those of Chrysostom protested against the illegality of taking proceedings against him in his absence, and the matter was espoused so warmly by the populace that sanguinary frays took place in the streets between the people of Constantinople, who were ardently attached to the cause of Chrysostom, and the Alexandrian sailors at the beck of Theophilus. The quarrel became at last so serious that Theophilus and those who thought with him consulted their safety by flight (Socr. H. E. vi. 17; Soz. H. E. viii. 19; Phot. Cod. 59). After Chrysostom's second and final exile in 404, Heraclides was his fellow sufferer. He was deposed by the party in power, and put in prison at Nicomedia, where, when Palladius wrote, he had been already languishing four years. A eunuch who, according to Palladius, was stained with the grossest vices, was consecrated bishop of Ephesus in his room (Pallad. Dial. ed. Bigot. p. 139). Olympias informed Chrysostom, at Heraclides's request, of the miseries in which he was involved. He replied that, much as he desired to help him, he could do nothing for him but acquaint Pentadia with his case, and beg her to do what she could to relieve him (Chrysa. Epist. 14, p. 600).

On the ascription to this Heraclides of the Lausiac History of Palladius, under the name of Paradiseus Heraclidis, see article PALLADIUS; also Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. x. 117; Ceillier, vii. 487. [E. V.]

HERACLIDES (6), bishop of Thynis or Ptolemais in the Thebaid, present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1128; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 605.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIDES (7), bishop of Heraclea Superior in the Heptanomus. He was present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1128, 1221), and is possibly the same bishop Heraclides to whom Isidore of Pelusium addressed several epistles. (Isidor. Epist. lib. i. 19, 182, 183; lib. ii. 74, 220, 241, 242; iii. 10; Patrol. Graec. lxxviii. 193 seq.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIDES (8), martyr at Alexandria with Plutarchus, Potamiana, and others; commemorated on June 28. (Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom. Mart., Notker.) [G. T. S.]

HERACLIDIANUS, bishop of Settae (Satta, Sitae), in the province of Lydia, signed the synodal letter of the province of Lydia to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 573, where "Senus" is for Settenus; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 880.) [L. D.]

HERACLITAE (Pseudo-Hieron. Indic. de Haeres. cap. 24 in Oehler, Corp. Haeres. i. 293), heretics, properly Hieracitae. Cotelier observes that the name Hieracitae (followers of Hieracas), became corrupted by copyists first into Hierachitae (see, for instance, Gennadius, Eccl. Dog. c. 67) and then into Heraclitae. (Coteler. Eccl. Graec. Mon. i. 780.) [ERACLIUS (2), HIERACAS.] [T. W. D.]

HERACLITUS (1) (Ἡράκλειτος, Euseb.; Ἡράκλεις, HERACLITUS al. HERACLIUS, Jerom.), author of Commentarii in Apostolum, not extant, in the period of Commodus and Severus. (Euseb. H. E. v. 27; Jerom. de Vir. Ill. cap. 46; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 95; Ceillier, i. 537.) [C. H.]

HERACLITUS (2), bishop of Tamiathis, present at the council of Ephesus, 431 (Mansi, iv. 1128). Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 589) doubts whether the city is to be identified with Damietta, and places it in the Heptanomis. In this uncertainty Gams puts the bishops of Tamiathis in both localities (Ser. Episc. 461). Both Le Quien and Gams write the bishop's name Heraclius. [C. H.]

HERACLITUS (3), bishop of Arce or Arca in Phoenicia, between Tripolis and Antaradus. He is stated in some of the Latin codices to have been present at the fourth general council, A.D. 451, where Photius of Tyre signed in his name (Mansi, vii. 436; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 826). He also signed the synodical epistle of his province addressed to the emperor Leo, assenting to the decrees of Chalcedon, and describing the recent murder of Proterius. [J. de S.]

HERACLIUS. [ERACLIUS.]

HERACLIUS (1), bishop of Amastris on the coast of Paphlagonia, mentioned in the Menaea as contemporary with the childhood of St. Hyacinth, c. A.D. 300. (Basil. Menol. Jul. 18; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 561.) [L. D.]

HERACLIUS (2), antipope. [EUSEBIUS (1), p. 304.]

HERACLIUS (3), the first known bishop of Zela. He subscribed the canons of the councils of Ancyra and Neocaesarea in 314. (Mansi, ii. 534, 548.) The subscriptions in Mansi represent the see as belonging to Armenia Major. Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 541) places it in the ecclesiastical province of Helenopontus. The next known occupant of this see is Atticus. [F. A.]

HERACLIUS (4), bishop of Baris in Pisidia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1049.) [L. D.]

HERACLIUS (5), fourth bishop of Troyes in the 4th cent. (Gall. Christ. xii. 484.) [R. T. S.]

HERACLIUS (6), bishop of Cidissum in Phrygia Pacatiana. His name was subscribed to the faith of Chalcedon in his absence by Nunechius of Laodicea, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 801.) [L. D.]

HERACLIUS (7), bishop of Azotus. He took part in the "Latrocinium" at Ephesus, A.D. 449, but retracted at Chalcedon. (Mansi, vi. 850, 918; vii. 440; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 661.) [J. de S.]

HERACLIUS, bishop of Tamiathis. [HERACLITUS (2).]

HERACLIUS (8), bishop of Comana, in the province of Armenia Secunda; present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. He subscribes the condemnation of Dioscorus at the third session of the council (Hard. Concilia, ii. 368 A), and the synodical letter of the council to Leo the Great (Leo Mag. Ep. 98, p. 1104; Oriens Christ. i. 445.) [C. G.]

HERACLIUS (9), fourteenth bishop of Sens, circ. 496, was present at Rheims when Clovis was baptized. He erected a convent for nuns (or, according to the Bollandists, a monastery for men) at Sens, and was there buried. His acts are lost, having been burnt. He was commemorated on June 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 70; Gallia Christ. xii. 6; Gams, Ser. Episc. 629.) [R. T. S.]

HERACLIUS (10) (HERACLIANUS), bishop of Chalcedon in Bithynia c. A.D. 500, a strong opponent both of the Monophysites, and of the Manichees; fragments exist of his books against Soterichus of the Cappadocian Caesarea, the friend of Severus of Antioch; Photius (Bibl. Codd. 85, 231) highly praises his works against the Manichees. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 602; Migne, Pat. Gr. ciii.) [L. D.]

HERACLIUS (11), fifteenth archbishop of Paris, between Apedemius and Probatius. He was present at the first council of Orleans in 511, and is addressed, together with two other prelates, in a letter of St. Remigius, archbishop of Rheims (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxv. 966; cf. Ceillier, xi. 80; Mansi, viii. 356; Gall. Christ. vii. 16). [S. A. B.]

HERACLIUS (12), twelfth bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Châteaux, between Florentius and Victor, was present at the council of Carpentras held in A.D. 527, the second of Orange and the third of Vaison in 529, and the fourth of Orleans in 541. It has been conjectured that the Heraclius, to whom Avitus, archbishop of Vienna, addressed his forty-seventh letter, was identical with this bishop. He praises him for his defence of the catholic faith before the Arian Gundobald, and prophesies his accession to the episcopate. The answer of Heraclius is also in existence (Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 708, 718, 728, ix. 120, Florence, 1759-98; Migne, Patr. Lat. lix. 264 n. 265; Ceillier, x. 562; Gall. Christ. i. 707; Hist. Lit. de la Fr. iii. 187). [S. A. B.]

HERACLIUS (13), 9th bishop of Saintes. When the bishops assembled at the council of Saintes deposed Emerius from that see, they put in his place Heraclius a priest of Bordeaux (562 or 563). But Emerius was immediately restored by Charibert, in defiance of the sentence of the council [EMERIUS]. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 26; Gall. Christ. ii. 1057.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLIUS (14), 8th bishop of Digne, succeeding Hilarius, and followed by Agapius and Bobo, present at the fourth council of Paris, A.D. 573, the first of Mâcon about 581 and the second of Mâcon in 585 (Mansi, ix. 868, 936, 957; Gall. Christ. iii. 1113). [S. A. B.]

HERACLIUS (15) (ERADIUS), eighth bishop of Angoulême, between Frontonius and Nicasius. He had been employed as ambassador by Childbert I., and was consecrated about 577. He suffered much from the persecution of Nantinus, count of Angoulême, who accused him of harbouring the murderers of his uncle Maracharius, and took away by force from the church of Angoulême, the lands which his uncle had bequeathed to it. Heraclius died about A.D. 580. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 37; Gall. Christ. ii. 980.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLIUS (16), ST., eighth archbishop of Tarentaise, succeeding Martianus, and followed by Firminus or Firmius, towards the close of the sixth century. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702.) [S. A. B.]

HERACLIUS (17), bishop of Samos at the Nicene council of 787; his name is found at the beginning of the seventh session. (Mansi, xiii. 373; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 931.) [L. D.]

HERACLIUS (18), bishop of Junopolis (Abonotichus) on the coast of Paphlagonia, present at the Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 369; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 556.) [L. D.]

HERACLIUS (19)—May 4. Martyr with Justus and Maurus at Fulginium in Umbria. He was converted by Felicianus the apostle of Umbria in the 3rd century. He was arrested by the president Aurelius during the Decian persecution, and beheaded outside the city at the first milestone on the Roman road. [FELICIANUS (1).] (Ughell. Ital. Sacr. i. 685 D; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. i. 452.) [G. T. S.]

HERACLIUS (20) — March 9, martyr. [FORTY MARTYRS.]

HERACLIUS (21), count mentioned by Athanasius as inciting the populace to persecute the Catholic congregations. (Athanas. Opp. i. 298; Baron. A. E. ann. 342, xix.) [C. H.]

HERACLIUS (22), a native of Tyre, who had been priest of Hercules in that city. To avoid the charge of sorcery he fled to Cyzicus, where he professed himself a convert and received baptism from the bishop Eleusius, by whom he was also admitted to the diaconate without due investigation. When apprised of the charges against him, Eleusius refused to degrade and excommunicate him. This was made one of the grounds of Eleusius's deposition by the council at Constantinople, A.D. 360 (Socr. H. E. ii. 42; Soz. H. E. iv. 24.) [E. V.]

HERACLIUS (23), a deacon of Pannonia at the end of the 4th century, the bearer of letters to St. Jerome, then at Bethlehem. He was sent (A.D. 397) by Castrutius (q. v.), who had intended to go to Bethlehem, but through old age and blindness could get no further than Cissa; and also by his bishop, Amabilis, who after urging Jerome many times by letters to interpret for him the visions of Isaiah, and receiving no reply, enforced his request by the personal agency of Heraclius. Jerome replied to Castrutius (ep. 68, ed. Vall.), and also wrote the commentary, which, thirteen years afterwards, he incorporated as the fifth book in his Commentary on Isaiah (Pref. to Comm. on Is. Jerome, vol. iv. 168, ed. Vall.). Heraclius seems to have endeared himself to Jerome, who exacted from him a promise to return, which he performed in the following year (398), when he brought with him the letter of Vitalis (q. v. ep. 72, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

HERACLIUS (24)—May 17. Martyr with Paulus Aquilinus and two others at Nividunum or Novidunum (Nyon), on the Lake of Geneva. (Mart. Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERACLIUS (25), a deacon of Theopolis (as Antioch was then called) representing Ephraim, his metropolitan at the council of Constantinople in 536 (Mansi, viii. 880, 920, 928, 938, 949, 977). [T. W. D.]

HERACLIUS (26), emperor A.D. 610-641. He was son of an exarch of Africa of the same name, who had distinguished himself in the wars against Persia under Maurice, A.D. 586 (Le Beau, x. 245), and to whom the inhabitants of Constantinople, oppressed by the tyranny of Phocas, emperor A.D. 602-610, appealed for deliverance. He was in turn probably a descendant of an Heraclius, a consul and native of Edessa, who had distinguished himself under the emperor Leo, and had been sent by him against the Vandals, A.D. 471 (Theoph. Chron. p. 181, ed. Bohn). The elder Heraclius handed over the conduct of the expedition which he fitted out in response to this invitation to his son, aided by his cousin Nicetas. After a naval combat fought within sight of the imperial palace, and the execution of Phocas, Heraclius mounted the imperial throne and established a dynasty which arrested for a time the decay of the Roman empire, and survived directly throughout the 7th century, and indirectly through the iconoclastic emperors, for well-nigh two centuries. [LEO III.; IRENE; PHOCAS.] A man whose reign was so fruitful in practical results, being "one of the most remarkable epochs, both in the history of the empire and in the annals of mankind" (Finlay, Hist. of Greece, i. 313), is well worthy of careful attention. The history of his wars with the Persians and other barbarian nations will be found in detail in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, and in the authorities there quoted. Here we shall deal with his life solely in its religious aspects, referring the reader for fuller details to the article on MONOTHELISM, the origin of which is due to his efforts after ecclesiastical comprehension. Three points are specially worthy of notice under this head: (1) his attitude towards the Jews; (2) his celebrated Ecthesis, which originated Monothelism, A.D. 638; (3) the policy which he pursued in the eastern provinces of Europe.

(1) His attitude towards the Jews.—In the beginning of the 7th century the Jews had vastly increased in numbers and importance in Greece, Africa, Spain, Georgia, and Arabia. This increase of their numbers and wealth soon roused the bigotry and jealousy of the Christians, while the deplorable condition of the Roman empire, and of the Christian population in the East, inspired the Jews with expectations of re-establishing their national independence, under the long-expected Messiah (Millman, Lat. Christ. tom. ii. p. 183, ed. 1867; Finlay, l. c. p. 325). [GURAM.] This feeling had already found vent under Phocas in an active persecution of the Jews, but it was carried out more rigorously under Heraclius, who attempted, by enforcing compulsory baptism, to bring them over to the church.

[GEORGIUS (73).] Heraclius not only practised every cruelty to effect this object within the Roman empire, but also induced the Gothic sovereigns of Spain to second his exertions in this direction, though, to their credit be it said, even then some Christians were found enlightened enough to disapprove of such violent conversions. (Isidor. Hisp. Chron. Goth., where speaking of king Sisebut, with whom Heraclius concluded a treaty with such a provision, he says, "Aemulationem quidem Dei habuit sed non secundum scientiam. Potestate enim compulit quos provocare fidei ratione oportuit;" cf. Neander, H. E. Clark's ed. v. 209.) A prophecy, said to have been current about this time, which declared that the Roman empire would be overthrown by a circumcised people, may have helped to intensify the persecution.

(2) Heraclius's efforts after ecclesiastical comprehension found a vent in the celebrated ἑκθεσις τῆς πίστεως, published towards the close of his reign, A.D. 638. [ECTHESIS.] The history of this celebrated document will be further discussed and illustrated in the article MONOTHELISM. The causes which led up to its issue were briefly the following. Monophysitism had broken up the unity of the empire. Egypt and Syria had been alienated from Constantinople by ecclesiastical disputes which Heraclius, in view of the attacks of the Persians on the one hand and of the Saracens on the other, strove to compose by an imperial edict. But instead of composing the dissensions, this edict served only to infuse fresh life into them. (See the articles CYRUS of Alexandria, HONORIUS of Rome, SOPHRONIUS of Jerusalem, SERGIUS of Constantinople, MAXIMUS Abbat, THEODORUS of Pharan, MONOTHELISM; Neander, H. E. v. 116, 239-254, ed. Bohn; Gieseler, H. E. ii. 172, ed. Clark; Ceillier, xi. 760; Mansi, x. 992; Hefele, Concil. iv. 48, ed. Paris, 1870; Ersch und Gruber, Encyklop. lxxxiv. 160; Herzog, Real Encyklop. s. v.)

(3) The establishment of the people now constituting the principality of Servia, which has exerted such an important influence on Eastern Europe, is originally due to Heraclius. He endeavoured to form a permanent barrier in Europe against the encroachments of the Avars and Slavonians. The imperial armies which, in the time of the emperor Maurice, had waged an active war in Illyricum and Thrace, and frequently invaded the territories of the Avars, had melted away during the reign of Phocas. The only feasible plan then was the establishment of powerful colonies of tribes hostile to the Avars and their Slavonian allies, in the deserted provinces of Dalmatia and Illyricum. To accomplish this object, Heraclius induced the Serbs or Western Slavonians, who occupied the country about the Carpathian mountains, and who had successfully opposed the extension of the Avar empire in that direction, to abandon their ancient seats, and move down to the south into the provinces between the Danube and the Adriatic. The Slavonian people of Illyricum and Dalmatia long regarded themselves as bound to pay a certain degree of territorial allegiance to the eastern empire (Constant. Porphy. de Administ. Imp. cc. 31-36). A careful study of the original settlement under Heraclius would perhaps throw considerable light upon the long history of the eastern question, and even upon its present position (cf. Evagr. H. E. v. 1; Finlay's Hist. of Greece, ii. 831).

Among the other notable events of his reign was the capture of Jerusalem and of the supposed true cross by the Persians in the earlier years of his reign, its recapture by Heraclius in 628, and its solemn restoration 629. His latter days were rendered miserable by the invasions of the Saracens, combined as it would seem with most distressing neuralgia in the head, the result, perhaps, of consequent mental anxiety. The Arab historians tell us that in exchange for a splendid diamond, which Heraclius sent as a present to the Caliph Omar, he returned him a miraculous cap, which, so long as he wore it, gave him relief from his pain. On this they ground a tale of his conversion to the religion of Islam. The same writers represent him however as practically holding his throne by the pleasure of the caliph, which is clearly contrary to fact (Neale, Islamism, its Rise and Progress, i. 65; Finlay, Hist. of Greece, chronolog. table prefixed to tom. i.).

Heraclius was twice married; first to Eudocia, daughter of Rogatus an African nobleman; secondly, to his niece Martina, a union which was looked upon as incestuous, and from which the patriarch Sergius in vain endeavoured to dissuade him. (Theophan. Chronog. p. 459. ed. Bonn; Le Beau, Le Bas-Empire, tom. xi. c. 56, 57, 58, ed. Saint-Martin; Gibbon, cap. xlvii.; Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 100.)

HERACLONAS, emperor. [HERACLEONAS.]

HERAIS—June 28, martyr at Alexandria, a disciple in the school of Origen. While yet a catechumen she received, as Origen expressed it, "baptism by fire." (Euseb. H. E. vi. 4; Mart. Vet. Rom.; Mart. Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERASMUS, martyr. [ERASMUS (2).]

HERASTUS, martyr at Philippi, commemorated on July 26; supposed to have been the Erastus of Acts xix. 22. (Usuard.) [C. H.]

HERBALDUS, bishop. [GARIBALDUS.]

HERBERT (HEREBERCT, HEREBERHT), a priest, and one of St. Cuthbert's oldest and most attached friends. He lived as a hermit on the beautiful isle on Derwentwater which bears his name. It was his custom to pay a yearly visit to Cuthbert, for his spiritual advice and help. They met together in Carlisle, Cuthbert's own city, in A.D. 686. "Ask me, brother Hereberct," said the saint, "whatever thou art in need of, for after we have parted asunder we shall never in this world look into each other's face." The listener threw himself at Cuthbert's feet, and implored him with tears, in the Lord's name, to bear his faithful comrade in his mind, and to ask of God that they might serve Him at the same time in heaven as they had done upon earth. The saint sought the boon in prayer, and told his companion that it should be vouchsafed to him. They separated and died apart, but on the same day, the 20th of March, 686-7, Herbert suffering heavily from sickness before his end (Bede, H. E. iv. 29; Vita S. Cuth. c. 28; Anon. Vita S. Cuth. p. 286). "Those holy men died both at the same hour." There is a notice of St. Herbert, as he was called, in the Acta SS. Boll. 20 March, iii. 142. He occurs among the list of anchorets in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (p. 8).

In St. Herbert's Isle, on Derwentwater, beautifully wooded, "St. Herbert's consecrated grove," the remains of the abode of the recluse are still visible. In 1374 Thomas Appleby, bishop of Carlisle, directed the vicar of Crowthwaite to visit the island every 15th of April and celebrate there the Missa de Cuthberto with note. The bishop made an error as to Herbert's death-day. The document is in Reg. Appleby at Carlisle, f. 74b, and is printed inaccurately in Hutchinson's Cumberland, ii. 172; Burn and Nicolson's Cumberland and Westmorland, ii. 529-30; and, more exactly, in Smith's Appendix to his edition of Bede, p. 783. [J. R.]

HERC, Welsh saint. [ERC.]

HERCAITH, disciple of St. Patrick. (Todd, S. Patrick, 510.) [J. G.]

HERCHENRADUS. [ERCHENRADUS.]

HERC-NASCA. [ERC (3).]

HERCONWALD (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 994, A.D. 688), bishop. [ERKENWALD.] [C. H.]

HERCULANUS (1), (Cyp. Ep. 41), African bishop. Appears first as colleague of Caldonius in Cyprian's commission, A.D. 251 (Ep. 42), as party to excommunication of FELICISSIMUS. In A.D. 252 (Cyp. Ep. 57), twenty-fifth bishop in conc. Carth. ii. de Pace. In A.D. 255 among the thirty-two bishops of the proconsular province at the council de Bapt. Haeret. i. (Cyp. Ep. 70.) [E. W. B.]

HERCULANUS (2) I., bishop of Perugia (Perugia) c. 290-310. Ughelli makes him to have been the first bishop, to have lived A.D. 57-90, and to have been put to death under Domitian, but this is in all probability erroneous. His life and actions have been much confused with those of Herculanus II., his successor in the see c. A.D. 534. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. *70; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 453.) [R. S. G.]

HERCULANUS (3), bishop of Brescia, c. 553. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 562; Acta SS. Boll. 12 Aug. ii. 731.) [A. H. D. A.]

HERCULANUS (4) II.—Nov. 7. Bishop of Perugia, where he was beheaded by the soldiers of Totila. St. Gregory assures us that his body was found with his head joined to the body as perfectly as if no sword had ever touched it. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.; Sigebert. Gembl. Ann. 544, in Patr. Lat. clx. 105; Gregor. Dialog. lib. iii. cap. 13; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. i. 51, Jul. i. 33; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. Ben. saec. i. p. 103.) [G. T. S.]

HERCULANUS (5)—Sept. 5; called Herconus in Mart. Rom. Vet. A martyr at Rome. (Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HEROULANUS (6)—Sept. 27. A martyr at Rome mentioned in the acts of a certain bishop Alexander, whose see is unknown (Mart. Adon., Usuard.). In Mart. Rom. Vet., under date of

Nov. 26, we are told that Alexander suffered on Sept. 21, and that his relics were translated by pope Damasus on Nov. 26, which he ordained as his festival. [G. T. S.]

HERCULES, bishop of Narnia (Narni) A.D. 455-470. He was son of his predecessor, Pancratius I., and brother of his successor, Pancratius II. The father and the two sons were buried in one tomb. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1084; Cappelletti, Ital. Sacr. iv. 544.) [R. S. G.]

HERCULIANUS (HERCOLIANUS, Ruinart, Acta Sinc. 596), soldier martyr at Antioch. [JOVIANUS.] [C. H.]

HERCULIANUS, bishop of Perugia, martyr. [HERCULANUS (2).]

HERCULIUS (1), a person of rank, to whom Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus, expressing the confidence he felt in his deep affection which no silence could lessen, but entreating him to write often. (Chrys. Epist. 201.) [E. V.]

HERCULIUS (2), first recorded bishop of Otriculum (Ocria, Otricoli), present at the council of Rome under Felix, A.D. 487 (Mansi, vii. 1171 D; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 573, 579). [C. H.]

HERCUMBERTUS. [HERUMBERTUS.]

HERDULF, bishop. [EARDULF (3).]

HEREBALD, a young scholar under the charge of St. John of Beverley, with whom he was a great favourite. On one occasion, when the master and his pupils were riding out, the young lads reached a level bit of ground, and got John's permission to run races. Herebald, however, was not to go with them. The youth, disappointed at being left behind, stole off, and was thrown violently from his horse, which stumbled at a stone. The lad's skull was fractured. A very interesting account is given of his cure, which is said to have been effected chiefly by John himself. In Herebald's great peril John rebaptized him, having discovered by inquiry that the rite had been insufficiently administered at the first. Herebald recovered, and told the tale to Bede with his own lips, being at that time the abbat of a monastery at the mouth of the Tyne, the predecessor of the modern Tynemouth (Bede, H. E. v. 6; Folcard, Vita S. Joh. c. 8). According to Symeon of Durham, "Herebald abbas" died in A.D. 745. (Chron. Ragum, ed. Surtees Soc. 18.) [J. R.]

HEREBERCT, HEREBERHT, HEREBERT, priest and anchoret. [HERBERT.]

HEREBERGIS, HEREBURGIS, abbas. [HERIBURG.]

HEREBERHT (1), a Kentish abbat, whose name is attached to a charter of Sigiraed king of Kent, granted to Rochester in the time of archbishop Bregwin, 759-765. (Kemble, C. D. 114; Mon. Angl. i. 163.) [S.]

HEREBERHT (2), a priest of the diocese of Sidnacester, who attests the act of the synod of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

HERECA, a West Saxon abbat, probably of Malmesbury. He is mentioned in a letter written by an unnamed monk to Lullus of Mainz (Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 299, 300), in which the writer reminds the bishop of their ancient friendship in the town of Malmesbury under abbat Eaba. The writer, who is probably Hereca himself or his secretary, sends to Lullus the kind remembrances of the convent over which he presides, and Hereca places his sign at the close of the letter. It is not quite clear from this over what monastery Hereca ruled, and the name does not occur in William of Malmesbury's list of the abbats of that abbey. Hereca appears as a witness to two charters which have some claim to authenticity; one in which Ethelbald of Mercia grants lands to abbat Kanberht (Kemble, C. D. 100), and another in which Cynewulf of Wessex grants lands to Malmesbury (K. C. D. 103). In both these Hereca is associated with West Saxon bishops, and the date of both is 758 or thereabout. [S.]

HEREDNAT, Irish saint. [EREDNAT.]

HEREFERTHUS (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 712, ed. Coxe), bishop of Worcester between Tilhere and "Debert." He is therefore the same as Heathored. [C. H.]

HEREFRITH (1), the familiar priest and friend of St. Cuthbert, to whom we are indebted for many valuable reminiscences of his life. He gave Bede an account of Cuthbert's serious bodily infirmity after he was attacked by the plague in A.D. 661 (Bede, V. S. Cuth. c. 8). In A.D. 686-7, when Cuthbert died on Farne Island, Herefrith was abbat of Lindisfarne, and had the privilege of attending his master in his last illness, hearing his last request and commands, closing his eyes, and afterwards of interring his remains. He gave to Bede a description of the scene, which for pathos and simple beauty cannot be surpassed. (Id. cc. 37-40; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. 57.) When Bede wrote the Life of Cuthbert, the MS. was frequently submitted to Herefrith's critical eye when he visited the historian at Jarrow. (Preface to Life of Cuth.) He is there styled Herefrid the priest, having probably resigned his office of abbat, and sought, after his old master's fashion, a more ascetic life. The name of "Herefrid presbyter" occurs in the Liber Vitae at Durham among the abbats of the priestly grade (p. 6). There is a letter from Boniface to Herefrith presbyter, but he can scarcely be identified with Cuthbert's friend. Boniface died in A.D. 754. [J. R.]

HEREFRITH (2), a priest to whom St. Boniface wrote, about the year 746, requesting him to urge Ethelbald of Mercia to comply with the advice given him to reform. (Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 177; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 357, 358.) He can scarcely be identified with Herefrith abbat of Lindisfarne, but may be the person whose death is recorded under 747 by the continuator of Bede as "Herefrith the man of God" (M. H. B. 288). [S.]

HEREMIUS (EREMIUS), bishop of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia, present at the council of Ariminum, A.D. 359, after which he was banished and most cruelly treated in order to make him renounce communion with Athanasius. (Athan. Apol. ad Const. § 27, p. 247; Migne, Pat. Gr. xxv. 630 b; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 29.) [L. D.]

HEREMOD, a Kentish priest, who attests an act of archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

HERENA, widow of the Roman martyr Castulus. (Boll. Acta SS. 22 Jan. ii. 415; St. Ambrosius, Opp. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. xvii. 1056 n.) [IRENE.] [J. G.]

HERENA, Mart. Carth. A.D. 250. (See ARISTO.) [E. W. B.]

HERENAT, virgin. [ERONAT.]

HERENNIANUS, Carthaginian, sub-deacon, A.D. 257. (See AMANTIUS.) Cyp. Ep. 77, 78, 79. [E. W. B.]

HERENNIUS (1), a Christian philosopher who lived subsequently to Porphyry and Jamblichus, for whom he expresses admiration. Fabricius (Bib. Graec. iv. 4, and v. 7), confounding him with Philo Byblius, places him under Domitian (cf. Fabr. Bib. Graec. iii. 6). Cardinal Mai, in his Class. Auct. ix. 513-593, gives a commentary by him on the Metaphysics of Aristotle, which he describes as "very learned and very subtil." Cf. Pitra's remarks in the preface of volume cited, p. viii. [G. T. S.]

HERENNIUS (2), the 7th recorded bishop of Portus Romanus, next to Glycerius and preceding Castus. He occurs among the bishops present at the third council of Rome held by bishop Felix III. A.D. 487. (Mansi, Concil. vii. 1171; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 111.) [C. H.]

HERENNIUS, bishop of Jerusalem. [AR-RHENIUS, ERENNIUS.]

HERENUS, Mart. Carth. A.D. 250. (See ARISTO.) [E. W. B.]

HERERIC, son of Eadfrith, and a nephew of Edwin, king of Northumbria, who was baptized with him by Paulinus at York on Easter Sunday, A.D. 627. He continued a Christian, and was the father of Hilda, abbess of Whitby, and of the abbess Heresuid. He was poisoned whilst in exile under Cerdic, a British king. His wife's name was Bregusuid (Bede, H. E. iv. 23). [J. R.]

HERESIOLOGY. For a definition of heresy, as the term was understood in the early church, the reader is referred to the article HERESY in the Dict. of Christ. Antiq. We shall here limit ourselves to some brief notice of those writers who have treated the subject of heresies generally; referring for fuller information to the articles under their several names.

The earliest known heresiologist is JUSTIN MARTYR (c. 103-166), in his Σύσταγμα κατὰ πασῶν τῶν γεγενημένων αἰρεσέων, of which we know nothing but the title and the fact that it was written before the author's first Apology (Apol. i. 26). The earliest enumeration of heresies and heretics is one that occurs in a fragment of the Ἱστορίαι of HEGESIPPUS (c. 120-185), preserved in Eusebius, and it mentions the following:—"Thebuthia, Simon and the Simoniani, Cleobius and the Cleobiani, Dositheus and the Dositheani, Gorthaeus and the Gortheni, and the Masbothaei," and that from these are derived "the Menandrianistae, the Marcionistae, the Carpocratiani, the Valentiniani, the Basileidiani, and the Saturniliani" (H. E. iv. 22).

These were soon followed by IRENAEUS bishop of Lyons (A.D. 177 to c. 201), in his great work entitled, Ἐλέγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδο-ρύμου γνώσεως (Euseb. v. 7; Phot. Bibl. cxx.). To the edition of this work published by Migne in his Patrologia Graeca, tom. vii., there is added a very valuable collection of what remains of the heretics of whom it treats.

Some years later TERTULLIAN published his De Praescriptionibus adversus Omnes Haereses (de Carne Christ. c. 2). At the close of this work he promises a special refutation of some of the heresies, which promise he fulfilled in his treatises against Marcion, the Valentinians, and Praxeas, and in his Scorpiace adversus Gnosticos ("adversus bestiolas scorpiacum," i. § 4, s. f.). To these may be added his de Anima, his de Carne Christi, and his de Resurrectione Carnis, in which also he controverts the Gnostics. Some of the earlier editions of Tertullian contain as an appendix to the De Praescriptionibus, a list of heresies (Ceillier, ii. 751; Oehler, Corp. Haeresiol. i. 271); this is now recognised not to be Tertullian's, but it is unquestionably very ancient. It has been by some supposed to be a Latin translation of the lost Σύγγραμμα of Hippolytus Romanus. The author passes over the Jewish heretics, among whom he mentions Dositheus the Samaritan, and gives brief notices of twenty-nine heretics and heresies which had arisen in his day. The first heretic whose opinions he treats of is Simon Magus, and the last Praxeas. The metrical treatise against Marcion ascribed to Tertullian is assigned by Oehler to VICTORINUS OF MARSEILLES (Tertull. Op. ii. 782).

In the meanwhile the works of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA had appeared, whose Ἐκπαρατεῖς and Summaries from Theodotus, if indeed this last be his (n. ed. Migne, ii. 654), have greatly added to our knowledge of the earlier heresies. To Clement also we are indebted for several fragments of the earlier heretical writings: e.g. those of BASILIDES (Strom. iv. 12), CASSIANUS (Str. i. 21, iii. 13), EPIPHANES (Str. iii. 2), HERACLEON (Str. iv. 9), ISIDORUS (Str. ii. 20, iii. 1, vi. 6), TATIAN (Str. iii. 12), VALENTINUS (Str. ii. 8, 20, iii. 7, iv. 13).

Towards the commencement of the 3rd century HIPPOLYTUS ROMANUS published his Treatise (Ἐλέγχος) against all Heresies (Hippol. Refut. Omn. Haer. ed. Duncker, 1859). Some time previously he had published a shorter Treatise (σύγγραμμα) against the Thirty-two Heresies, commencing with the Dositheani and ending with Noetus and the Noetiani (Phot. Biblioth. cxi.). The Σύγγραμμα is unhappily lost; but Lipsius has endeavoured in some measure to restore it by means of the use made of it by Epiphanius and Philastrius (Quellenkritik der Epiphanius). The Ἐλέγχος is a much more extensive work and contains numerous quotations from Irenaeus, as well as several fragments of heretical writings, e. g. Elchesaite, Naassene, Peratic, and Sethian, and besides these of Basilides and Valentinus, fragments also of the works of JUSTINUS, MARCUS, MONOIMUS, and SATURNILUS. The first heresy treated of by Hippolytus in his surviving work is that of the Naasseni, and the last that of the Elchesaite. There are also ascribed to him special treatises on the heresy of NOETUS and on that of BEROUS and HELIX.

In the last quarter of the 4th century EPIPHANIUS published two works on the subject of heresies, the Ἀγρυπνός and the Παράδιος. The heresies of which he treats are substantially the same in both works, but the Παράδιος is much the fuller and the more complete. It commences with twenty heresies which existed in the time of our Lord. Then follow sixty heresies which had arisen since the time of our Lord, among which are the Cleobiani and the Gortheni of Hegesippus. The first mentioned are the Simoniani and the last the Masbaliani. Epiphanius also made use of Irenaeus, from whom he quotes largely. Each section of the Παράδιος has a summary prefixed. These summaries appear to have been early collected and circulated as a separate work. A considerable fragment of another epitome has recently been brought to light, and is published by Dindorf in his edition of Epiphanius. It comprises the thirty-four first-mentioned heresies of the Παράδιος, and ends with the Marcosii.

About the same date, PHILASTRIUS bishop of Brixia (A.D. 378-387), published his Liber de Haeresibus. The first twenty-eight chapters are occupied with pre-Christian heresies, commencing with the Ophitae, and ending with the Herodiani. Philastrius assigns the Caii (c. 2), the Sethiani (c. 3), and the Nazaraei (c. 8) to this class. He also speaks of Dosithaeus as "Judaean genere" (c. 4). In the remainder of his work, c. 29-156 (ed. Oehler, al. 150), he treats of the heresies which had arisen since the time of our Lord. A number of the heresies in both classes are not named, so that many of his chapters treat only of heretical opinions, and among those which he has named are several which do not occur in his great contemporary. He also supplies several variants which are frequently of some historical and dogmatic interest. The edition of Philastrius published in the Patrologia is enriched with very valuable notes. That of Oehler, in his Corpus Haeresiologicum, has critical notes, and also the learned commentaries of J. A. Fabricius.

In 397, JEROME, writing to Magnus, a Roman orator, enumerates some forty-four writers, the greater number of whom had written against one or more of the heresies of their time. The earliest named is Cyprian, and the latest his own contemporary, Amphilocius of Iconium.

Some few years later AUGUSTINE published his de Haeresibus Liber, limited to heresies that had arisen in Christian times. He notices eighty-eight, the first being the Simoniani and the last the Pelagiani. Among them are ten to which he assigns no name, nine of these being also unnamed in Philastrius, and the tenth, number 68, named by Philastrius as that of the Excalceati. The Luciferiani (clxxxi.), for whose omission by Epiphanius and Philastrius he accounts by the supposition that they believed them to be schismatics only and not heretics, the Jovianistae, the Arabici, the Hebridiani, whom he supposes to be the Antidicomaritae of Epiphanius, the Paterniani, the Tertullianistae, the Abelonii, and, as might be expected, the Pelagiani, appear in Augustine for the first time. His Priscillianistae are the unnamed heretics of Philastrius, number 84. At the close of the Liber, Augustine tells his friend he has heard that Jerome has written on heresies, but he knows from whence to procure the book.

The ἑρμηνευτικόν of JOSEPPUS is placed about this time by Cave and Galland. Fabricius puts it as late as the 10th century and so beyond our limits; but on the hypothesis of the earlier date we proceed to remark that four chapters of this work are devoted to the subject of heresies: one of which is entitled Πόσαι αἵρέσεις κατὰ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς πίστεως ἐπανεστῆσαν. In this Joseppus gives brief notices of sixty-two heresies, which he enumerates in a different order from his predecessors, and mentions some by names that do not occur elsewhere: e.g. Berylliani and Marianitae. The first is that of the Herodiani, which Epiphanius notices among those of the Jews, the second that of the Theudiani, which Joseppus says arose in Egypt, and the last that of the "Anthropomorphitae, which arose in the region of Eleutheropolis," (Socrates, H. E. vi. 7; Sozomen. H. E. vii. 11; Cyril. Alex. adv. Anthropomorph. Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxvi. 1068). Joseppus explains the origin of the name Ebionaei as πρωχοὶ ἑρμηνευόμενοι διὰ τὸ περὶ τὴν πίστιν πρωχεῖν, and makes the Nazoraei to be an Ebionite sect. In noticing the heresy of Origen of Alexandria, he says that that teacher "brought thirty heresies into the church."

MARIUS MERCATOR (A.D. 418-450), published his Commonitorium de Caestio Imperatori oblatum, his Liber Subnotationum in verba Juliani, and his collections relating to the Nestorian controversy, which, with the admirable Dissertations of Garnier in the edition of these treatises reprinted in the Patrologia, leave little to be desired on the subject of the two great heresies which arose in the first half of the 5th century.

Towards the commencement of the second half of the 5th century, THEODORET bishop of Cyrus published his Αἰρετικῆς ἀκομυθίας ἐπιτομή, which he tells us that he compiled from Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Clemens (of Alexandria), Origen, the two Eusebii (of Caesarea and of Emesa), Adamantius, Rhodo, Titus (of Bostra?), Diodorus (of Cilicia), Georgius (of Laodicea), and others whom he does not name. The first book commences with Simon Magus, and ends with Manes; the second commences with Ebion, and ends with Photeinus; the third commences with the Nicolaitae, and ends with Nepos; the fourth commences with Arius, and ends with Eutyches; and the fifth contains a summary of Christian doctrine under seventeen heads. Besides Nestorius and Eutyches, Theodoret has several heresies and heretics whom his predecessors had omitted, as Marcellus of Ancyra, Eudoxius, Psathyriani, Polemiani, Pithon, Politus, and Syneros, the founders of different sects of Marcionites; and Adelphius, Dadoes, Sabbas, and Symeones, leaders of the Messalians. He is also careful to mention the principal writers against each of the heresies of which he treats. Soon after this appeared the Destruction of False Doctrines of EZNIK the bishop of Bagrewad in Armenia. This he published in his native language; it is chiefly valuable for the account which it gives us of the Zoroastrians and the Marcionites of his time.

The preface to the Arabic version of the Acts of the Council of Nicaea, translated into Latin, and published by Labbe (ii. 383 et seq.), but which was certainly not made until after 451, and probably not until the 7th century, if indeed it be not of still later date, notices seventeen heresies, apparently as existing at that date, and gives a brief account of each. Among these are some that are not similarly named elsewhere, as Sabbatini, Sophistae, Barbarii, Phocalitae, Dismatitae, and Timotheistae (Hefele, i. 361-368; Mai, Script. Nov. coll. x. praef. v.)

The work known as Praedestinatus may be assigned to about the close of the 5th century. The first book, with which only we have here to do, is entitled, "Epitome Ecdicesiae Hygini contra haeresiarchas et Categoricorum Epiphani contra sectas, et Expositionum Philastri qui hos transferens in Latinum de Graeco, cum Ariani damnarentur, edidit. Prior Hyginus, post hunc Polycrates, Africanus, Hesiodus, Epiphanius, Philaster, hi diversis temporibus diversas haeresees pertexuerunt." (Oehler, u. s. 233.) The author again refers to Polycrates, Africanus, and Hesiodus, as well as to Epiphanius, as "qui Graeco sermone universas haereseis describentes volumina multorum condidere librorum" (c. 83).

Up to the eighty-eighth chapter, Praedestinatus observes precisely the same order that Augustine does, in noticing the heresies of which he treats, and only mentions two that Augustine did not notice—that of Nestorius and that of the Praedestinati. He also very frequently copies whole sentences and sometimes entire paragraphs from Augustine. At the same time he has much that is not found in his predecessor, and has also designated many heresies that Augustine had left unnamed. He also mentions the chief opponents of the several heresies of which he treats, but some of his statements rest on his own authority.

After A.D. 564, LIBERATUS, a deacon of Carthage, published his Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum, which is not only valuable for these particular heresies, but also for the information which it contains as to the numerous sects to which they gave rise. In the first chapter he enumerates the authorities upon which he relies. The Ecclesiastica Historia to which he refers is the Historia Tripartita compiled at the request of Cassiodorus (Hist. Trip. praef., Patr. lxxix. 879). Liberatus also made use of the Breviculum Historiae Eutychianistarum, c. A.D. 494, which is ascribed to Gelasius III., bishop of Rome A.D. 492-494 (Labbe et Cossart, iv. 1079).

Somewhere about A.D. 500, GEMNADIUS, a presbyter of Massilia, published a continuation of the De Viris Illustribus of Jerome, at the end of which he says he has written eight books against all heresies, six against Nestorius, three against Pelagius, and that he has sent Gelasius bishop of Rome an epistle concerning his faith. The epistle still survives under the title of Liber de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus, and may not be overlooked in this article, as it covers the whole field of heresy from the commencement of the Christian era down to the time at which it was written. Oehler has republished it with the valuable notes of Geverhart Elmenhorst (u. s. i. 336-400).

About the same time appeared the Origines seu Etymologicae of ISIDORUS bishop of Seville A.D. 599-636. Two chapters of the eighth book are devoted to the subject of heresies, the one entitled, De Haeresibus Judaeorum, which it treats of in ten sections, and the other De Haeresibus Christianorum, in seventy-one sections. This last is copied by Gratian, in his Concordia Discordantium Canonum (c. XXIV. q. iii. c. 39). It is mainly an abbreviation of Augustine's de Haeresibus, with the addition of Nestoriani, Eutychiani, Acephali, Theodosiani and Gaianitae, and Agnoitae and Tritheitae.

About the year 600, LEONTIUS, a scholasticus of Byzantium, compiled his Σχόλια ἀπὸ φωνῆς Θεοδοίου τοῦ Θεοφιλεστάτου Ἀββᾶ, more generally known by the title of De Sectis (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. viii. 310). The work is divided into ten πρῆξεις, sectiones, in the last of which Leontius treats of the heresy of the Gaianites. It is especially valuable for the history and doctrines of the numerous sects which arose after the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. On some of these still further light is shed by his Κατὰ Νεστοριανῶν καὶ Εὐτυχιανιστῶν and his Κατὰ ἀφθαρτοδοκητῶν.

During the first quarter of the 7th century, TIMOTHEUS, a presbyter of the great church of Constantinople, published his important work entitled, Περὶ τῶν προσερχομένων τῇ ἀγλῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, which is generally quoted as De recipiendis haereticis. As the title suggests, it is a manual of ecclesiastical discipline with regard to heretics, and accordingly treats of three classes of them, such as need baptism, such as only need the chrism, and such as need neither. Of those who belong to the first class, the first mentioned are the Tascodrugi, and the last the followers of Pelagius and Coelestius, to whom he adds the Melchisedeciani, who, in his day, were known as Ἀθίγγανοι. The first mentioned in the second class are Tessarescaedecatitae, and the last the Apollinaristae; the first mentioned in the third class are the Meletiani, and the last the Eutychianistae. On this follows a tract entitled, Περὶ τοῦ γινώσκειν εἰς πόσα τιμήματα γέγονεν ἡ τῶν Ἀκεφάλων ἥτοι Θεοπασχιτῶν αἵρεσις σὺντομος ἐκθεσις; a treatise on the Marcianistae, by whom he means the Messaliani, and another on the twelve sects of the Διακρινόμενοι, those who withheld subscription to the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. This last is especially valuable as a guide to unravel what otherwise might well appear to be an almost hopeless complication. (Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. pt. i. 54 et seq.)

About the same time also ANTIOCHUS, a monk of the monastery of St. Saba, published his Ὁμιλῆαι, in one of which, No. 139, he gives a long list of the heretics and heresies which had arisen up to his time. The first sixty-one are taken from Epiphanius, then follow Evagrius and Didymus, Origenistae, Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Diodorus and Nestorius, Marès the Persian, Dioscorus, Theodosius, Gaianus, Timotheus Aelurus, Petrus Fullo, Petrus Mongus, Soterichus, Severus, Philoxenus Hieropolitanus, Jacobus Syrus, and Julianus of Halicarnassus, of all of whom he says οὐ ἀνέχονται Χριστιανοὶ καλεῖσθαι. The homily is addressed to Eustathius, abbat of the monastery of Atalina or Ameyra in Galatia.

Somewhat later, c. 636, SOPHRONIUS bishop of Jerusalem, issued a synodical letter, which was read at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680 (actio xi. Mansi, xi. 462; Photius, Biblioth. cod. 231). This merely names some hundred and twenty heresiarchs, beginning with Simon Magus and ending with Menas the Gaianite bishop of Alexandria, and thirty-three heresies, beginning with the Nicolaitae and ending with the Tritheitae. Among the heretics named are several who are not mentioned elsewhere, and some of the designations given to heresies are given only there. Cotelierius, in the notes to his Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae (i. 790), published an additional paragraph of this letter, which mentions eleven other heretics after Menas; Cyrus of Alexandria, Theodorus of Pharan, Sergius of Constantinople, and Honorius bishop of Rome, leaders of the Monothelites, all of whom are anathematized accordingly; Pyrrhus, Paulus, Petrus of Constantinople, Macarius of Antioch, and his master Stephanus, Polychronius, of whom Sophronius speaks as then living at Alexandria, and Harmasius. The Harmasitae [HARMASIUS] also appear in the σχόλια on the Ὁδῆγος of Anastasius. Fabricius and Hardouin question the authenticity of this paragraph; Le Quien, however, accepts it as genuine. (Jo. Damasc. Op. Migne, Patrol. Gr. xcvi. 129).

THEODORUS, a monk of the monastery of Rhaithu in Palestine, also belongs to the middle of the 7th century. His work, commonly known as De Incarnatione, is of some value for heretical Christology. The first heresy of which it treats is that of Manes, and the last that of Julianus of Halicarnassus.

The Indiculus de Haeresibus, first published by Menard, A.D. 1617, and ascribed by him to Jerome, is a work of certainly not earlier than towards the latter half of the 7th century, as the writer clearly made use of Isidore, e.g. his article "Hemerobaptistae" is taken verbatim from the Etymologiae. Many passages are taken from the De Viris Illustr. of Jerome. The latest heresies which the author mentions are the Agnoitae and the Tritheitae (Oehler, u. s. i. xii. 283-400).

The Ὁδῆγος, otherwise called Viae Dux adversus Acephalos, of ANASTASIUS, a monk of Sinai, bears internal evidence of belonging to the same period. It is chiefly valuable for the materials which it furnishes for the history of the Monophysites.

GERMANUS, patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 715-730, in his Narratio de Synodis, devotes the first thirty sections to an account of the heresies which had arisen before the council of Chalcedon, 451, and of the writers by whom they were severally opposed. Then follow twenty sections which more fully notice the Monophysite, the Monothelite, the Iconoclastic, and the Maronite controversies. These last especially are of great interest and value. The work appeared first in Mai's Spicilegium Romanum and afterwards in Migne's Patrologia Graeca, t. xcvi.

The latest heresiologist of the period to which this article is limited is JOANNES DAMASCENUS, whose Περὶ αἱρέσεων ἐν συντομίᾳ 300ν ἡμέραις αὐτὸν γὰρ ὁρίζεται must be assigned to the middle of the 8th century. He follows Epiphanius in distinguishing four classes of heresies, Barbarian, Scythian, Hellenic, and Jewish. The Gortheni, Sebusei, Esseni, and Dositheni, are noticed as Samaritan sects. Then follow eighty Christian heresies, beginning with that of the Simoniani and ending with the Christianocategori, Χριστιανοκατήγοροι (§ 101, p. 116, cf. Mansi, vii. 1177 D), the name by which he distinguishes the Iconoclasts, whom he also calls Thymoleontes, Θυμολέοντες. Many of the heresies which he names, however, probably had no existence as separate sects, and several others were confined to but very few localities, if not also to but very few persons, e.g. Agonyclitae, Gnosimachi, Heliotropitae, Theocatagnostae. Twenty of the heresies of which he treats, he tells us, had their origin subsequently to the reign of the emperor Marcian, A.D. 450-457. Those above mentioned belong to that class.

There is another work, which, though not compiled until a century later than the Περὶ αἰρέσεων of Damascenus, should not be passed over. It is the Libellus Synodicus, omnes Synodos tam orthodoxas quam haereticas brevi compendio continens quas, ab Apostol. inde temp. usque ad Octavam [Constantinop. A.D. 869] super unione Photii et Ioannis P. institutam, sunt celebratas (Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. 84). Many councils are noticed in this work of which we have no account elsewhere, and in the notices of these as well as of others valuable information is given as to the personal history of the heretics to whom the councils relate. The contents are distributed, mainly chronologically, in the Concilia of Labbe and of Mansi.

The following works on Heresiology may be consulted:—Baur (F. C.), Die christl. Lehre v. d. Dreieinigkeit und Menschenwerdung Gottes, 1841-1843; Bellarmine, Disp. i. iv. 9; Brucker (J.), *Hist. [T. W. D.]

HERESWITHA, ST. (HERESUID, HERESWYDE, HAERESVID), queen of the East Angles. She was the daughter of Hereric, of the royal family of Northumberland, by Beorsuitha or Breguswid his wife. She was also the sister of St. Hilda abbess of Whitby. She was the wife of Ethelhere king of the East Angles (654, 655), and by him became mother of Aldulf and Alfwold, kings of the East Angles. (Flor. Wig. Geneal. in M. H. B. 628; Id. Ad. Chron. Append. ibid. 636 c.) That she was the mother of Jurminius is doubtful [JURMINUS]. The Liber Eliensis (pp. 14, 15, ed. Stewart) erroneously makes her to have been the wife of Anna, Ethelhere's brother and predecessor, and by him the mother of four abbesses. Bede mentions Hereswitha but once (iv. 23), and then incidentally in the story of her sister Hilda. Hilda about 648, bent on a monastic life, was desirous of going to Gaul, where her sister Hereswitha, the mother of king Aldulf, in the monastery of Chelles near Paris was "expecting her crown." This language seems to imply that Aldulf was reigning and Hereswitha near the end of her life, but the chronology shews that it was before she became a queen and a widow. Bede in referring to Aldulf as king must be assumed as speaking by anticipation. [C. H.]

HERESWYTHA, a Kentish abbess between A.D. 696 and 716, whose name is attached to the privilege of Wihtred. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 240.) [C. H.]

HEREWALD (HEORDWALD, HEReward) the third bishop of Sherborne (M. H. B. 620). He succeeded bishop Forthere when the latter went to Rome in 737, having been consecrated by archbishop Nothelm before Forthere's departure, if the charter in (K. C. D. 82), which the attestations of the two bishops appear, be genuine. Anyhow he was consecrated by Nothelm in or about 736 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 659). He attended the council held by archbishop Cuthbert at Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360, 362). In charters his name occurs with that of Forthere in 736, at a synod held by Nothelm (Kemble, C. D. 82; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 337, 338), in a grant of Hilla in 744 to Glastonbury, where his confirmation is specially mentioned (K. C. D. 92; Mon. Angl. i. 47); in another Glastonbury charter, of the same date, granted by Cuthred (K. C. D. 93); in the grant of Ethelbald to Eamberht, attested by Cynewulf and the West Saxon Witan, 755 to 757 (K. C. D. 100); in the grant of Cynewulf to Malmesbury in 758 (K. C. D. 103); in the charter of Tisbury of 759 (ib. 104); and for the last time in the charter of Cynewulf to Wells, dated 766 (K. C. D. 115; Mon. Angl. ii. 285). After this date West-Saxon charters are rare, and as Ethelmod appears as bishop in 774, Herewald's death must be fixed between that year and 766. [S.]

HEREWARD, the name of a bishop attached to a doubtful charter of a king Cynulf, whom Kemble (C. D. 193) wrongly identifies with Kenulf of Mercia, dated 808. The charter really belongs to the year 758 and to Cynewulf of Wessex, and Hereward is identical with Herewald bishop of Sherborn. [S.]

HERGUST, a bishop of the Scottish Picts (Ware, Ir. Writ. c. 4), but in reality Fergustus. [FERGUSTUS.] [J. G.]

HERIBURG (HERBURGIS, HEREBURGIS), the abbess of a Yorkshire nunnery called Vetadun (Watton, E. R. Y.). When John was bishop of York (A.D. 705-18) he cured one of her nuns, and gave Heriburg some useful advice about surgery. The story is in Bede, H. E. v. 3; and in Folcard's Life of St. John, of Beverley, § 12.

[J. R.]

HERIGERUS, reputed eleventh bishop of Mainz before the 4th century; ruled for eight years, and was martyred. (Gall. Christ. v. 434 Potthast, Bibl. Suppl. p. 353.) [R. T. S.]

HERIMBERTUS. [HERUMBERTUS.]

HERINA, ST. [IRENE.]

HERLEMUNDUS (1), son of a Frank noble, succeeded Aigilbertus as sixteenth bishop of Le Mans in A.D. 698. He is said to have died Oct. 24, 724, and was followed by Gauziolenus. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 354, 440, 455.) [T. W. D.]

HERLEMUNDUS (2), eighteenth bishop of Le Mans on the expulsion of Gauziolenus in 743. He was of noble birth, and was appointed to the see by Pippin. Having sat about nine years he was enticed to a banquet by Gauziolenus and there blinded, upon which he retired for the rest of his life to the monastery of the Duo Gemelli over which his brother presided at Bayeux, and Gauziolenus was restored. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 354, 355.) [T. W. D.]

HERLINDIS (HARLINDIS), ST., abbess of Eike, near Masacum, in Belgium, together with her sister St. Renildis or Reinula, about the middle of the 8th century. They were the daughters of pious and wealthy parents, Adalhardus and Guinnara, and were virtuously brought up in the monastery of Valencina. Their parents having built the monastery of Eike near the river Mosa (Meuse), died and were buried there, leaving their property, including Eike, to Herlindis and Reinula. The sisters were now consecrated abbesses by the bishops Willibrordus and Bonifacius, and took twelve other virgins into their convent, where they passed their time in good works. Herlindis is said to have written out and illuminated the four gospels and a psalter. She died on Oct. 12, her sister surviving her many years; both are commemorated on March 22. (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 385; Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. iii. i. 607.) [I. G. S.]

HERLINGUS, twenty-first bishop of Meaux, succeeding St. Hildevertus and followed by St. Patusius, towards the close of the 7th century. He may be identical with a Herlingus episcopus, who subscribed a charter of Agilbertus of Le Mans for the monastery of St. Mary, in the eleventh year of Theoderic's reign. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1241 n.; Gall. Christ. viii. 1601.) [S. A. B.]

HERMAEI (Ἑρμαῖος). A Valentinian sect, called from their leader HERMAEUS, and said to have borne anything but a good character (Timoth. Presb. de Recipiend. Haeret.; Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. 17). According to Nico they were also called Basilidae (Ex Niconis Pandecte, ib. 70). [T. W. D.]

HERMAEON (1), bishop of Sais (Sa) on the Nile Delta; mentioned in the Breviarium of Meletius as one of the bishops consecrated by him. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arianos, Patrol. Graec. xxv. 376; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 519.) [J. de S.]

HERMAEON (2), bishop of Cynopolis Inferior (or Cynum), in the Egyptian Delta. He is mentioned in the Breviarium of Meletius as one of the bishops consecrated by him prior to the council of Nicaea. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arianos, Patrol. Graec. xxv. 376; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 567.) [J. de S.]

HERMAEUS, bishop of Balbura, in the ecclesiastical province of Lycia, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 987; Mansi, iii. 571.) [L. D.]

HERMAGORAS—July 12. Reputed to have been a martyr at Aquileia under Nero. He is said to have been appointed bishop of that see by St. Mark the Evangelist, and to have suffered death with Fortunatus, his archdeacon. [Fortunatus.] The reputed acts of the martyr are worthless. Attributing to such an early age the ecclesiastical ideas and arrangements of later times, they demonstrate their own falsity. They profess to have been written by a certain Gregory, out of whom Hermagoras cast a devil. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERMAMMON, a bishop of some part of Egypt. Letters to him "and the brethren in Egypt" from Dionysius of Alexandria, are mentioned or quoted in Eusebius, vii. 1, 10, 23. They treat of the affairs of the emperors Gallus, Valerian, and Gallienus. (Tillemont, iv. pp. 276, 277.) [J. W. S.]

HERMANFBOIZ (Chron. S. Denys. v. 24 in Bouquet, iii. 306 D). [ERMEFRIDUS (2).] [C. H.]

HERMANNUS (HERMIANUS, HERNANUS, HERNIANUS), said by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 351) to have been one of the presbyters addressed by pope John [ERMAN (8)]. There is ascribed to him an Epistola ad Hilarium de Pelagiana haeresi (Tanner, Bibl. 398; Spotswood, Hist. Ch. Scot. 13; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 196, April 2). [J. G.]

HERMAS (1), bishop of Philippopolis in Thracia, reputed to have been the Hermas mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 14. (See Basil. Menolog. Nov. 4.) [J. de S.]

HERMAS (2). In the latter half of the 2nd century there was in circulation a book of visions and allegories, purporting to be written by one Hermas, and which was commonly known as The Shepherd. This book was treated with respect bordering on that paid to the canonical Scriptures of the New Testament, and came into the public reading of different churches. A passage from it is quoted by Irenaeus (iv. 20, p. 253) with the words, "Well said the Scripture," a fact taken notice of by Eusebius (H. E. v. 8). We may with probability infer that in the time of Irenaeus the work was publicly read in the Gallican churches, for if Irenaeus were not quoting a well-known text, he would be likely to have named the source of his quotation; but that he did not place the book on a level with the canonical Scriptures may be inferred from his having quoted it but once, not appealing to it in his discussion of Scripture testimonies in his third book. The mutilated commencement of the Stromateis of Clement of Alexandria opens in the middle of a quotation from The Shepherd, and about ten times elsewhere he cites the book, always with a complete acceptance of the reality and divine character of the revelations made to Hermas, but without any explanation of his opinion who Hermas was or when he lived. In the next generation Origen, who frequently cites the book, says (in Rom. xvi. 14, vol. iv. p. 683) that it seems to him very useful, and he gives it as his individual opinion that it was divinely inspired. He further makes a guess, which was repeated by others after him, but which appears to rest on no earlier authority, that it was written by the Hermas mentioned at the end of the Epistle to the Romans. His other quotations shew that less favourable views of the book were current in his time. His quotations from The Shepherd are carefully separated from those from the canonical books; he generally adds to a quotation from The Shepherd a saving clause, giving the reader permission to reject it; he speaks of it (in Matt. xix. 7, vol. iii. p. 644) as a writing current in the church, but not acknowledged by all, and (De Princ. iv. 11) as a book despised by some. Eusebius (iii. 25) places the book among the orthodox ῥήματα with the Acts of Paul, Revelation of Peter, Epistle of Barnabas, &c. Elsewhere (iii. 3), while he is unable to place it among the ὁμολογουμένα as being rejected by some, he owns that it had been publicly used in churches, that some of the most eminent writers had employed it, and that it was judged by some most necessary for those who have particular need of elementary instruction in the faith. Athanasius, too (Ep. Fest. 39, vol. i. pt. ii. p. 963), classes The Shepherd with some of the deutero-canonical books of the Old Testament and with "The teaching of the apostles," as not canonical, but useful to be employed in catechetical instruction. The Shepherd is found in the Sinaitic MS. following the Epistle of Barnabas, as an appendix to the books of the New Testament. After the 4th century the book rapidly passed out of ecclesiastical use in the East.

The Western tradition as to the book deserves more attention, as internal evidence shews Rome to have been its place of composition. Foremost comes the writer of the MURATORIAN FRAGMENT on the canon, who tells us that the book had been written during the episcopate of Pius by Hermas, a brother of that bishop, a period which the writer speaks of as within then living memory. He concludes that the book ought to be read, but not to be publicly used in the church among the prophetic writings, the number of which was complete, nor among the apostolic. The statement that the book not only might but ought to be read is a high recognition of the value attributed to it by the writer, and we may gather that at least in some places the church use of the book at the time had been such as to cause danger of its being set on a level with the canonical Scriptures. Tertullian, in one of his earliest treatises, De Oratione, disputes against a practice of sitting down immediately after prayer, for which he knows no other reason assigned than that in The Shepherd Hermas is said, on prayer ended, to have sat upon the bed. He points out the unreasonableness of converting a narrative statement into a rule of discipline, and remarks that, if it were so regarded, the precept of sitting on a bed would not be satisfied by sitting on a bench or chair. A book which could so influence the practice of churches must evidently have enjoyed high authority at the time, an authority which Tertullian's argument does not dispute. It had probably been translated into Latin, and was used in church reading. That Tertullian read it in a Latin translation may be inferred from his describing it by the Latin title Pastor, and not by a Greek title, as he usually does when he refers to Greek writings. Very different is Tertullian's treatment of the book some ten years later or more, after he had become a Montanist. When the authority of The Shepherd is urged in behalf of readmitting adulterers to communion, he rejects the book as one not counted worthy of being included in the canon, but placed by every council of the churches, even of the Catholic party, among false and apocryphal writings (De Pudic. cap. 10). Quoting the Epistle to the Hebrews, he says that this is at least more received than that apocryphal Shepherd of the adulterers (cap. 20). The phrase "more received" warns us to take cum grano Tertullian's assertion as to the universal rejection of The Shepherd; but we may well believe that the line of distinction between apostolic and later writings was then being drawn more sharply than it had been before, and that in the interval between Tertullian's two writings The Shepherd was excluded from the public reading of many churches which before had admitted it. Possibly to this result may have contributed the publication by the Muratorian writer of the greatness of the interval which separated Hermas from apostolic times. The statement of this writer is repeated in an entry in the Liberian papal catalogue, that under the episcopate of Pius his brother Ermas wrote a book in which the commands and precepts were contained which the angel gave him when he came to him in the habit of a shepherd. It has been thought, with high probability, that this entry was derived from the catalogue of Hippolytus, which is the basis of the Liberian catalogue. [CHRONICON CANISIANUM.] It will be observed that, while refusing to assign the book to apostolic times, it makes no doubt of the reality of the angelic appearance to Hermas. Later biographical notices of popes undertake to tell what the message given to Hermas was, namely, that Easter should always be celebrated on a Sunday. This notice clearly is the offspring of a time when all knowledge of the book of Hermas had been lost, and when it was attempted to supply by invention the imperfection of the earlier entry. This story of a revelation to Hermas about Easter celebration is amplified a little in the forged decretal letter of Pius I. (Mansi, Concil. i. 672). The later papal catalogues make Pius the brother of Pastor, and another spurious letter of Pius tells of a contemporary presbyter Pastor. The poem of the Pseudo-Tertullian against Marcion had described the brother of Pius as "angelicus Pastor." A confusion between the name of Hermas and that of his book would imply that the book was not at the time in use. Jerome, when copying what Eusebius had said about the book (De Vir. Illust. 10, vol. ii. 845), adds that among the Latins it was almost unknown. He himself speaks contemptuously of it (in Habuc. i. 14, vol. vi. p. 604), for it seems to us certain that the book of Hermas is what he here refers to. It is marked in the Gelasian decree as apocryphal. Notwithstanding, there are several traces that some use of the book continued in the West, one decisive fact being that there still exist some twenty MSS. of the Latin version. In the African church of the 4th century we find from the list in the Codex Claromontanus (Westcott, Canon N. T. p. 557) that it was placed with the Acts of Paul and the Revelation of St. Peter as an appendix to the New Testament books; and it occupies a similar place in the Sinaitic MS., the only Greek Bible known to have contained it. But in some of the existing Latin MSS. it is placed with the apocryphal books of the Old Testament, a position no doubt assigned to it in conformity with the opinion of Athanasius already quoted, which was known through Rufinus in the West.

Turning now from the external history of the book to the book itself, we find it divides itself into three parts. The first part consists of visions. It opens with what reads like the narration of a real dream. Hermas tells that he who had brought him up had sold him to Rome to a lady named Rhoda, that after a considerable time he renewed his acquaintance with her and began to love her as a sister; that he saw her one day bathing in the Tiber and assisted her out of the water; that admiring her beauty he thought within himself how happy he should be if he had a wife like her in person and disposition. Further than this his thought did not go. But a little time after he had a vision. He fell asleep, and in his dream he was walking and struggling in ground so rugged and broken that it was impossible to pass. At length he succeeded in crossing the water by which his path had been washed away, and coming into smooth ground knelt to confess his sins to God. Then the heavens were opened, and he saw Rhoda saluting him from the sky. On his asking her what she did there, she told him that she had been taken up to accuse him, because God was angry with him for having sinned in thought against her. Then Hermas was overwhelmed with horror and fear, not knowing how he could abide the severity of God's judgment, if such a thought as his was marked as sin. Rhoda now passes out of his dream, and he sees a venerable aged lady clad in shining garments sitting on a great white chair and holding a book in her hand. She asks him why he, usually so cheerful, is now so sad. On telling her, she owns what a sin any impure thought would be in one so chaste, so singleminded and so innocent as he; but she tells him that this is not why God is displeased with him, but because of the sins of his children, whom he, through false indulgence, had allowed to corrupt themselves, but to whom repentance was open if he would warn them. Then she reads to him out of her book, but of all she reads he can remember nothing save the last sentence, save that this alone was comforting, and all which preceded was terrible and threatening. She parted from him with the words, "Play the man, Hermas." After reading of the admiration of Hermas for Rhoda, one discovers with some surprise that he is at this time an elderly man with a grown-up family, and that his former mistress Rhoda must have been at least as old as himself. If the tale is an invented one, this is certainly an incongruity; but if it be a true story, it is quite conceivable that the thought may have occurred to Hermas, who seems to have been not happy in his family relations, how much happier it would have been for him if Rhoda had been his wife; and that afterwards, in a dream, this thought may have recurred to his memory as a sin to be repented of. To us, the vision, as he tells it, presents all the characteristics of a real dream; the want of logical connexion between the parts, the changes of scene, the fading out of Rhoda as principal figure and the appearance of the aged lady in her room, and in like manner the substitution of quite a different offence for the sinful thought which weighed on his conscience at the beginning; the physical distress in his sleep at first presenting the idea of walking on and on without being able to find an outlet, afterwards of mental grief at words spoken to him; the long reading which leaves no trace on the memory save of the words spoken immediately before awaking—all these marks indicate that we are reading not a literary invention like the dream of the Pilgrim's Progress, but the recital, a little dressed up it may be, of a dream which the narrator really had had. In another vision, a year after, he saw again the lady and her book, and received the book to copy, but still it conveyed no idea to his mind. He then set himself by fasting and prayer to learn the meaning of it, and after about a fortnight was gratified. He learns, too, that the lady whom he had seen is not, as he had imagined, the sibyl, but the church, and that she appeared as old because she was created first of all, and for her sake the world was made. On this doctrine of the pre-existence of the church, see ECCLÉSIA. The Epistle to the Ephesians, which probably suggested it, is one of the New Testament books of whose use by Hermas there are clear traces. In subsequent visions we have a different account of the matter; he sees in each a woman more and more youthful in appearance, whom he is taught to identify with the church of his former vision; and it is explained that he saw her old at first because the spirit of Christians had been broken by infirmity and doubt, and afterwards more youthful as by the revelations made him their spirit had been renewed. After his first two visions, Hermas watched eagerly for new revelations, and set himself to obtain them by fasting and prayer. In those later visions, while the pictures presented to his mind are such as we can without difficulty believe to have been dream representations, the explanations given of them have a coherence only to be found in the thoughts of a waking man. This is still more true of the second and third parts of the work. At the end of the first part he has the vision in which he sees him who gives the name which in strictness only belongs to these two latter parts of the work, a man dressed like a shepherd, who tells him that he is the angel of repentance, who has come to dwell with him, being the guardian to whose care he had been entrusted. From this shepherd he receives, for the instruction of himself and of the church, the "Commandments," which form the second, and the "Similitudes," which form the third, part of the work. The Shepherd has been compared to the Pilgrim's Progress, and it is in the last part, the "Similitudes," that the likeness is greatest; but these do not form one continued allegory like Bunyan's, but rather resemble the detached emblematic representations exhibited in the Interpreter's House. The Similitudes of Hermas, we may well believe, were suggested by the parables of the New Testament, though it need hardly be said how infinitely below these are the frigid compositions of Hermas, in which the central thought is usually overlaid by uninteresting details.

But the judgment we may form on the literary merits of the work of Hermas is of little importance compared with that of deciding rightly the fundamental question, our determination of which must rule our decision as to the date of the book and some other disputed points, namely, whether the book does not claim to be an inspired document, the writer of which aspires to no literary merit, save that of faithfully recording the revelations made him. When Bunyan says that in a certain place he fell asleep and dreamed a dream, we do not believe, and we do not suppose that he intended us to believe, that all the story which he proceeds to relate actually was presented to his mind in the form of a dream. Are we to suppose that, in like manner, Hermas wished his readers to understand that in relating his visions he intended no more than to present edifying lessons in an allegorical form, and are we to suppose that it was merely in the light of an instructive fiction that the book was regarded when it was introduced into the public reading of the church? As a specimen of the way in which these questions may be answered, we quote Donaldson's argument. He says:—"If the book be not inspired, then either the writer fancied he had seen these visions, or tried to make other people fancy this, or he clothed the work in a fictitious form designedly and undisguisedly. If he did the first, he must have been silly. If he did the second, he must have been an impostor." But as he believes the author to have been "an honest, upright, and thoughtful man," he concludes that he did the third, "as multitudes of others have done after him, with John Bunyan at their head." From this view it follows that we can lay no stress on anything the author tells us about himself and his family. All these details are as likely to be fictitious as the angels, the towers, and the beasts of the visions. We cannot even assume that the writer's name was Hermas, for the narrator of the visions, who bears this name, may have been an imaginary personage. For ourselves, we feel ourselves bound to reject this as altogether mistaken criticism, and as an application to the 2nd century of the standards of the 19th. To us it seems plain that, whatever the author intended, the first readers of Hermas did not receive the book as mere allegorical fiction. Bunsen (Hippolytus and his Age, i. 315) tells us that Niebuhr used to pity the Athenian (sic, Qu. Roman?) Christians for being obliged to listen at their meetings to this "good but dull novel." If the authorities of the church looked on it merely as a novel, would they have inflicted the reading of it on other people? At the end of the century, Clement and others shew no doubt of the reality of the visions. Were the men who lived a couple of generations earlier likely to have been more severe in their judgments, and would an angelic appearance seem to them a thing so incredible that one who had related it would be regarded by them as the narrator of a fiction that he did not intend should be believed? The book itself contains directions to the rulers of the Roman church to send the volume to foreign churches. If we suppose that it really was sent to them stamped as a prophetic writing by the authority of the Roman church, we have an explanation of the consideration, only second to that of the canonical Scriptures, which the book enjoyed in so many distant churches. If the work were supposed to be only an edifying allegory, the place which it occupied in church reading would be quite inexplicable. We must hold then that, of the suppositions stated by Donaldson, that which he has adopted is infinitely the least probable, namely, that the book is undisguised fiction, written without any intention to deceive. A man at the present day might publish a story of visions, and be persuaded that his readers would not take him seriously, but no one in the 2nd century would be entitled to hold such a persuasion, and if the book of Hermas was accepted as inspired, the writer cannot be acquitted of the responsibility of having foreseen and intended this result. Dismissing then Donaldson's third supposition, we fall back on the other two, that the writer was either a fool or an impostor. This is the only alternative considered by Mosheim, de Rebus Christ. ante Const. 163, 166, who holds that the writer must either have been "mente captus et fanaticus," or else that he "scientem volentemque fefellisse," the latter being the opinion to which he inclines, believing that the lawfulness of pious frauds was a fixed opinion with many Christians at the date of the composition we are discussing. We must maintain, however, that it is quite possible to disbelieve in the inspiration of Hermas without imputing folly either to him who made the claim or to those who admitted it. We do not count a young man a fool because he has not learned the lessons which only experience can teach. We must not regard the men of the 2nd century as fools because their views as to God's manner of governing His church were different from those which the experience of so many following centuries has taught us. A Christian cannot regard them as fools for believing that in the time of our Lord and His apostles a great manifestation of the supernatural was made to the world. How long, and to what extent similar manifestations would present themselves in the ordinary life of the church, only experience could shew, and they are not to be scorned though their expectations have not been borne out by the facts. In particular, if we are to set down as fools all who have believed that supernatural intimations may be given in dreams, our list would be a long one, and would include many eminent names. And as for those abnormal mental states which are called not dreams but visions, though modern science may regard them as phenomena admitting a natural explanation, it is not reasonable to expect such a view from the science of the 2nd century. Things impress different minds differently, but to us what Hermas tells of his personal history, and of the times and circumstances of his visions, conveys the impression of artless truth. His information about himself is contained in incidental allusions, which it is not very easy to piece together; and we cannot think that the author of a fictitious narrative would have conveyed so obscurely what he has to tell about the hero of his story. He would be likely also to have made this hero a man of some eminence, holding high church office, whereas the Hermas of this book always speaks of the presbyters as if he were not one of them; and he could have had no motive for representing this hero as one who had been engaged in trade which he had carried on unsuccessfully and not very honestly, and as an elderly married man with a termagant wife and ill brought-up children. On the other hand, if the thing be true history, it is very much to the point that Hermas should get a revelation, directing his wife to keep her tongue in better order, and his children to pay more respect to their parents; nor need we suppose Hermas guilty of any dishonesty in thus turning his gift of prophecy to the advantage of his family comfort; for nothing can be more natural than that the thoughts which no doubt had often occurred to him in his waking moments should present themselves to him again in his visions. We have already said that there is nothing incredible in the supposition that the pictures of the first vision did present themselves to the mind of Hermas as he relates them. They must have been very vivid, and have impressed him strongly. Still it is a year before he has another vision. Then he sees the lady and her chair again. After this he begins to fast and pray and look out eagerly for more revelations, and it is not wonderful to read that he soon has more visions on the subjects which have now come completely to occupy his mind. Finally he comes to believe himself to be under the constant guardianship of the shepherd angel of repentance, and he ascribes all the lessons he desires to teach to the inspiration of this heavenly monitor. This is the part of his work which it is hardest to clear from the charge of conscious deception, and probably he cannot be completely cleared. But perhaps his language expresses no more than his belief in the divine inspiration under which he wrote, for elsewhere he states that he does not regard the personages of his visions as having objective reality, and those things which in the earlier part are represented as spoken to him by the Church are afterwards said to have been spoken by God's Spirit under the form of the Church. That he sincerely believed himself to be the bearer of a divine message appears to us to be the case. In fact, we might give a summary of his convictions which would serve also for those of a man in many respects very unlike, Savonarola, (a) that the church of his time had corrupted itself, and had become deeply tainted with worldliness; (b) that a time of great tribulation was at hand, in which the dross should be purged away; (c) that there was still an intervening time, during which repentance was possible, and would be accepted; (d) that he was himself divinely commissioned to be a preacher of that repentance.

We are now in a position to discuss the date and authorship of the book, concerning which antiquity furnishes authority for three suppositions: (a) the author was the Hermas to whom a salutation is sent at the end of the Epistle to the Romans; (b) he was brother to Pius who was bishop of Rome at the middle of the 2nd century;

(c) he was contemporary with Clement who was bishop at the very beginning of the century or at the end of the preceding. The first may be set aside as a mere guess of Origen's, and a highly improbable one. It has been conjectured, however (as, for instance, by Hilgenfeld), that the author wished his book to pass for the work of this Hermas, and Lipsius has combined this with supposition (b), holding that the author really was Hermas, the brother of Pius, but that he wished to pass for the apostolic Hermas. This may be pronounced a most improbable combination. A man forging a book which he wishes to pass as the work of a former age does not usually put his own name to it. When this Hermas published his work, he either let his contemporaries know who wrote it or he did not. If he did not, the tradition that he was brother of Pius is worth nothing; if he did, he could not expect to be taken for a contemporary of the apostles. The book itself shows no trace that the author wished to be taken for the apostolic Hermas. In fact, he distinctly speaks of the apostles as in his time all dead. A forger could easily have found many names better suited to his purpose than Hermas, one of the least prominent of Scripture names, and of which, except in connexion with this book, there is no trace in ecclesiastical tradition. If the view taken in the preceding paragraphs be correct, the author had no motive for antedating his work. His prophecy announced tribulation close at hand, and only a short intervening period for repentance. To represent such a prophecy as being at the time fifty or one hundred years old would be to represent it as having failed, and in fact The Shepherd did lose its credit when it had been so long in existence. Hermas seems to have thought that, if the worldliness of the church could be repented of and reformed, it would be possible to keep it pure during the brief remainder of its existence. He announced therefore forgiveness on repentance for sins of old Christians prior to the date of his revelation, but none for those of new converts, or for sins subsequent to his revelation. It is inconceivable he could be so stupid as to defeat his own purpose by dating his revelation fifty years back, and so making the message inapplicable to all those whom he addressed. Again the acceptance of the book by the church of Rome is inexplicable if it were introduced by no known person, containing, as it does, not, like the book of Elchasai, revelations purporting to have been made in a remote country, but alleged to have been given among themselves, and to a leading member of their church. If the first readers of the work of Elchasai or of the Clementine homilies put the natural question, Why did we never hear of these things before? these books had provided an answer in the fiction that the alleged authors had only communicated them under a pledge of strict secrecy; in this book, on the contrary, Hermas is directed (Via. iii. 8) to go after three days and speak in the hearing of all the saints the words he had heard in his vision. Elsewhere he enables us to understand how this direction could be carried out. We learn (Mand. 11) that certain persons were then recognised in the church as having prophetic gifts, and that at the Christian meetings for worship, if after prayer ended one of them were filled with the Holy Spirit, he might speak unto the people as the Lord willed. It seems to us then that the simplest explanation how the Roman church came to believe in the inspiration of the book we are considering is that it had previously admitted the inspiration of its author, that he held the position of a recognised prophet as in the East did Quadratus and Ammia of Philadelphia (Euseb. H. E. v. 16), and that he really did publicly deliver in the church assembly the message with which he states he was commissioned. As the 2nd century went on, the public exercise of prophetic powers in the church seems to have ceased, and when it was revived by Montanus and his followers, it had to encounter much opposition. The controversy that ensued induced the church to insist more strongly on the distinction between the inspiration of the writers of the canonical books of Scripture and that of holy men of later times, and the Muratorian fragment exhibits the feeling entertained towards the end of the century that the list of prophetic writings had been closed, and that no production of the then later years of the church could be admitted into it.

Having arrived at the conclusion that the Hermas of The Shepherd is not a fictitious character, but a real person, who was known in the church of Rome in the 2nd century, we have next to settle the question, Are we to place him in the middle of the century under Pius or at the very beginning under Clement? First, we would remark that this is a question on which arguments drawn from the doctrinal characteristics of the book can yield only precarious conclusions. We have no independent trustworthy source of information as to the development of doctrine and ritual in the Roman church during the first half of the 2nd century; so that, if we choose to say that it is credible that this or that development should be found in the year 140, and not credible that it had existed in 110, such an assertion must rest solely on our subjective theories, and not on scientific knowledge. Thus Westcott (N. T. Canon, p. 196) gives as a proof of late date the mention of the "stations" (Sim. v.). We must ask what knowledge is possible to us of the date when weekly fasts were instituted in the Roman church, or when the name "stations" was given to them. Corresponding questions might be asked with reference to all the other indications noted by Westcott in the same place, or by others. And in particular the same objection may be urged if conclusions as to the date of The Shepherd are drawn from the state of church government indicated by it. For ourselves, although the impression which the book makes on us is in favour of an early date, yet, if any good external evidence could be produced that the book is as late even as 150 or as early even as 100, there is nothing in the teaching of the book which would entitle us to reject it, knowing so little as we do of the progress of doctrine during the interval. Turning, then, to the external evidence, the highest respect is due to the fact that at Rome, where a true tradition was most likely to be found, it was believed at the beginning of the 3rd century that Hermas and the bishop Pius had been brothers. This belief, however, may have been ultimately derived from the statement of the Muratorian writer. The credit to which a witness is entitled is proportionate to the amount of care he habitually takes to make no statement without sufficient evidence. In the case of an anonymous writer, known only by a solitary fragment, we have no means of estimating what this amount may be; and therefore the provisional assent we give to him is liable to be withdrawn when we find good reason to believe him to be in error. Such reason is in this case afforded by the statement of the book itself, that Hermas was instructed, as soon as the revelations should be completed, to send two copies of them, one to Clement for transmission to foreign churches, the other to Grapte to be used in admonishing the widows and orphans. Notwithstanding the respect with which the idea is entertained by Westcott (Canon, p. 196), we cannot seriously discuss Origen's suggestion (Philocal. i. 11) that these names are only intended to have a mystical meaning. Origen finds that Grapte and Clement denote the literal and spiritual methods of interpretation. Only a few degrees less improbable is the supposition of Donaldson and Harnack that Clement is a real person, but not the Clement who wrote the Epistle to the Corinthians. It is no doubt possible, but it is extremely unlikely, that within a comparatively few years of the writing of that letter there should be another Clement whose function it also was to communicate on behalf of the church of Rome with foreign churches, but who has left in ecclesiastical history no trace of his existence. We conclude then that the Clement in question is he who is counted one of the first bishops of Rome, and then it must follow that, if Hermas was a real man at all, he must have been his contemporary. It is immaterial whether we can maintain the perfect veracity of Hermas, or whether we are bound to take his word that he received a divine message for Clement, or that he delivered it to him; still, if the book did not drop down from the clouds, but was communicated to the church of Rome by a real man, who told his contemporaries that he had been instructed to communicate his vision to Clement, we must suppose him to be mad or them to be fools, if we put his date so late that Clement must have died before he was born or while he was a child. On these grounds we hold that even the respectably attested tradition about Pius must be rejected if it is inconsistent with allowing Hermas to have been contemporary with Clement. It is not absolutely impossible to combine the two suppositions if we assume that Hermas was considerably older than Pius, and published his visions not during his brother's episcopate, but twenty years earlier or more, and perhaps also if we place the death of Clement somewhat later than in the common reckoning. But, as after every allowance made, this puts a strain on the chronology, we prefer to believe that Pius really had an eminent brother named Pastor, whose identification with the Shepherd of Hermas was a rash combination of the Muratorian writer. Zahn, whom we follow in relying more on the connexion with Clement than on that with Pius, places The Shepherd about A.D. 97; but it seems to us that if we assign that date to the epistle of Clement, we ought to allow a few years for that letter to have obtained the celebrity and success which the notice in Hermas implies. That notice need not necessarily have been published in the lifetime of Clement, for Her-mas is not instructed to deliver his message immediately, but only after the completion of his revelations, and this may be supposed to have been after Clement's death.

We may next examine whether any of the indications of date to be found in the book are inconsistent with the early date we have assigned, only premising that, as Lipsius, who holds fast to the Pius tradition, still feels himself obliged to place The Shepherd in the very first years of Pius (i.e. the accession of Pius at earliest 139, The Shepherd about 142), so we may expect that, when the Pius tradition is discarded, a still earlier date may be found admissible.

(a) The Mention of Grapte.—This mention would have been unmeaning unless she were known to have been a contemporary of Clement; but however well known such a woman might be in her lifetime, her reputation would not be likely to survive long after her death.

(b) Montanism.—There is much affinity between the leading ideas of Montanism and of the book of Hermas. In both the difficulties were strongly felt that arose from the facts that the church, which was in its ideal an assembly of holy men, actually included many unworthy of the name of saints, and that many who had been baptized for the remission of sins had sinned wilfully since they had come to a knowledge of the truth. The question was asked, Was it possible to renew such again to repentance? In both our Lord's second coming was eagerly looked forward to, and in both a knowledge of God's coming dealings with His church was sought for from visions and revelations. But it did not need that a century should pass since Christ's death before the pressure made itself felt of the difficulties we have referred to; and on examination we find that the answers given by Hermas are quite independent of Montanism, and have all the marks of being earlier. We have already remarked on the much greater willingness in the church to accept prophetic pretensions in the time of Hermas than in the age of Montanism. The Montanists refused restoration to gross offenders; Hermas offered complete forgiveness (to be had, however, only once) for the worst of sins. He will not allow the husband of an adulteress to marry again, because she might repent; in that case she ought to be taken back. To abstain from a second marriage was a duty with the Montanists; with Hermas it was a counsel of perfection—meritorious if followed, but which might be disregarded without sin. The Montanists added to the fasts of the church; Hermas does not make fasting a matter of obligation, and he insists on the spirit in which it shall be observed, directing that it shall not be mere self-discipline, but made useful to others by giving in charity the cost of the meal saved by abstinence. In these and in other respects the teaching of Hermas is less rigorous than the Montanistic, and all that is special to Montanism is unknown to him.

(c) Gnosticism.—Her-mas directs his efforts almost exclusively to combating the relaxation of morality in the church; he scarcely notices doctrinal errors. The only thing to be found in the book which seems to refer to a point of teaching is that it would appear from

Sim. v. 7, which ought to be compared with a passage probably derived from it (2 Clem. 9), that there were some who took licence to misuse the flesh on account of a denial of the resurrection of the body. But the false teachers noticed by Hermas seem to have been all in the church, not separate from it. In the passage which seems most distinctly to refer to Gnostics (Sim. ix. 22), they are described as "wishing to know everything and knowing nothing," as "praising themselves that they have understanding, and wishing to be teachers, though they were really fools." Yet he adds, "to these repentance is open, for they were not wicked, but rather silly and without understanding." We have reason to believe that the seeds of Gnosticism had begun to spring up even in apostolic times; but we cannot think that Hermas would have written as he did after Gnosticism had become a dangerous enemy to the Roman church. Irenaeus (iii. 4) dates the coming of Valentinus and Cerdo to Rome in the episcopate of Hyginus, the bishop before Pius, about A.D. 135. It is therefore reasonable to believe that the work of Hermas was earlier. We might also argue, from the language of Hermas concerning the pre-existence of the church, that he must have been ignorant of the Aeons of Valentinus. We have used this argument (Vol. I. p. 558) to infer that the so-called second epistle of Clement was anterior to Valentinus. We should gain an argument à fortiori for the antiquity of Hermas if we could rely on some indications that the Clementine author was acquainted with the work of Hermas, but we cannot venture to lay stress on this argument.

(d) Church Government.—Nothing interferes more with the historical use of early writers than reading them in the light of modern controversies of which these writers were not thinking. It is natural to think that, if parity of presbyters was the church's original rule, the government of a single head could not have been established without some resistance on the part of those who were dispossessed of their equal authority. An exception to the almost total silence of church history as to such resistance has been supposed to be found in the language in which Hermas rebukes the strifes for precedence among Christians, (Vis. iii. 9; Mand. ix.; Sim. viii. 7.) Although it might be supposed that, if the Muratorian writer could truly speak of the episcopate of Pius as his own time, he would be less likely to mistake as to the constitution of the church at that time, than as to the date of the publication of a work supposed to have appeared at the beginning of that episcopate, the same persons who take the word of the fragmentist that Hermas was a brother of Pius disbelieve his assertion that Pius then occupied the chair of the Roman church. Their theory is that, up to that time, parity of presbyters had prevailed; that Pius was but a leading presbyter, whose attempts to fix himself in a position of permanent precedence called forth resistance from the other presbyters, and gave occasion for the rebukes of his own brother. All this theory seems to us quite chimerical, and the language of Hermas, it looked at without any preconceived theory as to church government, admits of a much simpler explanation. It is equally difficult to find in Hermas evidence of the existence of the episcopal form of government or of resistance to its introduction. He appears to use the word ἐπίσκοπος as synonymous with πρεσβύτερος, and he always speaks of the government of the church as in the hands of the elders, without giving any hint that one elder enjoyed authority over the others. The only thing looking that way is that Clement is recognised as the organ by which the church of Rome communicated with foreign churches; but whether this implied a like pre-eminence in domestic rule, we are not told. Similarly, though we infer that the presbyters had seats of honour in the church assemblies, we are not told that one had a seat higher than the rest. Either it was not the case or it was too much a matter of course to be mentioned. But a message on the subject of dissensions is sent τοῖς προηγουμένοις τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ τοῖς πρωτοκαθεδρίταις. It is a very forced explanation of the last plural noun to suppose it means some one of the προηγούμενοι who desired to make himself the first, nor have we any reason to think that the word implies any sarcasm. It is more natural to understand that besides the presbyters there were others who in church assemblies were given seats of honour. Who these were, we may gather from other passages. We find (Mand. xi.) that one who claims to be a prophet is represented as sitting on a "cathedra," while his hearers sit before him on a "subsellium." Again, in the first vision the church, when she reads her book, sits on a cathedra. We may infer that such a seat was the prerogative of teachers. We find also from Mand. xi. that prophets were allowed to speak in the church assemblies; and the direction to Hermas himself to read his book with the presbyters, seems plainly to refer to a public reading in the presence of the congregation. We are thus led to the conclusion that, besides the presbyters there were lay preachers, who, as having a gift of prophecy, were allowed to address the church assemblies, and in that capacity were given seats of honour. But as these held no permanent official position, their claims would probably be ill-defined, and disputes on the subject were very likely to arise. This was a question in which Hermas was personally far more interested than in disputes concerning priority among presbyters. We may gather from his discovery (Vis. iii. 10, 13), that a subsellium is a firmer and better seat than a cathedra, that his own claim to a cathedra had not been admitted; and the authorities of the Roman church may reasonably have hesitated to place in the teacher's chair a pious visionary, neither well read in Scripture nor accurately instructed in doctrine.*

* The perverse ingenuity of commentators has also extracted the sentiments of Hermas about episcopacy and about the propriety of paying the clergy from a passage, intelligible enough in its obvious meaning, in which he contrasts the false prophet and the true. "The false prophet sets up as a soothsayer, receives persons who consult him in private, undertakes to answer their questions, and takes money for doing so. Sometimes his answers are correct, for the devil uses him as his instrument to deceive the righteous. He shuns the public assemblies of the righteous for prayer; there his earthly spirit deserts him, and he is unable to speak when not questioned. Not so the true prophet, who speaks not in private, or when man wishes him to speak, but in the public assemblies, when the angel of

(e) The Subintroductae.—A passage (Sim. ix. 11) has been supposed to indicate an acquaintance by Hermas with the abuse denoted by this word, and if the passage censured this abuse, the inference might be just; but since it encourages it, the inference is quite the other way. We have already expressed our willingness to believe in a general way that Hermas had some such visions or dreams as he records. Without doubting his account that he was a man of great continence, we must observe that women ran very much in his head. In this vision he sees twelve virgins who, it is explained, allegorically represent the Christian virtues. They keep him with them, and kiss him; he feels himself become a young man again, sports and dances with them, and when they lie down on the ground for the night, by their direction he lies down with them; but, it is said he was with them as a brother, not as a husband. The explanation is so necessary to save the purity of the narrator that no inference can be drawn from its having been added, except that the story would never have been told if the abuse had existed at the time which this tale had a tendency to countenance.

(f) Persecutions of the Church.—From the account given of the worldliness and love of riches of many of the Christian community at the time, we may infer that the church had enjoyed a good deal of quiet, but this quiet had evidently been broken by many harassing persecutions, in which some had apostatized. Usually the danger which had terrified them is described as no more than of loss of goods and of injury to worldly business; but there have been (though perhaps not recently) martyrs who have given their lives and have endured crosses and wild beasts for the name of the Son of God. What concerns us most is that they could have saved themselves by denial or by committing idolatry. Thus it appears that they suffered as Christians, and it has been inferred that the date must be later than the well-known letter of Trajan to Pliny which first made the profession of Christianity unlawful. Yet it seems possible to assign an earlier date as well to The Shepherd as to the First Epistle of Peter, which is affected by the same argument, when we remember that Trajan did no more than give imperial sanction to the rule on which Pliny had been acting already, and on which others had probably been acting previously; for Pliny, who begins by saying that he had never before been present at any trials of Christians, implies that they were then a well-known thing. And it may be argued that after the edict of Trajan obstinate profession of Christianity was liable to be punished with death, whereas in the time of Hermas it seems to have been punished only by fine or imprisonment. Hermas himself, who had been originally in trade, lost his business in the persecution, having been betrayed, it would seem, by his children. At the time of the visions he seems to have been employed in cultivating a farm. Zahn, who places the persecution under Domitian, ingeniously conjectures the prophetic spirit moves him to speak. The true prophet is meek and humble, and simple in his manner of life; not ambitious of the first place, impudent, talkative, and fond of luxury, like the false prophet." Compare Euseb. H. E. v. 18.

(p. 133) that Hermas was one of those victims of the tyranny of Domitian to whom, as Dion Cassius tells (68, 2), Nerva made restitution by giving land instead of the goods of which they had been despoiled.

If the view taken in this article be correct, that we have in the work of Hermas an authentic specimen of the teaching of one of those who were recognised in the Christian church as prophets at the beginning of the 2nd century, it is disappointing to be obliged to add that the book is not one which an ordinary Christian of the present day would much care to read either for amusement or edification, and that the historical student finds much less light thrown by it than might have been expected on the questions in which he is interested. Hermas himself is altogether absorbed in trying to bring about a practical reform; he shews much less interest in questions of doctrine, in which possibly as a layman he might not have been accurately instructed; he never quotes the Scriptures either of the Old or New Testament, nor is his language much influenced by Scripture phraseology, and there are those who would describe Hermas as having preached not the Gospel, but a "fussionless screed of dry morality." The inference was natural, if Pauline Christianity is so much in the background in Hermas, he must have been an anti-Pauline Jewish Christian; and this inference may seem to be confirmed by the fact that the New Testament book which has most stamped itself on the mind of Hermas is the Epistle of St. James. Yet a closer examination finds no real trace of Judaism in Hermas. It is scarcely credible that one who had been brought up a Jew should seem so unfamiliar with the Old Testament.^b The Jewish nation and its privileges are not even mentioned; there is nothing about the distinction between Jew and gentile, and in fact a reader of Hermas would not discover that the Jewish nation had ever existed. Michael is not the guardian angel of that nation, but of the Christian church. Once where the phrase "twelve tribes" occurs, it turns out to mean not the Jewish tribes, but twelve nations into which the whole human race is classified; as for imposing on gentile Christians any Mosaic ordinances, Hermas does not shew any knowledge that such a thing had ever been thought of. Indeed, the morality of Hermas is singularly free from formalism. For the new forgiveness of sins which he announces, he requires as conditions no ceremonial washings as in the book of Elchasai, no penances, no increased rigour of fasting, no formal absolution, nothing but repentance and reformation. Baptism is the only church rite on which he insists; that he counts so essential that he believes that the holy men of the old dispensation received baptism from the apostles in the under world; fasting he uses, but attributes to it no exaggerated value; he does not even cross himself when venturing to pass the terrible beast in a scene like that of ^b The contrast is striking if we compare the fulness of Old Testament quotation in Clement's epistle with the scantiness in Hermas. Harnack gives a list of seven passages which seem to shew acquaintance with the Old Testament. Four of these relate to passages quoted in New Testament books which seem to have been read by Hermas; the other three are doubtful.

Christian venturing past the lions at the gate of the House Beautiful. The doctrine of Hermas concerning the person and work of the Son of God is entirely Christian. The Son of God is older than all creation, and was a fellow councillor with the Father in the work of creation. He is the rock on which the church is built, His name the only gate by which any can enter into the kingdom of God. Even the most glorious angels cannot enter unto God apart from Him. (Sim. ix. 12.) It has indeed been contended that, because Hermas speaks of six chief angels, and the Ebionite systems of seven, Hermas means that the Son of God should be thought of but as an angel, the chief over the six. But this combination is altogether unwarranted, and depends on the quite groundless assumption that Hermas has any affinity with Ebionism. The number seven is nowhere employed in the imagery of Hermas; on the contrary, the angels are twelve, consisting of six principal and six subordinate. Hermas tells of the toil and suffering which the Son of God underwent to purge away the sins of His people, and of the reward which He receives in the exaltation of His human nature and in His joy at receiving His purified people into union with Himself. It has been questioned whether Hermas distinguishes the personality of the Holy Spirit from that of the pre-existent Son of God. We ourselves are disposed to agree with Zahn (p. 261) that he does; but there is room for doubt, arising from the fact that in the Similitudes of Hermas, as well as in other parables, there may be a difference of opinion what things belong to the framework of the parable and what are intended to be symbolical. Bull (Def. Fid. Nic. 1, 2), vindicates the language of Hermas, but if it should appear that Hermas had not made the doctrine in question the subject of scientific thought, we have only another proof of the early date of his work.

The only express quotation in Hermas is from the lost apocryphal book of Eldad and Medad. Of his Old Testament allusions, we have spoken already. His use of either Old or New Testament not being indicated by formal quotation, but only by coincidences of language or thought, there is room for difference of opinion as to his use of particular books. The proofs of the use of the Epistle of James and of that to the Ephesians seem to us absolutely decisive. Only a little less strong are the proofs of the use of the First Epistle of Peter and of the First to the Corinthians. There are other New Testament books of his use of which we are ourselves persuaded, though we admit that the evidence is not conclusive. Among these we mention in particular both the Gospel and Revelation of St. John. We believe also that the knowledge of sayings of our Lord which Hermas unmistakably exhibits was obtained from our synoptic Gospels, the coincidences with St. Mark (see Zahn, p. 457) being most striking.

Where Hermas had lived before he was sold to Rome is a point on which we can only conjecture. According to a reading which there seems no good ground to question, he supposes himself in one of his visions to have been transported to Arcadia, and Mr. Mahaffy reports (Rambles in Greece, p. 330, 2nd ed.), that the scenery that he describes is such as may be witnessed in Arcadia, and is not to be seen in the neigh-Bourhood of Rome. Zahn founds a conjecture that Hermas was born in Egypt on the resemblance between the architectural character of the tower of Hermas's visions, and the description given by Josephus of the Jewish temple in the Egyptian Heliopolis.

Translations.—We have already spoken of the probability that a Latin translation of The Shepherd existed in the time of Tertullian. Harnack is of opinion that the present received Latin translation dates from the middle of the 2nd century, relying amongst other arguments on the fact that in one place where we have ἐπίσκοποι in the Greek, the Latin has "episcopi id est praesides ecclesiarum," an explanation which would not be required except at a very early date. It has been questioned whether our Greek text is not a translation from the Latin. No argument in support of this opinion can be founded on the Latinisms in the Greek text, since they are sufficiently accounted for by the fact that the author lived at Rome. The hypothesis of a double original seems not unworthy of consideration. Hermas was directed to make two copies of his book. That the one which was to be sent to foreign churches must have been written in Greek may be taken for granted; in what language was that written which Grapte was to read to the widows and orphans at Rome? A second Latin translation, clearly different from the Vulgate text, was published by Dressel from a Codex Palatinus. Harnack (p. lxxv) produces proof of the use of this version in the 6th century. How much earlier it was cannot be determined; but it is generally agreed that it is later than the Vulgate, and Harnack is of opinion that the older version was employed in making the new translation. More recently an Ethiopic version has been discovered, which was published in 1860. The transcriber has a note maintaining that the author of The Shepherd was the apostle Paul. He relies on Acts xiv. 12, which he quotes in the form that the Lycaonians called "Silas" Zeus, and Paul Hermes. Until quite modern times, The Shepherd was only known to the West by the Latin translation. In 1856 the first edition of the Greek text was printed by Anger and Dindorf. It was founded ultimately on a MS. found at Mount Athos, of which Simonides brought three leaves to Leipzig, and a transcript of the rest; but this edition was spoiled by the bad faith of Simonides, who at first sold a copy which he had corrupted by a number of emendations of his own. An independent source for the Greek text has been obtained in the Sinaitic MS., which, as has been said, includes the work of Hermas. Besides these there have been employed the quotations of Clement of Alexandria, copious unacknowledged quotations by Pseudo-Athanasius (Doct. ad Antioch. Migne, Pat. Gr. xxviii. 555), separately published by Dindorf, Leipzig, 1857; and similar quotations by Antiochus Monachus, a writer of the 7th century (Pat. Gr. lxxxix. 1415, concerning whom see Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. Harles, x. 500). From these sources Hermas has been edited by Hilgenfeld (Nov. Test. ext. Can. Rec. 1866), and by Gebhardt and Harnack (Patres Apostolici, 1877). The latter edition we count so indispensable to the student that, as it contains a full list of editions, and of works treating of Hermas, we think it needless to transcribe what the reader will have in his hands. Only we mention Zahn, Der Hirte des Hermas, 1868, as the work from which we have learned most. Since Gebhardt's edition Hermas has been edited by Funk (Pat. Apost. Tübingen, 1878.) Some interesting discussion is also to be found in the reviews of Gebhardt's edition, among which we mention that by Overbeck (Schürer, Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1878), by Donaldson in Theological Review, 1878, and by Zahn, Göttingen gelehrte Anzeigen, 1878.

Hermenigild and Recared were the sons of Leovigild's first wife (Joh. Bicl. apud Esp. Sagr. vi. 378), who was already dead in 569, in which year the king married Goisvintha, the widow of his predecessor Athanagild. The dates of the princes' births are unknown (? 560-62), but it is plain from Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. v. 39, that Hermenigild was the elder of the two brothers. In 573, immediately after the conquest of Saboria in Leovigild's first northern campaign, both sons were made "consortes regni" (Joh. Bicl. l. c. For remarks on the circumstances and meaning of this step, see art. LEOVIGILD). Thenceforward, up to 579, the Spanish sources give no information of Hermenigild. Between the two dates of 573 and 579, however, most probably between 573 and 575 (conf. Greg. Tur. iv. 38), Hermenigild was betrothed to Ingunthis, the daughter of Sigibert of Rheims and Brunihild, and grand-daughter, therefore, of Brunihild's mother, Goisvintha (q. v.), Leovigild's second wife and Hermenigild's step-mother. In 579 (Joh. Bicl. l. c. 381), Ingunthis, then twelve years old, reached Spain, and in the same year, owing to dissensions between the Catholic Frankish princess and her Arian grandmother (see art. INGUNTHIS), Leovigild sent the newly married pair to a distance, assigning to Hermenigild the government of Baetica, or a portion of it, with Seville for a capital (Jo. Bicl. l. c.). Here later in the same year (conf. Görres, Kritische Untersuch. über den Aufstand und das Martyrium des Westgoth. Königssohnes Hermenigild, in Zeitschrift für Hist. Theol. 1873, i. note 83; Dahn, Kön. der Germ. v. 137, gives 580 as the year,) Hermenigild renounced Arianism, was confirmed in the Catholic faith by Leander the Catholic metropolitan of Seville, and took the name of Joannes (Greg. Tur. v. 39; Greg. Magn. Dial. iii. 31; Paul. Diac. iii. 21). This important step was immediately followed by the rebellion of Hermenigild (Joh. Bicl. l. c.), who shortly afterwards formed a close alliance with the Byzantines in the south, and with the recently catholicized Suevi in the north, i.e. with the two most formidable enemies of his father's state and power (conf. Dahn, v. 138). Thus the struggle shaped itself as a conflict of confessions and nationalities, of Arianism and Catholicism, of Goth and Roman, although Leovigild had adherents among the provincials, and Hermenigild counted some Gothic partisans. (Dahn, v. 140.)

From 580 to 582 Leovigild was occupied in various measures of precaution and preparation (see art. LEOVIGILD), and it was not till the end of 582 that he felt himself strong enough to attack his son. Late in 582 or early in 583, Merida, which we may suppose to have been the most northerly of Hermenigild's towns, was conquered (Greg. Tur. vi. 18), and the siege of Seville followed immediately. Towards the end of 583 or the beginning of 584, Hermenigild escaped from the beleaguered city (possibly at the same time Leander went to ask help from Constantinople; see art. LEANDER) and took refuge with the Byzantines at Cordova, which, after having been subdued by Leovigild in 572, had declared for Hermenigild, and invited a Greek garrison. Seville fell in 584 (Joh. Bicl. l. c. p.

383), and shortly afterwards Hermenigild was captured in or near Cordova, the Byzantine prefect having been bribed to give up both the town and the fugitive to the father (Greg. Tur. v. 39, vi. 43; Joh. Bicl. p. 383). He was deprived of the government of Baetica, and, in all probability, of his claim to the succession (Joh. Bicl.'s regno privatur appears to cover both penalties), and was sent an exile to Valencia. In the following year (585), "Hermenigildus in Urbe Tarraconensi a Sisberto interficitur" (Joh. Bicl. 384). This is all the notice that the abbat of Biclaro, our best source, gives to the fact. Isidore does not mention the death of Hermenigild at all. Gregory of Tours mentions it drily in passing as one of the causes of Guntchramn's attack upon Septimania (Hist. Fr. viii. 28; "Leuvichildus vero Herm. filium suum—morti tradidit"). Upon the account given by Gregory the Great alone, therefore (Dial. iii. 31), rests the claim of Hermenigild to be considered not as a rebel suffering the too harsh penalty of a political crime, but as a martyr for the Catholic faith. According to the pope, Hermenigild, after a painful imprisonment, "in ciliciis vinculatus jacens," was beheaded on the night of Easter Sunday, by his father's "apparitores," because he had refused to receive the sacrament from the hands of an Arian bishop, "atque per hoc ad patris gratiam redire mereretur." After the execution, miracles were not wanting to substantiate the martyr's claim to veneration: "For in the silence of the night, the sound of psalmody began to be heard around the body of the king and martyr, truly king because truly martyr." His body, therefore, "ut videlicet martyria, jure cunctis fidelibus venerari debuisset." In his grave, also, according to Gregory, were laid the foundations of Visigothic Catholicism. For after Leovigild's death, his son Recared "non patrem perfidum sed fratrem martyrem sequens" was converted by Leander and led over the whole people of the Visigoths to the true faith. Nor was it wonderful that he should become a preacher of the true faith, since he was the brother of a martyr, whose merits helped him in his task of leading back so many souls to the bosom of Almighty God. Nothing of this could have been done if Hermenigild had not died. Thus, one of the Visigothic race died that many might live, and while one grain of wheat had fallen to the ground, "seges multa surrexit."

In the face of this apparent conflict between Gregory's testimony and the silence of the Spanish source, modern opinion has always been much divided as to Hermenigild's martyrdom. It is plain that neither to Joh. Biclarensis, his contemporary and a victim also of his father's Arian persecution, nor to Isidore, Leander's younger brother, nor even to Gregory of Tours, did Hermenigild appear in the light of a martyr for Catholicism. "Tyrannus" and "rebellis" are the words used of him by Joannes; Isidore follows the same line: "deinde filium suum tyrannizantem imperiis suis obsessum exasperavit," and again in the Hist. Suev. "rebellem filium." Another Spanish testimony is more striking still. Paul of Merida, a writer of the 7th century (Mabillon, Ann. Ord. Sancti Bened. i. 72, dates the De Vit. et Mir. Patrum Emeritensium about 633), whose record of the bishops of Merida was avowedly suggested by the Dialogues of Gregory the Great, thus transforms the passage from the Dialogues, already quoted :

Greg. M. Dial. 3, 31.

"Post cuius (Leovigildi) mortem Recaredus rex non patrem perfidum sed fratrem martyrem sequens, ab Arianæ hæresis pravitate conversus est."

Paul. Emerit. cap. 16.

"Post cuius crudellissimam mortem Recaredus Princeps &c. qui non patrem perfidum sed Christum Dominum sequens, ab Arianæ hæresis pravitate conversus est."

This writer's fanatical hatred of Leovigild is visible in every page of his life of bishop Masona (q. v.). Had Hermenigild really died a martyr's death, what motive could have induced this assailant of his Arian father to thus implicitly deny a fact so useful to one of his main purposes? To these passages from the Spanish sources we have also to add the striking and often quoted words of Gregory of Tours, whose sympathy with the Catholicism of Hermenigild and Ingunthis is, of course, beyond question: "Hermenigildus—patrem ad se venire cum exercitu, cognovit, consiliumque iniit, qualiter venientem aut repelleret aut necaret, nesciens miser, iudicium sibi imminere dirinum, qui contra genitorem quamlibet hæreticum talia cogitaret."

We are naturally led in this state of the evidence to examine more closely the genesis and character of St. Gregory's narrative. The Dialogue in question was written about 594 (Görres, l. c. p. 13, note 38). The sources of it appear to have been—for the fact and immediate causes of the conversion, the testimony of Leander received at Constantinople, between the year 583 and 586 [see art. LEANDER]—for Hermenigild's death on the other hand, the witness of unnamed Spanish emigrants, in all probability exiles belonging to the political party of Hermenigild (sicut multorum, qui ab Hispaniarum partibus veniunt relatione cognovimus, &c.). The account entirely passes over the political circumstances under which Hermenigild met his death. There is no mention whatever of war or rebellion. No names of localities or persons beyond those of Leander and the father and sons are given, and immediately upon the conversion follow imprisonment and death. Whereas we know that between the conversion and Hermenigild's capture at Cordova five years elapsed of incessant military or diplomatic action on the part of both father and son. The miracles following the martyrdom, and the extremely improbable story of Leovigild's remorse and repentant recommendation of Leander to Recared [see art. LEOVIGILD] increase the unhistorical aspect of the whole. Nevertheless in the course of time Gregory's narrative won complete ascendancy, and upon it was founded the canonization, which a thousand years later was accorded to the tyrannus and rebellis of the Spanish sources.

Various explanations have been offered of the attitude of the Spanish reporters towards Hermenigild. Aguirre declared positively that the passages in question had been mutilated by Arians (Conc. Hisp. Coll. Max. i. 422), an opinion shared by the Spanish antiquary Joseph Perez (see quotation in Arevalo, Isid. Op. i. 422). Arevalo, however (l. c.), has long ago disposed of these assertions, as of certain other explanations and harmonizations put forward by Nicolas Antonio (Bibl. Vetus, lib. v. cap. 4, 134). The editor of Isidore suggested in his turn that Joannes and Isidore writing under Recared dared not favour the cause of Hermenigild, because his young son Athanagild was still living, and might have been a dangerous weapon in the hands of Ingunthis's Frankish brother and uncle. The arguments against this position are well put by Görres (l. c. p. 80). Another and more plausible theory refers to Hermenigild's alliance with the Byzantines, which, after Recared's reign, during which such great strides were made towards the fusion of the Goths and Romans, and the formation of a Spanish nationality, must have appeared as an act of unpardonable treachery to every loyal subject of the Gothic state—to a writer of Roman descent like Isidore, as well as to a writer of Gothic descent such as the abbat of Biclaro. Gams has put this explanation as strongly as it admits of being put (Kirchengesch. von Spanien ii. [2] 5), and it does no doubt explain the disapprobation of the revolt shewn by Isidore and Joannes. It is difficult, however, to believe that had Hermenigild finally met his death as a martyr for the orthodox belief, such a consideration would have altogether prevented them from mentioning the fact. Both—Isidore more especially—write as accusers of Leovigild, while with such an act in itself both must of course have been in full sympathy. And in any case the theory leaves Gregory of Tours' blame and silence unexplained.

Such are some of the difficulties of this famous case. "A close examination of all the sources," says Görres (in 1873, l. c.), "has led me to the conclusion that the supposed martyrdom of Hermenigild cannot be substantiated." While the most recent ultra-Catholic view is that of Gams: "On the one hand, therefore, stands Gregory I., who represents him as a martyr and a saint, on the other the Spanish sources, who represent him as a rebel. I believe the explanation lies in the practice and teaching of the church, according to which martyrdom, as a baptism of blood (als Bluttaufe), effaces all previous faults."

Growth of the Hermenigild cultus.—The first mention of Hermenigild as a martyr, after Gregory I. occurs in the De vana sæculi sapientia of St. Valerius, the Gallician biographer of San Fructuoso, written towards the end of the 7th century, where, among a list of royal martyrs, appears Regem Gothorum Ermenigildum (Esp. Sagr. xvi. 373). In the Mozarabic liturgy, the work of the 7th century Spanish churchmen, Hermenigild has no place, nor does he appear in the 9th century Memoriale Sanctorum of St. Eulogius (Schott, Hisp. iii. iv. 223). Bede's Martyrology makes no mention of him, nor up to the 9th century does any single author beside Gregory I., Paulus Diaconus following him (Hist. Langob. iii. 31), and Valerius—speak of Hermenigild as a martyr. In the 9th century, however, his name was generally admitted into the Martyrologies (Ap. 13; Ado, Usuardus, Notker, Wandalbertus; all based on Gregory's Dialogue—conf. Ado, "ut scribit beatus Papa Gregorius"), while the 13th-century Spanish historians, entirely reversing the judgment of their predecessors, even made additions to Gregory's narrative (conf. Lucas Tud. "filium suum nefandis ritibus communere nolentem diversis tormentis prius excruciatum, interficere iussit;" and Rod. Tol. de Rebus Hisp. ii. 14, both apud Schott, Hisp. Ill. iv. ii.; Cronion General [Estoria de Espanna], part ii. cap. 39). Thenceforward the cultus grew rapidly, and found its natural issue in 1585, when Sixtus V., urged by Philip II., issued an apostolic brief, instituting the cult of Hermenigild throughout Spain. Urban VIII. made it general throughout the Roman church (Gams, l. c. p. 5).

A few other debated historical points remain to be noticed.

The name of Hermenigild's mother is unknown. The late legend which gives her name as Theodosia, and makes her the daughter of the Catholic Severianus, and sister to Leander and Isidore, has been already noticed under LEOVIGILD. Florez, followed blindly by Arevalo (Isid. Opera, i. 118), gives her name as Rinchildis, an absurd blunder. The passage which Florez (ix. 191) quotes from Ado's chronicle: "Leovigildus Rex filiam Chilperici et Fredegundis nomine Rinchildem duxit uxorem," is nothing but a transformation of the betrothal between Recared and Chilperic's daughter Rigunthis (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. 38). Nothing but complete ignorance of the respective dates and ages of Leovigild and his sons on the one hand and of the grandsons of Chlodwig with their children on the other, could have led Florez and Arevalo into the acceptance of such a statement. (Florez is almost always wrong as to these Hispano-Frankish alliances. The remarks in the same passage on Baddo Recared's wife and Chlodowintha, Sigebert's daughter, to whom he was betrothed but probably not married [conf. Dahn, v. 165, 167 note] are throughout incorrect.) The name therefore of Leovigild's first wife remains unknown, and we are consequently not justified in accepting as history the story of the early Catholic training and surroundings of Recared and Hermenigild, which plays a large part in the Spanish accounts of both, and which has even been allowed a place in the critical narrative of Dahn (Könige der Germanen, v. 135).

The place of Hermenigild's exile was Valencia, not Seville as has been sometimes given (conf. Görres, l. c. p. 53). The authority of Joh. Bicl. on this point is conclusive. Helfferich has besides endeavoured to prove that Valencia was one of the towns in which Arianism had most hold (Westgoth. Recht. p. 35), in which therefore there would be least likelihood of a popular rising on Hermenigild's behalf.

The Roman church celebrates his martyrdom on April 13. The only indication of the date of the day in the sources is to be found in the "superveniente autem paschalis festivitatis die, noctis intempestae silentio" of pope Gregory. This has generally been interpreted to mean the night before Easter Day (v. notes to Ado. Martyr, id. April. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv.). As to the year, Joannes placed the death of Hermenigild early in the seventeenth year of Leovigild, after the first Suevian campaign of that year, and before the Frankish and second Suevian campaigns, which filled the greater part of it. Now the seventeenth year of Leovigild ended at latest in the second half of April or beginning of May 586. and his death, which occurred in the first half of his eighteenth year, cannot be dated later than May 8 of 586. (Görres, l. c.; Beitr. ii. zur Chronologie.) Between Easter Day of 586, which fell on April 14, and which was apparently chosen by the 9th century martyrologists, and May 8 of the same year, there could not possibly have been time for the expedition of Guntchramn against Septimania, and for the suppression of the Suevian rebellion under Malaric in Galicia, which two facts Joannes places between the deaths of father and son, and the first of which we know to have been largely caused by the impression made on Guntchramn by the news of Hermenigild's death. We are therefore obliged to fall back upon Easter Day, 585. This would give March 24-25 for Hermenigild's death, and would also necessitate the conclusion that Leovigild's seventeenth year began before March 24, 585. Again, as we have still to find a place for the important Suevian campaign against Audika in the same year before Hermenigild's death, we may conjecture with some probability that the year in question began in January or February 585. An interesting reflection here suggests itself, supposing the date just arrived at established. If Leovigild were engaged during the early months of 585 in subduing and annexing the Suevi in the extreme north-west of the peninsula, how could he have played the direct personal part in the death of Hermenigild at Tarraco, i.e. the extreme north-east of Spain on March 24 of the same year which St. Gregory assigns to him?

HERMENILDA (Kemble, C. D. 44), abbess. [EORMENGILDA.] [C. H.]

HERMENLANDUS or HERMELANDUS (ST.), abbat of Antrum (Aindre) at the beginning of the 8th century, was born of noble parents at Noviomagus (Nimwegen) in Holland, and was when very young sent as a page to the court of king Clothaire, where he was brought up. When come to years of maturity he refused marriage, and in spite of all opposition entered on a monastic life, first as a novice, and was afterwards consecrated priest in the monastery of Fontanella under St. Landbertus, by whom he was soon sent to Nannetum (Nantes) at the request of Pasquarius, bishop of that diocese, for the purpose of founding a monastery. On his arrival Hermenlandus was cordially received by the bishop, and after surveying the island of Antrum on the Ligeris or Loire in Armorica (Brittany), he chose that for the site of the new monastery, which he at once proceeded to build. On its completion he became abbat, and presided over it for many years. Before his death he appointed Donatus as his successor. Miracles are said to have been worked at his tomb, and he is commemorated on March 25. (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 574; Mabill. Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. i. 365.) [L. G. S.]

HERMEONERIC. [HERMERIC.]

HERMEONITAE, HERMEORITAE, HERMEOTITAE (Philastr. de Haer. lvi.), a heretical sect. [HERMIAS (1).] [T. W. D.]

HERMERIC and HERMIGAB, joint kings (?) of the Suevi in Spain (409–440). In the autumn of 409 (between Sept. 28 and Oct. 13, Dahn, Könige der Germanen, vi. 559) a Suevic tribe accompanied the Vandals and Alani into Spain, and the land was parcelled out among the invaders by lot. (See the famous passage in Idatius describing the entry of the barbarians into the peninsula, apud Esp. Sagr. iv. 353, 354.) To the Suevi and a section of the Vandals fell (A.D. 411) the extreme north-west of Spain, practically the Roman province of Galicia (“Gallaeciam sitam in extremitate oceani maris occidua,” Idat. l. c.). In 417 the Suevi, together with the Vandals and Alani, concluded a treaty with Honorius, by which they engaged to defend Spain for the empire against other barbarians. In 418 Walja, the Gothic king, acting for the empire, “Romani nominis causa” (Idat. l. c.), destroyed the Alani, and the Suevi were relieved from their supremacy, to which they had been for a time forced to submit. They were thus, however, brought face to face with the Vandals, who appear to have been greatly their superiors in point of numbers, and in 419 we find the Suevi, under their king HERMERIC, shut up in the “Montes Nervasi” (between Leon and Oviedo, Dioc. Geogr. de la España Antig. Cortez y Lopez, iii. 220) by the Vandals (Idat. l. c.). The voluntary retreat of the Vandals southward [GENSERIC] relieved the Suevi, and soon encouraged them to follow on the track of their retiring rivals in the hope of appropriating the country left vacant by them. In 429 Genseric was already on the sea-coast planning the migration to Africa, when he heard of the Suevian advance upon Lusitania, and promptly retraced his steps to meet them. A battle followed at Merida (A.D. 429) in which the Suevians were heavily defeated, while their leader Hermigar was drowned in the Guadiana during their flight. Who Hermigar was is doubtful. Idatius does not speak of him as rex, but only as Suevus. Possibly he was Hermeric’s dux only, but possibly also his brother and underking (cf. Dahn, l. c. note 8). Upon this overthrow by the Vandals, followed hostilities on the part of the inland provincials of Galicia acting from the towns and strong places, who inflicted heavy damage on the weakened Suevi and compelled the restoration of all prisoners, as the price of peace. In the following year however (430) Idatius himself, the faithful historian of the time and bishop of the Gallician see of Aquae Flaviae (Chiaves), was sent by the Gallician provincials to Aetius in Gaul to report a breach of the just concluded peace by Hermeric and to ask for help against the Suevi. Just at this time, as Dahn points out (l. c. 561), the Suevi were for more than thirty years practically masters of the peninsula. From 429 to Euric’s accession in 466 no power from within or without was able to cope with them effectually. “That this long period was only employed by them for the devastation and plunder, not for the conquest and colonisation, of the country, goes far towards proving their small numbers” (Dahn, l. c.).

From 433 to 440 Hermeric was obliged by illness (“diuturno morbo adfectus per annos septem,” Idat.) to maintain a more peaceful attitude. He made peace with the Gallician provincials, “sub interventu episcopali” (Idat.), and appointed his son Rekila co-regent. Between 437 and 439 Rekila won important successes over the Romans on the Xenil and Guadiana. Merida was once more captured, and a Roman comes with legati were forced to give themselves up at Myrtilis (Mertola on the Guadiana; see Corpus Inscr. Lat. ii. final map). In 440 Hermeric died, and was succeeded by REKILA, under whom, as under his grandson REKILAR, the Suevian power in Spain reached its highest point. Of all this complicated and tumultuous time from the entry of the barbarians to the beginning of the reign of Euric, the contemporary chronicle of Idatius is an invaluable report. (Dahn, Könige der Germanen, l. c.; Ferreras, ed. D’Hermilly, II. 44, 47, 52; Idat. Chron. l. c.; Isid. Hist. Suev. apud Esp. Sagr. v. 503.) [M. A. W.]

HERMES. See also HERMAS.

HERMES (1) TRISMEGISTUS. Under this title have come down to us a variety of writings of uncertain date and unknown authorship. There is no uncertainty, however, as to the country where they were produced; from external and internal evidence it is alike plain that this was Egypt. It is probably superfluous to remark that the name “Hermes Trismegistus” never belonged to any single writer. What, then, it will be asked, is the meaning of it, and why is it attached to these works? This question will be answered for us by Jamblichus, who at the beginning of his treatise De Mysteriis tells us that “Hermes, who presides over speech, is, according to ancient tradition, common to all priests; he it is who exists in all of them. That is why our ancestors attributed all discoveries to him, and issued their works under the name of Hermes.” There was, in fact, a long-continued series of books called “hermetic,” extending in their production over several centuries. Hermetic books are mentioned by Plutarch (de Iside, c. 61), Galen (de Simplic. Med. vi. 1), and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 4, p. 457), and hence it is apparent that some of them date from a period not later than the 2nd century after Christ. But the books described by Clement would seem to have been for the most part of a distinctly sacerdotal and even technical cast; it would not appear that they were of wide or deep philosophical or spiritual import. Tertullian, however (cont. Valent. c. 15), speaks of Hermes Trismegistus as a master in philosophy; and the extant hermetic books have, whatever their date, philosophical and spiritual relations of a very interesting kind. They belong, as is now generally agreed, to the Neoplatonic school; and while far from powerful or originative books, they shew much reflexive appreciation of what is truly powerful and originative, and gather up in a synthesis, the artificiality of which is not at first sight apparent, large elements of all the different factors of religious belief in the Roman world of the second and third centuries. The two principal of these works are the Ποιμάνδρως

(the "Shepherd of men"), and the Λόγος τέλειος (or "discourse of initiation"), otherwise called "Asclepius." These two works, together with a variety of fragments, have been translated into French by M. Louis Ménard (Paris, 1867), and accompanied with a preliminary essay of much interest on the hermetic writings and their affinities generally. The most important fragments translated by M. Ménard are taken from a work entitled Κόρη κόσμου (the "Virgin of the World"), which consists of a dialogue between Isis and her son Hôrus on the origin of nature and of animated beings, including man. Other less noticeable works attributed to Hermes Trismegistus will be found named in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography (art. "Hermes Trismegistus").

But we must recur to the two first-named works, the Ποιμάνδρης (Poemander) and the Λόγος τέλειος (Asclepius). It is not to be assumed that these two works are by the same author; but from the great similarity of tone and thought between them, this will appear no improbable hypothesis. Both works are quoted by Lactantius (who ascribed to them the same fabulous antiquity and high authority which the early fathers were accustomed to attribute to the Sibylline books); and as Lactantius died about A.D. 330, this fixes a point before which the Poemander and the Asclepius must have been written. If the Latin translation of the Asclepius (the Greek original, except in the quotations by Lactantius, has been lost) were correctly attributed to Apuleius of Madaura, then this work must have been composed at latest in the 2nd century; but the attribution is now considered an error; and the historical allusions in the work distinctly point to a time when heathenism was about to perish before the increasing power of Christianity. Hence we may with much probability conclude that both these works were written towards the close of the 3rd century. Some, however, have brought the Poemander into connexion with the Pastor of Hermas, and have even assigned it to the same author; this, however, is not probable.

Three motives (if we may so speak) are discernible in these works. First, the endeavour to take an intellectual survey of the whole spiritual universe, without marking any points where the understanding of man fails and has to retire unsatisfied; this is a disposition which, under different forms and at different times, has been called Pantheism or Gnosticism (though the Gnostic idea of an evil element in creation nowhere appears in these treatises). The ideas of the author on these points are presented under the form of a gorgeous material imagery; and, speaking generally, he regards the material world as interpenetrated by the spiritual, and almost identified with it. The power and divine character which he attributes to the sun and other heavenly bodies is peculiarly Egyptian, though this also brings him into affinity with Stoic, and even with Platonic, views. There is much more of symbol and imagery than of elaborately constructed theory in these representations. Secondly, the Pantheism or Gnosticism above described is modified by moral and religious elements which certainly might to some degree be paralleled in Plato, but to which it is difficult to avoid ascribing a Jewish and even a Christian origin. Great stress is laid on the unity, the creative power, the fatherhood and goodness of God. So, too, the argument from design appears: "No one pretends that a statue or picture can exist without a sculptor or painter, and can the creation be without a creator?" (Poemander c. 5.) Even the well-known terms of baptism and regeneration occur, though in different connexions, and the former in a metaphorical sense. One of the chapters of the Poemander is entitled "The Secret Sermon on the Mountain." The future punishments for wrongdoing are described with emphasis. Many more instances of these affinities have been collected by Baumgarten-Crusius (in the essay mentioned below). At the same time there is no moral teaching in detail. But thirdly, these respectively intellectual and religious elements are associated with a third of a very rare and noticeable character. The Asclepius contains a passionate and vigorous defence of the heathen religion, including idol worship, and a prophecy of the evils which will come on the earth from the loss of piety. In fact, this is the only part of the treatises which go by the name of Hermes Trismegistus in which something like powerful sentiment appears; sentiment, it is true, on behalf of a system wholly wrapped up in unreality, but still not unintelligible nor wholly condemnable to one who regards the long ages, the countless memories, with which the worship of Zeus and Athena, of Ares and Aphrodite, was then associated. It may be worth while to quote (with abbreviations) part of this passage. "Knowest thou not, Asclepius, that Egypt is the image of heaven, the representation on earth of every celestial ordinance? Our land is the temple of the world. Yet, as the wise ought to foresee everything, one thing you must know: the time will come when it will appear that the Egyptians have in vain observed the worship of the gods with so much piety, and that all their sacred prayers have been barren and unheard. The divinity will leave the earth. Religion, piety, the worship of the gods will be proscribed and punished by the laws. This land, sanctified by so many shrines and temples, will be covered with tombs and death. O Egypt! Egypt! of thy sacred things nothing will remain save words graven on the stones that record thy pious deeds. The Scythian or Indian, or some other barbarian, will inhabit Egypt. Then weepst, Asclepius? Still worse will happen. Egypt herself will be tainted and seduced. She, once the holy land, the most faithful lover of the gods, will be the perverter of saints, the school of impiety, the example of all violence. Then, full of loathing, man will have for the world neither admiration nor love. He will turn away from that perfect work. In weariness of soul, he will but disdain this vast universe, this changeless work of God, where the will of God has gathered all together in harmonious synthesis, worthy for ever of veneration, praise, and love. . . . Then will evil angels mingle with miserable humanity, and push it on to crimes, wars, rapine, falsehood. The sea will be no more navigable, the stars will change their courses, the fruits of the earth will be corrupted. Such will be the old age of the world, irreligion, anarchy, confusion of all law and of all good. When this shall have happened, Asclepius, then God, the Lord and Father, seeing the deeds of men, will correct these evils by an act of His will and divine goodness; to put an end to this corruption, He will drown the world by a deluge, or consume it by fire, or destroy it by war and pestilence, and will restore its first beauty to the world, that the world may seem again worthy to be admired and adored, and that praise may again be given to God, who has created and restored so beautiful a work. This second birth of the world will take place after the period fixed by the divine and eternal will." Such is the only extant lamentation of expiring heathenism; perhaps one may say that there were even elements of prescience in the forecast; certainly it is not without pathos. But for the most part the style of these works is hierophantic, pretentious, and diffuse.

Those who wish to know more about Hermes Trismegistus may consult (besides the work of M. Ménard above referred to) Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 46-94; and Baumgarten Crusius, de Librorum Hermeticorum Origine atque Indole, Jena, 1827. Vacherot gives a short disquisition on the hermetic works, and Zeller notices them slightly. [J. R. M.]

HERMES (2), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, supposed to be the Hermes mentioned by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 14), to have succeeded Titus as bishop of Dalmatia, and to have suffered martyrdom. (See the Menaea and the Menologium Basilianum for Nov. 4, Migne, Patr. Gr. cxvii. 143; also Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. i. 393-404.) [J. de S.]

HERMES (3)—Aug. 28. A prefect of the city of Rome, who is mentioned in the apocryphal acts of pope Alexander I., A.D. 120, by whom he, his wife, his children, and his sister Theodora are said to have been converted and baptized. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.; Kal. Front.; Tillemont, Mém. i. 238, 590; Baron. Annal. A.D. 132, num. i.) [G. T. S.]

HERMES (4), ST., exorcist, martyr under Aurelian; commemorated on Dec. 31. (Usuard. Mart.) The Syrian Mart. places him at Bologna under Dec. 30 (Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 423). [C. H.]

HERMES (5)—March 1. Martyr with Adrian at Marseilles. (Mart. Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERMES (6), archdeacon of Narbonne not earlier than 445, bearer of a letter from St. Leo to Rusticus bishop of that place. About 460 Hermes was consecrated by Rusticus to the see of Beziers, but the inhabitants rejected him, as of unworthy life. On the death of Rusticus he assumed the bishopric of Narbonne without due election, and pope Hilary (epp. 7 and 8) permitted him to retain the office, but without the privilege of ordaining (Leo. Ep. 167, p. 1416). [R. T. S.]

HERMES (7)—Oct. 22. A martyr at Adrianople, with a bishop named Philip, and Eusebius. Rabanus makes him a deacon, and for Eusebius puts Severus a presbyter. (Mart. Adon., Usuard., Raban.; Wright, Syr. Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, p. 430; Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 409.) [G. T. S.]

HERMES (8)—Jan. 4. A martyr at Bononia (Bologna) with Aggeus and Gaius. (Mart. Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

HERMES, archbishop of Besançon. [HERVAEUS.]

HERMES (9), ST., William of Worcester (Itin. 129) says, "Sanctus Hermes confessor . . . Cornubia 28 die Augusti," and see 108, 115, 129. His name also occurs in the Breton liturgy of the 10th century (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82). The relics of St. Hermes of Rome, whose day is 28th August (Mart. Usuard.), were translated to Salzburg, A.D. 851 (Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, i. 216, ii. 215). The name in Cornwall may have taken the place of some Celtic name, as has happened in other cases. The parish of St. Herme, or St. Erme, lies just north-east of Truro in Cornwall, and the feast day used to be on the last Sunday in August, the Sunday nearest to 28th August, but it was altered in 1788 to the last Sunday in October. There was also a chapel of St. Hermes at Marazion, in the parish of St. Hilary. [C. W. B.]

HERMESIGENES (1), presbyter, oeconomus, and apocrisiarius, one of three representatives of Ephraim patriarch of Antioch at the conference with the Severians at Constantinople in 531. (Mansi, viii. 818.) [T. W. D.]

HERMESIGENES (2), an assessor, to whom Theodoret wrote on the occasion of one of the great Christian festivals, probably Easter, wishing him all joy and requesting him to write in return (Theod. Ep. 72). [E. V.]

HERMETIUS, Irish abbat. [ERMEDHACH.]

HERMIAS (1), HERMEONITAE (al. Hermioritae, Hermiotitae). On the Hermias mentioned by Philaster (Haer. 54) see HERMOGENES. Philaster adds that this Hermias left followers in Galatia, also called PROCLIANITAE, who added to their master's errors others of their own, viz. the interpretation of the four living creatures in the book of Ezekiel, of four temporal monarchs, the use of the book of Ecclesiasticus, the denial that Christ had come in the flesh or had been born of a virgin, and the denial of a future resurrection and judgment. [G. S.]

HERMIAS (2)—July 6. A martyr with Felix under Numerian, A.D. 284, at Apollonias. (Bas. Men.)

HERMIAS (3), Phrygian philosopher. [EULAMIUS.]

HERMIAS (4)—May 31. A military martyr at Comana in Cappadocia under Antoninus. (Bas. Men.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vii. 423; Cal. Byzant.) [C. H.]

HERMIAS (5), a Christian philosopher, author of a treatise, Irrisio Gentilium Philosophorum, which is found in al' Bibliothecae Patrum annexed to the works of Athenagoras (Migne, Patr. Gr. vi. 1167). It was published by itself in Greek and Latin at Basil in 1553. It consists of a series of satirical reflections on the opinions of the philosophers, shewing how Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Pythagoras, Epicurus,

&c. all agree in nothing but repelling and refuting one another. Who the author was seems to have baffled all enquiries. Some would identify him with Hermias Sozomen the ecclesiastical historian. Even the martyr of May 31 has been suggested (Ceill. ut 'infr.). Cave, who discusses the subject at some length (i. 81) attributes this work to the 2nd century. As it was plainly written when heathenism was triumphant, Ceillier (vi. 332) fixes its publication under Julian. Neander (H. E. ii. 429, ed. Bohn) regards Hermias as "one of those bitter enemies of the Greek philosophy whom Clement of Alexandria thought it necessary to censure, and who, following the idle Jewish legend, pretended that the Greek philosophy had been derived from fallen angels. In the title of his book he is called the philosopher; perhaps he wore the philosopher's mantle before his conversion, and after it passed at once from an enthusiastic admiration of the Greek philosophy to extreme abhorrence of it." (Du Pin, H. E. t. i. p. 69, ed. 1723.) [G. T. S.]

HERMIAS (6) SOZOMEN. [SOZOMEN.]

HERMIAS (7), presbyter, to whom Cyril of Alexandria addressed his Dialogues on the Trinity. (Patr. Gr. lxxv. 659.) He has been suggested (Ceill. vi. 332), as possibly the author of the Irrisio. [HERMIAS (5).] [C. H.]

HERMIAS (8), bishop of Abydos on the Hellespont, was present at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, and signed the synodal letter of the Cyzicene province to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 587; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 773.) [L. D.]

HERMIAS (9), a Syrian, the father of Felix presbyter of Nola. A brother of Felix was also named Hermias. (Paulin. Nol. poem. xv. vv. 76, 79, p. 30 in Patr. Lat. lxi. 470 A, B.) [C. H.]

HERMIGAR. [HERMERIC.]

HERMINARDUS (HERMENARIUS), thirty-seventh archbishop of Bourges, succeeding Landoarius, and followed by Deodatus, was present at the Lateran council convoked by pope Stephen III. in A.D. 769. He is said to have died in 774. (Mansi, xii. 715; Gall. Christ. ii. 19.) [S. A. B.]

HERMINGILD, prince. [HERMENIGILD.]

HERMINUS (HERMINIUS), count, a correspondent of Isidore of Pelusium, of whose letters forty-three are addressed to him. The most interesting are the following: bk. i. ep. 18, on the perpetual virginity of the blessed Virgin Mary; i. 136, on the episcopal office; ii. 137, Isidore mentions a lost work, λόγος κατὰ Ἑλλήνας, in which he defends Christianity from certain accusations; iii. 195, on infant baptism; iii. 253, Isidore mentions a book, also lost, against fate, περὶ τοῦ μὴ εἶναι εἰμαρμένον; v. 276, on the prevalence of simony. (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxviii. 191 sqq.; Ceillier, viii. 479-487.) [J. W. S.]

HERMION, bishop of Tanis, in the Delta. He was present at the synod of Alexandria, A.D. 362, and signed the epistle addressed to the church of Antioch. (Mansi, iii. 345; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 535.) [J. de S.]

HERMIONE (1)—Sept. 4, daughter of Philip the apostle, according to Bas. Men. probably the deacon being meant (Acts xxi. 8). She lived at Ephesus until Trajan's time with a sister named Eutycha. The emperor, making an expedition against the Persians, came to Ephesus, where, hearing of her fame as a Christian prophetess, he tortured her, but released her when she predicted his triumph over the Persians. She is said to have been martyred under Adrian. The whole story is devoid of any really ancient authority. Cf. however a learned note on the subject of the residence of the apostle Philip in Asia Minor, in Dr. Lightfoot's Commentary on the Colossians, p. 45. See also articles on "Philip the Apostle" and "Philip the Evangelist" in Dictionary of the Bible. (Bas. Men.; Acta SS. Boll. Sept. ii. 185; Dodwell, Dissert. Cyprian. xi. 17-28.) [G. T. S.]

HERMIONE (2), virgin in Eleutheropolis (Freistadt), commended by Marcellinus and Faustinus, priests who were attached to the schism of Ursinus and Lucifer in the 4th century. (Faustini et Marcellini Lit. Precum ad Imperatores, c. 29; Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 103; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Ecclés. v. 154.) [L. G. S.]

HERMIONITAE, heretics. [HERMIAS (1).]

HERMIPPUS, or HERNEMPUS (Usuard. July 27)—July 26. A presbyter and martyr with two other priests, Hermolaus and Hermocrates or Hermogrates, at Nicomedia during the Diocletian persecution. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]
